It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

of the banks of deposit, the Secretary of the Treasury, under the discretionary power vested in him by the law as it now exists, may discontinue or change them at pleasure. If the bill pass, he will no longer possess this power; and if the object of the gentleman from Georgia, by his proposed amendment, be to restrict this discretion, he cannot fail to attain his object by aiding in the passage of this bill.

All parties in this House now agree that the Bank of the United States is not to be rechartered, and that we ought to provide other depositories and other agents to keep the public money, and perform the fiscal duties heretofore performed by that institution. If this be so, I have a right to call upon all parties in the House to unite with me in passing this or some other bill upon the subject. The alternative is presented to the House, either to suffer the banks now employed to continue in the service of the Treasury, under the law as it now exists, or to pass a law prescribing the mode of selection, the securities to be taken, and the manner and terms on which they are to be employed. The bill before the House is intended to accomplish the latter objects. It was the result of a careful and laborious examination of the subject at the last session of Congress. It has undergone a careful revision, in all its provisions and details, by the committee who reported it at the present session. It is not desired to leave with the Executive any discretionary power which can be restricted or defined by law. The President, in his annual message, calls the attention of Congress to the subject, and suggests the propriety of further legislation. If the bill be susceptible of amendment, let it be amended and passed. That portion of the House who have heretofore objected most loudly to the exercise of the discretionary power now vested in the Executive, can certainly have no objection to unite with me in perfecting and passing the bill.

When Mr. POLK had concluded his speech,

Mr. GORDON submitted the following amendment:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the _____ day of _____ in the year _____ the collectors of the public revenue, at places where the sums collected shall not exceed the sum of _____ dollars per annum, shall be the agents of the Treasurer to keep and disburse the same, and be subject to such rules and regulations, and give such bond and security, as he shall prescribe, for the faithful execution of their office, and shall receive, in addition to the compensation now allowed by law, _____ per centum on the sums disbursed, so that it does not exceed the sum of _____ dollars per annum.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That at places where the amount of public revenue collected shall exceed the sum of _____ dollars per annum, there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, receivers of the public revenue, to be agents of the Treasurer, who shall give such bond and security to keep and disburse the public revenue, and be subject to such rules and regulations as the Treasurer shall prescribe, and shall receive for their services _____ per centum per annum on the sums disbursed, provided it does not exceed the sum of _____ dollars per annum.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the _____ day of _____, the whole revenue of the United States derived from customs, lands, or other sources, shall be paid in the current coins of the United States.

When Mr. G. had offered his amendment, he addressed the House nearly as follows:

In presenting the amendment which has just been read, I candidly acknowledge that I do not at this time entertain a very distinct hope of obtaining in its favor the votes of a majority of this body. I presented, at the last session, a similar amendment to a bill then pending; and I was induced to do so by the deep interest felt, both here and elsewhere, in the discussions which were then carried on in Congress, touching the management of the public revenue. When, within sixty days of the meeting of the Congress of the United States, I beheld the extraordinary spectacle of the executive head of this confederacy attempting, through his power of appointment, and the practice of removal from office, to control and regulate the deposit of the public revenue, it did, I confess, awaken in my mind feelings of the deepest surprise and alarm.

In the controversy which was so warmly prosecuted in this House in relation to that subject, the members of Congress were divided into parties—one in favor of the continuance of the Bank of the United States, and of giving to it the custody of the public revenue; another in defence of the executive interference, in its removal, and of substituting the banks of the different States. I was one of a small class of Representatives on this floor opposed to the Bank of the United States, both because it was unconstitutional, and is an institution capable of wielding a power dangerous to republican government, and also opposed to the executive interference in any way with the revenues of the people, because I considered it to be a vital principle in all free Governments, that the revenue must, in all respects, be under the control of the people or their representatives, to whom alone it pertained to say how it shall be raised and collected, by whom it shall be paid, how it shall be disbursed, to what uses it shall be applied, and by whom and where it shall be kept.

It was argued by the friends of the Executive, that such an institution as the United States Bank was dangerous to a free Government, from its extensive and powerful influence, as well over the public opinion as the public interest. I concur in this opinion, and rejoice that the bank is to be put down, but I nevertheless entirely disapprove of the executive interference, in causing the public money to be removed from the custody where the law had placed it to the State banks, where the law did not direct it should be placed, and because the power and influence of a multitude of State banks, scattered over every portion of the country, dependent on the executive will, would be a dangerous extension of the patronage of the Executive, especially as the custody and control of the revenue was claimed by the friends of the administration, in this behalf, as an executive power derived from the constitution itself. Perceiving, I thought, that the scheme of the Executive would result in evils not then anticipated, I looked out with anxiety to discover some plan by which the federal Government might be wholly disconnected from the organized capital of the country, whether in a national or in State banks. And after much reflection, and consultation with wise and experienced men, I proposed to effect it by an amendment to the bill then pending, and presented it to the consideration of Congress; and I now venture once more to submit it to the notice of this body.

In taking this step, I am actuated by higher considerations than a regard simply to the safe keeping of the public treasure. I verily believe, and I think experience will convince the most incredulous republican, that the wise and patriotic framers of our constitution have unintentionally given to the executive power a fearful and dangerous ascendancy, which makes it an overbalance to all the other departments of Government. Limited and circumscribed within the constitutional limits, it is a power too great to be confided with safety to any human being. According to the new construction placed upon its extent by the present incumbent, and his supporters in his behalf, it is a mass of power such as the benefi-cent Author of the world could alone wield without danger to human liberty. What is this body? What are the Representatives of the American people? Before the might of the executive arm they yield as a rush. When that exalted officer unrolls the scroll of his might, when he exhibits to their anxious eyes the endless roll of honorable and profitable appointments which await his pleasure, who among us possesses the firmness to turn with averted eyes from the golden bait of interest and power? And who can sustain the erectness of his spirit after he has reached the goal of his ambition, when he feels that he holds his station by the will of one man? And when it has become the practice of the Government to appoint to the highest of those places influential and devoted members of this body, can any man expect that a majority of its members should long stand up against the influence of this proud and seducing power thus exerted? Let it not be thought that I have any wish to speak unkindly of the present distinguished incumbent of the executive chair. I contributed my humble aid to elevate him to the seat he occupies, and in many, in most of his acts, he has my entire concurrence. But I have seen of late, under his construction of the constitution, and the support which his doctrine and his course have received, the liberties of this country brought, as I conceive, into the most imminent danger. Owing to the attachment of my country to one whom they consider as their great and distinguished benefactor, the whole land seems to be sleeping in a condition which, unless we arouse and exert ourselves, may prove the sleep of despotism.

Mr. Speaker, this Representative hall presents, or ought to present, the true and legitimate fountain of public opinion. It is here that the Representative of the people should take his stand in defence of the liberty of the people and his own rights, against the overshadowing influence of executive power. But, sir, how is it that we have stood upon this floor, and what is the resistance which we have presented to executive claims? By pleading the practice of the Government during former years, in minor instances, to justify the extraordinary spectacle of the Chief Executive Magistrate of this Republic controlling, by a single act of his will, the whole revenue of the country. In my recollection of English history, I remember no instance where a question has arisen affecting immediately the rights of the people, invaded by the King, that the English Commons have not been true to the people's interest, against the unjust pretensions of the Crown. But here, sir, within these walls, I regret to have seen that almost the first great question which has arisen affecting the dearest rights of the people, directly invaded by executive power, a majority of the immediate representatives of the people are seen rallying on the side of power. Still, had the act of the President, though to my mind plainly wrong and unauthorized, resulted in an equal and beneficial diffusion of the public revenues through the different portions of the Republic, we might have found some room for palliation of the illegality of the act in its beneficence. If we could not approve, we might at least have excused it. But what, sir, in fact, has been the actual result of this new and beautiful arrangement of our fiscal concerns, so highly lauded by the talented and amiable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means? Of the twenty-four millions which constitute the gross amount of our revenue received from the customs, more than thirteen millions, being collected in one seaport, are deposited in the banks of a single State, while the other twenty-three States are left to get such fragments of the residue as chance or favor may throw into their lot. Yes, sir, while the great State of New York, so justly styled the empire State, in addition to all her other advantages, natural and political, has her banking capital increased by the accession of more than thirteen millions of dollars, by a single wave of the executive arm, Virginia, the Old Dominion, receives from the same arrangement a little more, in gross revenue, than two hundred thousand dollars. Ay, sir, that ancient Commonwealth, that has borne the battle and the breeze, which in all emergencies of this Republic, if not foremost, has ever been found in the front rank in its defence, in this distribution of the federal loaves and fishes, puts into her coffers two hundred thousand dollars, while the great State of New York, with her army of Representatives on this floor, and all her preponderating weight in the councils of this nation, receives the modest and inconsiderable sum of thirteen millions of dollars. Whenever I think of this distribution, it reminds me of Æsop's fable of the beasts who hunted with the lion in company. We all know how the spoil was divided then, and it is not difficult now to tell who it is that has received the lion's share.

The proposition I have presented is intended to remedy these inequalities. Sir, I have said that the Executive, in this Government, was too strong for the other departments, from its legitimate constitutional power. Commander-in-chief of the army, of the navy; controlling, in a great degree, the Land and the Indian Departments, the Post Office Department, the officers of the customs, the jobs and contracts authorized by law—and when you superadd to the executive patronage this power of dispensing the revenue to whatever portion of the country he may please, you yield a fearful and highly dangerous extension of an authority never, in its simplest form, sufficiently guarded or circumscribed. The great man of Virginia, Patrick Henry, a political seer who looked far down the stream of time, and who foretold, with prophetic truth, the tendencies of this Government—uttered, in the convention of Virginia which adopted the federal constitution, this sententious maxim of political wisdom: "When you give power you know not what you give." Sir, it is most true. When you give power to a Secretary of the Treasury (we know of what stuff they are made of) to transfer at pleasure the deposits of the revenue to such banks as may most successfully court his favor, you are adding to the President of the United States, whose creature he is, and that by the legislation of this House, a most tremendous and gigantic power. And how is it to be exercised? Is there to be no inequality? Yes, sir, the States of the South, and those whose representation is weak upon this floor, are to get nothing, although it is their agriculture which furnishes two thirds of the entire amount of our commercial exports. Sir, you compromised the controversy about the tariff, but if the whole of the States of this Union are to be taxed for the exclusive benefit of the bankers and brokers of New York, you are imposing upon the people a burden even worse than that of the tariff itself. Unjust and oppressive as that was, it had still something alluring about it in the encouragement of our own fabrications; in the arts which adorn and the arms which defend our country—an object which, could it be effected with fairness, and without oppression, the South would rejoice in. But it is a most gloomy prospect to contemplate that more than half of the revenue derived from the customs of this vast country shall go into the coffers of New York. Sir, that empire State, with this fearful addition to all her natural and commercial advantages, will grow too powerful for this confederacy. That will happen with respect to her which Maryland feared would happen as to Virginia, unless she should consent to cede her western domain. Sir, Virginia put those fears to flight. With a view to preserve the equality of the States, she did cede her western domain, to be formed into States equal and free as herself: for, true to principle, she has always preferred liberty to power.

The State of New York possesses great natural advantages, improved by the enterprise of her citizens and the wisdom of her councils: at this I rejoice. Her position is most felicitous: extensive in territory, with the lakes on one border and the Atlantic ocean on the other; binding to her closely, by ties of interest, whole States of the confederacy, she is possessed of commercial advantages to which she is fairly entitled, and of which I would not wish to deprive her. But I would not swell her prosperity by political regulations calculated to give her a fearful preponderancy; for, should the political power of the President drift to a union with the commercial power of New York, they will present a combination ominous to freedom.

There is another consideration which has induced me to offer this amendment. We may all very plainly see that the contest for the executive office is the rock on which the permanency of this Republic is likely to be wrecked, and the vehemence of this contest will ever be in proportion to the executive patronage. But for this, the office would have no allurements but for virtuous ambition; but, with this concomitant, it exerts an influence which may one day prove fatal to the federal part of our system. If we do not separate the influence of the Executive from the interest of banking incorporations, we shall have another controversy on the subject of banks. The political will be united with the money power. The contest must come—it will come. You will witness a struggle in this Capitol between State banks and federal banks, and the combatants for the President's chair will be found contending in different ranks of interest and influence, whilst they mar the peace of the country and shake the pillars of the constitution. Separate, then, I beseech you, Representatives of the American people, if you wish to put down this fearful contest for the presidential chair—I had almost said presidential throne—separate, I entreat you, banking and politics. Let the banks facilitate the exchanges of commerce and further the interests of trade; but let them, I pray you, have nothing to do with the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I know and feel under what disadvantages the proposition I have offered comes before the House. Sir, I am not the first or the only man who has attempted to arrest the course of power, and I know at what a hazard that attempt is usually made. Sir, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has told us that the plan I propose has not escaped the notice of the Secretary of the Treasury. Yet, though that officer has presented us with a ponderous, I wish I could add luminous, report on the fiscal concerns of this Government, he has passed this proposition with a single glance. When the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GAMBLE] introduced a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for a plan to collect and disburse the public revenue without the agency of banks, the House voted it down. The proposition met with no favor. The arrangement was made; the bargain was concluded; the banks had got the money; they hold it now; and the present bill is little more or less than a form, a ceremony, ratifying the bargain concluded between the organized capital of the country and the Secretary of the Treasury. No wonder that officer declined entering into the details of a scheme which he himself admitted to be of a practical character, but which did not suit the purposes of power. Sir, the scheme is practicable; and, further, I say that it is more simple and more efficient than that proposed by this bill. It is true, the amendment is elementary only; it proposes the germe, the distinguishing measure only, of the plan I propose; but were this agreed upon, how easy would it be to go on and perfect the details. Let these collectors be put under bond, with sufficient security, and let them keep the revenue they may collect until called for by the Government. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means thinks that this would keep too much specie unemployed. Sir, the day has not long gone by when this hall, ay, sir, and the whole country, rang with the cry of "specie! specie!" "Jackson money!" "yellow jackets!" "down with bank rags!" Well, sir, I propose a plan by which the business of Government will be done in specie, and in specie only; and then the gentleman tells us that by law it is done in specie already. Such, it seems, is now the law of the land. Sir, I am glad, exceeding glad, to hear it. If the fact be so, I have proposed no innovation; and ought not the practice of the Government to correspond with the law? I am not for altering such a law. But what does this bill do? It makes it indispensable to any bank's becoming the depository of the Government funds, that it have at all times a large amount of specie in its vaults. It appoints a system of search and inspection to ascertain the fact; and if it shall be discovered that the bank does not keep locked up from circulation a certain large amount of specie, the Government deposits are withdrawn, and the bank ruined.

Surely, sir, the specie in the vaults of a bank is as much withdrawn from circulation among the people as in the coffers of a collector of the revenue. It lies there merely as a source of credit to the bank. But there would but an inconsiderable amount lie thus idle at any time. The money would, in effect, be as useful as if deposited in the State banks themselves. It would be moving in a constant stream into and out of the depositories. The banks might possess themselves of the drafts of Government, which, being drawn on specie in the actual possession of these agents of the Treasurer, in favor of all public creditors, would be held as so much specie. Such drafts, or I am mistaken, would soon be at a premium. There would be no difficulty whatever on that score. The plan would probably require the creation of a few additional officers, I admit, but they would not be many; possibly there might none be needed; but in point of patronage they would be nothing, compared with this fearful connexion between the organized capital of the State banks and the power of the Treasury of the Union. If gentlemen will only aid me by bestowing on the proposition I have submitted a small share of the labor and thought applied to carry into effect the State bank system, if they will turn their minds earnestly to perfecting its details, they will find imagined difficulties fade before them. They will soon be convinced that honest and responsible men are to be found in this country, who may safely be intrusted with the custody of the public treasure. The Treasurer, by his drafts, will relieve all difficulties on the subject of exchange; and the entire system of managing the public revenue will be reduced to the simplest and easiest form.

I desire to limit and restrain the executive patronage; I seek to keep it free from the corroding influence of banks and banking. Sir, I desire no longer to have it openly charged upon members of Congress that they have been bought and bribed by a bank. Let the proposed plan of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means go into effect, and the day is not far distant when gentlemen will be charged in the selfsame manner with having been bribed by the State banks. When a new war of interest and ambition shall arise, between a renewed effort to make a Bank of the United States and the existing State banks, those who oppose the measure will then be told that they are bribed by the State banks. Sir, the times are portentous; all feel it, all know it to be so. Every body knows that a pervading anxiety agitates the bosoms of the best and wisest patriots of the land; and no man can tell how the drama is to terminate. Let us, then, endeavor at least to purify one source of corruption. Let us cut off at least one arm of dangerous and unnecessary power. We shall have the bond of those who keep our money; and if it is not paid, we will have it paid. Then we shall no longer be calculating here how a million and a half of dollars deficient in the treasury, said to be lost by the default of State banks, can be made to appear but $100,000. You will then have an honest system of custody for the public funds, and one in which the people of the country have a deep interest. Sir, the great body of the people do not understand these banking institutions. They know nothing about them; nothing, sir, nothing, but the happy event of bringing the United States Bank to an end; and the use made of it for political purposes has prevented you from hearing, from one end of this confederacy to the other, one universal cry against the interference of the Executive with the public revenue. Sir, the Executive is honest; he is frank and open; he promised to kill the bank, and he has killed it. I rejoice at it, nor did I quit his side in this contest until I thought he had passed the bounds of constitutional warfare, and was inflicting wounds on Liberty herself.

Mr. Speaker, it is the theory of this Government, and it is no less the wish of the people, that the Government shall be wholly disinterested and kept distinct from the religion of the nation. That separation is guaranteed in the constitution by an amendment proposed by my native State. It is equally the provision of that instrument that the Government shall be equally separated from the public press. It solemnly enjoins that nothing shall be permitted to silence that trumpet which summons the people to the defence of their liberties. And it will turn out to be no less necessary that the action of this Government shall be separated from all moneyed corporations, organizing the wealth and capital of the country. Sir, we have been placed, by the hand of the Divine Providence, upon a vast and a fertile continent. We enjoy the freest Government under heaven; we have a great, a glorious, confederacy of free States; is it not our sacred duty to guard this fair inheritance against the taint of corruption? Sir, I declare before this body, upon the integrity of my honor, that the effort I have now made is utterly disconnected with all party aims and party feeling. I believe some such expedient indispensable to liberty. And were I authorized to speak, I would say that I do believe the great man whose genius and whose patriotic valor have raised him to the first seat in this Government would himself, being no advocate of banks, prefer such a measure to that proposed in this bill.

I know there are some slight inconveniences attending the plan. But these, whatever they may be, are but dust in the balance in comparison to the dangerous tendency of that now held out to us, and which may one day shake this confederacy to its deepest foundations. The agitation attending the pulling down of the national bank has not subsided to this day; the undulation of the billows will long be visible; nor will banking controversies, for our immense revenues, cease until some efficient substitute shall be provided by Congress.

As to the details of the scheme I have now had the honor to propose to the Congress of the United States, they may be arranged at leisure when once the principle of the scheme is settled. I did not present my proposition as containing a perfect plan; but, if its principle shall be approved of, the subordinate arrangements need be attended with but little difficulty.

Sir, I am fully aware of the desultory and irregular manner in which I have been able to present my thoughts to the House; but they have been conceived, I trust, in purity of purpose, as they have been frankly uttered. Let us not lend our aid to the enactment of laws which go only to swell the already portentous tide of executive power; rather, whilst we restrain ourselves within the limits prescribed by the constitution, let us use our best efforts to curb executive encroachments on our legislative rights, and to provide more effectual safeguards for the liberties of the people.

When Mr. GORDON had finished his remarks,

Mr. SAMUEL McD. MOORE, of Virginia, obtained the floor, against numerous competitors, and offered the following amendment:

Strike out [all after the word "that," to the end of the second line of the first section of the bill, and insert these words: The public money shall hereafter be deposited in the following banks, to wit: the Merchants' Bank of Salem, the Bank of New London, &c. [Here insert the names of all the banks now employed as deposit banks.] Provided, That the said banks shall be willing to undertake to do and perform the several duties and services, and to conform to the conditions prescribed by this act.

Mr. MOORE said he did not rise for the purpose of troubling the House with a long speech. He had no disposition to do so at so late a period of the session, and still less at so late an hour, when the usual time for adjourning had almost arrived. He had risen to respond to the call made by the honorable gentleman at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. POLK.] That gentleman had expressed the hope that, now it was ascertained that the United States Bank would not be rechartered, all the members of the House would aid in rendering the bill for regulating the deposits of the public money in the State banks as perfect as possible. He had invited gentlemen of all parties to unite in endeavoring to render the bill unexceptionable, by proposing amendments. He (Mr. M.) had risen to act upon the worthy chairman's suggestion, and would propose an amendment which he hoped would meet the approbation of the House, and of the gentleman himself.

Mr. M. said it was well known that he had entertained the opinion that a United States Bank was necessary to enable the Government to carry on its fiscal operations; nor had he changed his opinions on that point; it was obvious, however, that no Bank of the United States would be chartered. The experiment of keeping the public money in the State banks was again to be tried, and he was willing the experiment should be a fair one. He was very willing that it should prove successful, though he was not satisfied it would do so. It would be recollected by the gentleman [Mr. POLK] that he had, even at the last session, after it had been ascertained that no Bank of the United States would be rechartered, expressed a willingness to aid in perfecting the bill, and to vote for it, if it could be so amended as to take from the Secretary of the Treasury the unlimited control which he exercised over the money of the public. He would have offered the amendment, which he would now propose to the bill before the House, to the bill of the last session, which was substantially the same with that under consideration, if he had had an opportunity to do so.

The amendment he had to propose was, to strike out a portion of the first section of the bill; so as to leave a blank in which the names of the banks to be used as public depositories might be inserted. The effect of the amendment, if adopted, (and it was the only one he designed it to have,) would be to divest the Secretary of the Treasury of a power which it was not necessary, and it was therefore improper, that he should exercise. The amendment he proposed was in exact conformity to the recommendation of the President's message at the beginning of the present session, to which he would beg leave to call the attention of the House.

FEB. 10, 1835.]

[Here Mr. M. read the following paragraph from the message:

"The power of Congress to direct in what places the Treasurer shall keep the moneys in the treasury, and to impose restrictions upon the executive authority, in relation to their custody and removal, is unlimited, and its exercise will rather be courted than discouraged by those public officers and agents on whom rests the responsibility for their safety. It is desirable that as little power as possible should be left to the President or Secretary of the Treasury over these institutions; which, being thus freed from executive influence, and without a common head to direct their operations, would have neither the temptation nor the ability to interfere in the political conflicts of the country."]

If the House would consent to make the bill before it conform to the recommendation he had just read, he would give his vote for its passage. It was perfectly apparent, from the statements made by the chairman who had reported the bill, that the House had in its possession all the information necessary to enable it to make a judicious and safe selection of banks to be used as the depositories of the public money. The gentleman had exhibited a list to the House, of a number of banks, in which he stated the public money was now deposited, and in which he assured the House he had abundant evidence to show that it was perfectly safe, and of the ability of which to render all the services required by the Government he is entirely satisfied. Let the gentleman, then, propose to fill the blank, which would be created if his (Mr. M's) amendment prevailed, with the names of the banks in which the money of the Government is now deposited. Other gentlemen could propose the insertion of the names of other banks if they thought proper. The House would then have it in its power to fill the blank with the names of the banks now used as public depositories, and he had no doubt they would insert them all, unless it would be satisfied that some of them were not safe institutions. They could choose those which were safe, and leave out those, if any, the solvency of which appeared doubtful. It was so obvious that the House could make a safe and proper selection of banks, in which the deposits should be made, that he could not conceive of any well-founded objection which could be urged against the amendment he proposed. If the selection of the deposit banks is left to the Secretary of the Treasury, it would evidently be done as a matter of choice, not of necessity.

The danger of investing the Secretary of the Treasury, or any other officer of the Government, with unlimited power of selecting and changing the deposit banks at his pleasure, was great, obvious, and acknowledged. The President, in the portion of the message just read, warned us of the necessity of guarding against it, and he was gratified to find the bill under consideration had imposed a salutary restriction on the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to change the places of depositing the public money. But it gives, without any necessity for it, and contrary to the recommendation of the President, the power of selecting the deposit banks, in the first instance, to the Secretary of the Treasury. It was a dangerous power; and, without meaning to make any imputation against the present Secretary, he would affirm that this power of selecting the deposit banks might be used for improper purposes now, as readily as at any future time. We were on the eve of an election for the highest officer in the Government, the election of a President of the United States. Let us suppose (said Mr. M.) that that election is to be made, as he believed would be the case, between two candidates, (and he earnestly hoped there would be no other candidates in the field,) the one a man whose motto is "the spoils of the vanquished belong to the victors;" one who regards the patronage of the Government as a fund out of which the person possessing power is to reward the services of those who contributed to his election; one who is the acknowledged head of that party which acts upon the principle that all is fair in politics; and another man, of opposite principles; one whose motto is "honesty is the best policy;" one who maintains that the public patronage is never to be dispensed for any other purpose than that of securing the greatest possible benefit to the people; one who would rather sacrifice his life than purchase a vote for himself by the promise of conferring an office.

If, sir, the contest shall be between two such men as these, and if it shall turn out that the person who is to exercise the power of selecting the deposit banks is the friend of the former, and belongs to the political school in which the doctrine that all is fair in politics is taught, what is to be the effect of giving him the power with which this bill proposes to invest the Secretary of the Treasury? Will it not enable him to command the whole influence of all the banks in the Union, with their host of officers, their bank directors and debtors, in favor of the man whose election he wishes to promote? Will it not enable the Secretary to do, through the instrumentality of the State banks, all that the United States Bank is charged with having done, in influencing and controlling elections among the people?

Mr. M. said he hoped the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] would consent to act upon the same principle, and in the same spirit, he had recommended to others to act. He (Mr. M.) had consented to abstain from making any attempt to obtain the passage of a bill, in conformity to his own ideas, as to the most proper mode of disposing of the public deposits, from a knowledge of the fact that such a bill could not become a law of the land, and out of a disposition to pay a proper respect to the views of other branches of the Government. He hoped the gentleman who, from his situation as chairman of a committee, had charge of the bill before the House, would also consent to respect the known feelings and opinions of other branches of the Government, so far at least as to consent to an amendment which may perhaps ensure the passage of the bill; especially when that amendment is in conformity to the recommendation of the Chief Executive Magistrate, and not incompatible with any opinion expressed by the advocates of the bill.

Mr. M. said he felt no disposition to reply to any of the gentleman's [Mr. POLK's] remarks in reference to the alleged misconduct of the Bank of the United States. He should leave the defence of the bank entirely to its friends. He had never undertaken to advocate the cause of that institution. The business before the House was to make the bill for regulating the deposits in the State banks as perfect as possible, and he was disposed to lend all the assistance in his power to accomplish that end.

Mr. EWING said he rejoiced that, after having in vain endeavored at the last session of Congress to obtain the floor on the subject-matter of the present bill, he was now able to exercise that privilege. But at that period he should have gone more extensively into the subject than he now intended. Reflection had convinced the people, he believed, that the system contemplated by the provisions of this bill was founded in error; that its action would prove injurious to the great interests of the country, as well as to public liberty itself; and that a very brief examination would prove that many of the arguments by which it was attempted to be sustained on that floor were utterly fallacious. He viewed the system of State banks, thus linked, as unconstitutional; and, were it not so, he viewed the policy of the bill as in-jealous to the public interest, and indirectly arraigning the Secretary of the Treasury for a deliberate violation of the law. For if (said Mr. E.) the Secretary of the Treasury is justified by any law of the land, in exercising his present discretionary power over the people's money, it is evidently an act of supererogation now to make another law; inasmuch as it would only tend to lessen his responsibility, without materially lessening the discretionary power now exercised, and so far diminish the existing security of the public funds. If the present places of deposit selected by the Secretary of the Treasury be legal and secure, nothing more is required; and if not, this act will only increase the evil. If the great source of our national prosperity and revenue can exist without a uniform currency, founded on the credit and faith of the Union, then all the great statesmen and political economists of this nation who have preceded us were unworthy of the reputation they enjoyed. But can this be so? Where are the evidences by which such an idea can be sustained—evidence that can convince the public? Do the bill and arguments of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. Polk] afford such evidence? A bill giving the control of power specially granted to Congress by the constitution to executive officers, substituting a local State corporation currency beyond our control, and always subject to depreciation and loss, for a general and uniform currency subject to our control, and at all times equal, if not superior, to gold or silver. This ruinous change, too, is to be effected, accompanied with a cry that a specie currency is intended! which all know to be impracticable. One corporation monopoly under the control of Congress is a monster, while possibly one hundred issuing paper at will, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, are to be as innocent and harmless as lambs. Why, sir, (said Mr. E.,) when the security and protection provided by the constitution for the regulation of the currency shall be taken from the people and their representatives, and placed in the hands of the Executive, I can see no means by which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Polk] will be able to accomplish his avowed purpose. He says he wishes to limit and define the discretionary power of the President; but is it by usurping that power, and exercising it at his own discretion, which the constitution vests exclusively in Congress, that this is to be effected? Prudence pointed to the period when the charter of the present Bank of the United States would expire, as the proper time to provide that a substitute should go into operation. This fiscal agency should be of such a character as to regulate the currency, facilitate and secure a safe collection and disbursement of the public money, and promote the various interests of the country. That the constitution grants to Congress the powers of effecting these great public interests will not be denied; and that it is proper and necessary to exercise them, it is folly for the Treasury advocates to deny. The President recommended such a currency in his message to the 21st Congress; but he had never seen the sanction of the President for any such plan as that contemplated by the bill. The only State bank plan that the President ever recommended was one of mutual guaranty; but that is known to be utterly impracticable; and whether he then contemplated acquiring the power conferred on the Treasury, by the bill now before us, is a matter of no consequence. Mr. E. did not view the powers vested in Congress by the constitution as transferable to the Treasury or State bank corporations under any nominal guarantee. Still less did he view it expedient to disjoint the interest blended in a general currency, by sanctioning the local and conflicting interests to be created by the plan proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Polk.] He had now on his table a substitute for the bill, which, when in order, he should offer as an amendment, which carries out in detail the principle embraced in a resolution presented by him at the last session, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, but only reported on by implication. He would, however, leave that question to be discussed on its merits, (if time permitted,) and proceed to notice some of the arguments used by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Polk.]

In order to secure favor to his plan, the gentleman would impress a belief that the great loss of the people's money, formerly sustained when the deposits were made in State banks, was a misapprehension; that, up to the charter of the present bank, there were no losses known, and that the final loss was inconsiderable.

[Mr. Polk here rose and explained. He said, from the creation of the old Bank of the United States up to the establishment of the new, the loss to the Government was very inconsiderable.]

Mr. Ewing proceeded. He was incapable, he said, of doing the gentleman injustice. His explanation did not alter the fact he was about to argue from. He hoped the gentleman would exercise a little patience until he had concluded the argument on this point. The gentleman says the loss to the Government was inconsiderable. Perhaps he supposes that our Government consists of a unit, and as a unit it lost nothing; but he (Mr. E.) considered the three departments of our Government equally omnipotent in their spheres of action, and that the constitution and laws control all. The actual loss of the people's money, during that period, was nearly a million and a half of dollars. But that was only a trifle, compared to the loss sustained by our citizens in their various commercial transactions, and the loss of confidence essential to trade. The loss to trade and to the industry of the States are losses to the whole people; and, as ours is not a Government of party, but a Government of the whole people, all the losses and sacrifices inflicted on them are to be taken into the account. The estimate of these would show an enormous amount; but an accurate estimate is impossible. That no loss was discovered from the falling of the old to the establishment of the present Bank of the United States is accounted for by the fact that no settlement was demanded of them by any fiscal agent of the Government during that period; and their inability to refund the deposits could not be discovered till they were required to make a final settlement. It was then only that their insolvency could become known; and the amount of it, at that period, has been since lessened, and the accounts closed on the books of the Treasury, by compromises for property, which, in some instances, has been sold by the Government for one tenth of what it cost the nation. Such are the facts bearing on the delusive arguments the gentleman presents to influence the decision of the House and the opinions of the people. He desired all to consult better authority.

The ideal loss the gentleman estimates as being sustained by the country through the Bank of the United States, he would leave to be noticed by friends of that institution who were better acquainted with its transactions than he could be. But the loss to the aggregate wealth of the West, in the exchanges of trade under a local bank system; the delay, hazard, and inconvenience, to which the West will be subjected without a general currency of easy transmission; the loss of a bonus to the Treasury by the establishment of the plan he [Mr. Polk] contemplates, together with the uncertainty, trouble, and contention, which it must inevitably generate, are not to be overlooked; nor is the unconstitutional heresy, that the Executive should control the people's money, which (if he can control the Secretary of the Treasury) this bill would confer upon him, to be left out of the estimate of consequences. The present corporate Bank of the United States has been denounced as a monster, and stands at present condemned for interfering in politics; but what will the State corporations become when controlled by those politicians whose avowed creed and motto is to "reward their friends and punish their enemies?" They will certainly be indebted for the benefits they enjoy to the favor of the President—who has certainly too many favors at his disposal already; and, if we could not guard a bank under our own control from political influence, how can we restrain these State institutions from pursuing a similar course when they are entirely beyond our reach? The question is not now whether the bank, the monster, shall rule the country; it is now a question whether the present or any future President shall rule at his own discretion, and change the nature of the powers and restrictions prescribed by the constitution. Let it not be supposed by any (said Mr. E.) that, in the contrast he had drawn between one and one hundred monsters, he was the advocate of the existing bank. He was opposed to the granting of charters to any institutions created for individual gain as fiscal agents of the Government.

The institution he should propose has the constitution only for its charter; will be found conformable to that standard; and can be regulated by the people's representatives from time to time, in any particular, and for the benefit of all. The use of the people's money and the hypothecation of their faith should be solely for their profit and entirely under their control; and the amendment he contemplated would accomplish this desideratum, while it would be entirely free from all constitutional objections. He was aware that Washington and Madison, who signed the first and last bank charters, did not think corporate banking powers unconstitutional, nor as injurious to the rights of the people; but the matter has been again agitated by woful and oppressive experiments; and, although he would yield his assent to those acts brought into being by such men, yet, when a new fiscal agent has to be created, he could never consent to the establishment of any corporate monopoly, unless it be forced upon him as a choice of evils. The gentleman labors to force the necessity of such a choice; he keeps out of view every other experiment but that of the Treasury plan, and the existing corporate powers of the Bank of the United States. The one would lead to the relinquishment of the constitutional power of the people, the other has fallen beneath a long-continued denunciation, as well as from the jealousy of its power. He was not opposed to experiments—they lead to the acquisition of all knowledge—but he would not, after a fair trial, "buy the whistle too dear." The interest of the Union will not allow of it in relation to the currency, more particularly, as some men will not learn from their own experience: and the multitude are not allowed to learn; for their judgment is perverted by the few, who are mainly influenced by special gain.

He acquiesced in a large portion of the argument of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GORDON,] though he could not support his amendment. The subordinate officers of this Government, or any man rewarded with office, merely for party services, should never become the depositories of the people's money with his consent. That experiment would only extend the sinister speculations founded on party bias, already encouraged to a ruinous extent. With this brief exposition of his sentiments, he would await the opportunity to present his amendment, and express his views more at large.

[As soon as Mr. EWING took his seat, Mr. MOORE withdrew the amendment he had offered to the amendment of his colleague then pending, and thereupon Mr. EWING offered a new bill, of twenty-seven sections, as an amendment to that of Mr. GORDON. The CHAIR pronounced the amendment out of order, as it contained a clause making an appropriation to carry the bill into effect, which must pass first through Committee of the Whole. Mr. EWING then modified his amendment by striking out the section containing the appropriation, and thus continued:]

He now rose to remark briefly on the amendment or substitute sent to the table, and to move, before he resumed his seat, to refer it, with the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GORDON,] and also the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means, to a select committee to consist of one member from each State in the Union. He said that he adopted this course because the subject was one of deep, general, and vital importance to the whole country. Its effects will remain when the passions and parties of the present day shall have passed to the bourn of oblivion; and it should be presented to this House and discussed free of all party predilections. In addition to these considerations, its bearings cannot be fully developed in the House without a great loss of time; and, as a project arising out of the novelty and necessity of the present circumstances, the propriety of the course he contemplated was with him imperative. He said it originated in necessity, the parent of invention. We seldom (said Mr. E.) carry our thoughts beyond this impulse, as the progress of our institutions and the practice under them clearly prove. Having declared his opposition to the granting of charters to individuals, for the purpose of issuing a currency on the credit of the United States, and offered a resolution at the last session covering the same ground which the bill he sent to the table carries out in detail, he had studied to mature a plan in accordance with the supreme law, ensuring stability to the currency of the country, and divested of those objectionable points to which all corporations, whether of State or United States origin, are exposed. The specified powers of Congress, as laid down in the constitution, he contended were sovereign powers; and the prohibitions to the States, in relation to the currency, embraced in that instrument, demand, at the hands of the representatives of the people, some such institution as his amendment contemplated, and forbids the recognition of those established by the States. He would not occupy the time of the House now by reading the constitutional clauses to which he alluded—they were within the knowledge of all; and a uniform currency, to regulate commerce between the States, was so obviously essential to their equality and prosperity, that he would confine himself at present to the examination of some of the arguments he had heard urged against the establishment of any plan for issuing a general currency. The conduct of the present bank, and the abuses alleged against it, are not involved in this question; and the municipal concerns of the States, in their banking corporations, being beyond our control, were, in his view, equally foreign to the subject. He knew that the constitutionality of any national bank or institution for issuing a national currency has been questioned. But this is an exploded doctrine. It is the mode of obtaining, not the object to be obtained, that produces any acquiescence in such opinions; and even those who entertained them here, seeing the executive power accumulating, in the plan of the Committee of Ways and Means, while the great commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing interests of the country are left unprovided for, by the disjointed institutions established by the States, would not surely abandon the exercise of a power vested in Congress by the constitution, to increase the power of another department, which, through the aid of patronage, is already overwhelming. The constitution, as he read it, placed the Treasury, in all its bearings, under the control of Congress. And shall Congress be called upon to place the people's money, under the management of the Executive, in banks whose abuses they can only know through their own voluntary exhibitions? Bills of credit of the States at the present day might form a sort of general currency, but their issue is prohibited by the constitution. Surely they are not authorized to allow corporate associations to do what they are denied the power of doing themselves. He held that the name did not change the character of the issue, and that there is no practical distinction between bills of credit and notes of State corporations. The powers of Congress were granted not for local but for general purposes, and when they are not exercised for the general good, they must be abused. He contended for the power to create a bank; but it must be a bank to benefit the people whose power should be exercised in its creation. He viewed a specie currency impracticable, and operating as a severe tax upon the interior, in their commercial intercourse and exchanges with the seaboard, independent of its delay, hazard, and inconvenience. With equal privileges and equal rights, the people of the interior will not rest satisfied with any description of currency that shall operate as a tax or inconvenience exclusively on them. And between State bank paper, which must depreciate according to distance from the place of issue, and a promised specie currency, known to be impracticable, the certain advantages of the currency afforded by the bill he had offered must be obvious.

That bill, sir, (said Mr. E.,) will increase the capital, enlarge the resources, perform all the functions of a national bank, and afford all the facilities of exchange and transfer which the wants of the people and the Government absolutely require. It is evidently free from all valid constitutional objections; and, under the direction of responsible men, having no peculiar interest in the institution, excepting that which arises from their salaries, it cannot fail to be exempted from all political influence, other than that which may be directly imparted to it by Congress. The equality of rights and privileges under the bill proposed cannot be departed from; and if, from time to time, it should require amendment, no particular individual or party interest can be properly consulted. Indeed, the stock being inalienable in the States, the people will scarcely sanction any sinister changes. It were folly to assert that such an institution would be dangerous to liberty. It will belong to the people, be regulated and governed by them, and neither the Executive nor any other branch of the Government will exercise any permanent or paramount control over it. The good of the many will, by the establishment, be substituted for that of the few; the relative interest of the States cemented, the perpetuity of the Union secured, and an additional safeguard afforded for the equal rights and independence of the people. That the powers directly granted to Congress, to regulate the currency with a view to the general welfare, and the power to make all laws necessary to carry into effect such delegated powers, and all others, vested in the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof, are perfectly consistent with the features of my proposed amendment, I hold myself in readiness to demonstrate to the satisfaction of the committee contemplated to be appointed. He was sensible, if the committee be refused, this amendment cannot prevail, inasmuch as his hasty and superficial views will hardly be understood by the House. When he took his seat this morning, he had no suspicion that the subject would be called up to-day; and, unless a decided change of opinion be effected in both branches of the Legislature, (which is hardly to be expected,) a protracted discussion of the measure will operate a wanton waste of time, and have a tendency to defeat much legislation of the utmost importance to the country.

Entertaining these views, he should not have offered this amendment, nor said a word upon the subject, were it not that he stood pledged to his constituents to vindicate their interests, whenever the subject of the currency shall be agitated in Congress. And, on this occasion, he deemed it his duty to urge the proposition submitted by him, under a sincere conviction that their immediate and ultimate prosperity are deeply involved in the question now before the House.

Mr. E. then moved that the bill, with the amendments, be referred to a select committee, to consist of one member from each State of the Union.

Mr. BOON demanded the yeas and nays, but withdrew his motion; and the question being put, the commitment was negatived.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he had supposed that a bill so deeply interesting to the whole people of the United States as that under consideration would, in the regular course of proceeding, have been committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It was with no little surprise he perceived an effort made to carry it to its final passage, without affording to all the fullest opportunity of presenting their views. It was true, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had invited amendments, and more had already been offered than the House would, perhaps, be disposed to digest. Favoring, himself, the principle of that proposed by his colleague, [Mr. GORDON,] so far as it dispensed with the agency of banking corporations, and desirous of seeing that principle imbodyed into some practicable plan, he should move a commitment of the bill to the committee which had reported it, with instructions to report a plan to effect that object.

It would be recollected that, at an early period of the session, a gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GAMBLE] submitted a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for his opinion of the practicability of dispensing with bank agency; and, subsequently, requiring him to lay before the House the best plan he could devise for that purpose. Nothing could be more fair, more reasonable, than that the House should have been furnished with all the light which could be thrown on this subject by the officer whose situation best enabled him, and whose duty required him, to communicate it. Yet the resolutions had been vehemently opposed. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, as a reason for his opposition, averred that the necessary information was already furnished in a report made by the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. R. said he had read that document with great attention, but had been unable to find in it any such information. It contained a learned dissertation on political panics—whether designed for political effect, or to aid the House in its deliberations, he would leave it to the House to decide. It gave, too, a full history of the abuses imputed to the Bank of the United States. If the object be to inquire into these, to see how vigorously the Secretary had attacked an enemy already vanquished, you might look to this report. As valiantly as Shakspeare's redoubted hero fought—a full hour by the Shrewsbury clock—with the lifeless body of Hotspur, so long and so valiantly the Secretary contended with the dead monster, and “thrice he slew the slain.”

The report, it is true, contains a clear admission that banks are by no means necessary to the Government. But no other plan is proposed, no other alternative presented, than that contained in the bill. Adverting to the contingency of all banks ceasing to exist, or of their refusing to receive and manage the public deposits, the Secretary distinctly asserts the power of the Government to “proceed through personal agencies.” “It is admitted,” he says, “that it would be at some inconvenience, and some increase of expense, unless remedied in a manner that may be hereafter developed; and would not, in the opinion of this Department, and in the present condition of things, be so eligible a system as the present one. Because banks, though exposed to some dangers and evils, and though not believed to be necessary for the fiscal purposes of any Government, and much less of one in the present happy financial situation of ours, are frankly acknowledged to be, in many respects, a class of agents, economical, convenient, and useful." Granted they are more convenient, less expensive. But much inconvenience, much expense, ought to be encountered, rather than resort to this pernicious agency. Let us, then, have the Secretary's aid in devising such a plan. This was his sole object in submitting the motion to commit, that we might have such a plan, and compare it with the one now proposed. The chairman of the committee, he presumed, was on terms of confidential intercourse with the Secretary; it seemed, indeed, to be regarded by some as indispensable that the chairman of that and other committees should be on a confidential footing with those who presided over the executive departments. When it was recollected what an outcry was raised against all banks, what a horror was expressed against rags, by the friends of the administration, it could not be doubted that the head of the Treasury Department must have maturely reflected on this subject, and could at once present a scheme for effectuating what he had himself declared to be practicable. The chairman could report it without delay. As little delay would be occasioned by taking this course as by pressing the bill, with its various amendments, upon the House, in the mode now pursued.

The chairman of the committee seemed unwilling, however, to consider any other plan. He asserts that the system now proposed is no longer an experiment. If he date the system from the time of the removal of the deposits, sixteen months is too short a period to justify the assertion. It could scarcely be said to have been fairly begun, much less fairly tried. Strange would it have been if the favored banks, with every inducement to sustain their credit, aided by all the influence and power of the Government, political as well as pecuniary, should not have been able, for so brief a space, to keep their heads above water.

The chairman, he feared, had drawn rather too flattering a picture of the local banks. The calculations he had just made, apparently with a view of showing their superior fitness for fiscal purposes, did not seem altogether accurate. It was not necessary to examine them in detail. In alluding to the loss supposed to have been incurred by the Government from its connexion with the Bank of the United States, he had adverted to the occasional smallness of its dividends; but he had forgotten that this was perhaps fully compensated by the largeness of those dividends at other periods. He had forgotten to take into his estimate the great profit the Government might have realized by the sale of its stock; he had forgotten to mention the bonus paid by that bank, and the fact that none such was or could be expected from the State banks. He had forgotten that, throughout the whole period of its existence, we had never lost one dollar of the immense treasures we had deposited in its vaults, nor on account of the depreciation of its notes. Whether we had gained or lost, however, by that connexion, it seemed now unnecessary to examine. That bank was about to expire. It might, indeed, be regarded as dead—never, he trusted, to rise again. The true question was, whether the public money could be safely or properly managed in the mode now proposed.

If we cast our eyes back to the trials already made, we should have little reason to anticipate success. In the lapse of a few years we had lost a sum, now reported as unavailable funds, of upwards of a million of dollars, by using the State banks as fiscal agents, and receiving their notes; this, too, while they were used occasionally only. Adding interest, the sum would amount to somewhere about a million and a half, at the rate (taking the period at which it occurred) of eighty or one hundred thousand dollars per annum. The loss is spoken of in the report as a trivial affair; not more, it seems, than we had sustained from one or two mercantile firms. This was truly consolatory: it was a great consolation to know that there was nothing so bad in one branch of Treasury operations, but that there was something fully as bad in another; and nothing so bad in the Treasury, but that there was something, it was not to be doubted, still worse in the Post Office, or some other Department.

But all danger would be avoided by the provisions of the bill. He would briefly advert to some of these, not being prepared, nor indeed competent, to give them the full examination they deserved. In presenting the objections which occurred to his mind, he declared he had no wish to add to the embarrassment of the Treasury Department; still less to witness the public calamities incident to such embarrassment. He sincerely desired to adopt the best method that could be devised for managing the public funds without connecting the Government with moneyed corporations. If none such should be found practicable, without incurring greater evils than the plan proposed by the bill, he was ready, in good faith, to lend his humble aid in rendering that as guarded and as perfect as possible.

The selected banks, the bill provides, may be required to give collateral security. Will such security be exacted, or can it be obtained? Of forty-four now used by the Government, twenty-seven are employed on what are called "the usual terms." This vague expression is believed to import, not that they have given security, but have engaged to give it when required. The remaining seventeen are used "for deposit and payment only;" and these had neither given security, nor engaged to give it. The Bank of Virginia had been selected as a fiscal agent "on the usual terms;" but the stockholders subsequently rescinded the contract. Security would rarely be demanded unless danger was apprehended; when it should be considered necessary it would be too late to expect it.

There are two parties at least to every contract; but here the Government is to contract with fifty or sixty different corporations; to consult all their directors; their stockholders; the States which created or have an interest in them. The United States, it is understood, as a creditor, claims priority over all others. Will the States, the stockholders, the depositors, interested in any bank, consent to admit a customer who, in case of its inability to meet its engagements, will refuse to participate in the loss, and grasp all that is left.

Who were the parties, besides, he would ask, with whom contracts were to be made? Ephemeral existences, dependent in some instances on the will of the Legislatures creating them; liable to be cut off, prematurely, by legal prosecutions, or by the strong arm of Government; to be withered by the breath of suspicion; to be overthrown by a panic; liable, as the Secretary had forcibly observed, to a thousand accidents by flood and field. Even if permitted to die a natural death, two or three of those employed by the Government must, on an average, expire every year, and new ones be substituted, and new contracts made. Looking to their extinction, the vigilance of the Government must be constantly exerted in making a timely withdrawal of the public deposits; or, if left till the winding up, it may find, instead of its money, a right of action against insolvent debtors.

[Mr. ROBERTSON here gave way at the suggestion of

H. OF R.]

Deposit Banks.

Mr. WISE, of Virginia, who moved an adjournment; which was carried. When the subject came up next day, Mr. R. continued his remarks, as follows:]

Mr. ROBERTSON observed that he wished to correct a slight inadvertency into which he had fallen. Adverting to the number of banks employed by the Government, he had stated it to be forty-four. It seemed from the report of the Secretary it was but forty-two; and that, of these, sixteen, instead of seventeen, as he had supposed, were used as depositories of the public money, without having given security, or being under obligation to give it.

[Mr. POLK explained—that the banks alluded to had been mostly selected before the removal of the depositories; that they were not used as depositories for large sums, and were used for deposit and payment only.]

Mr. ROBERTSON resumed. The force of the objection is not impaired. The fact could not be denied that, in the cases alluded to, no collateral security had been obtained, nor even an agreement made to give it in future.

There was no limit to the discretionary power the Secretary had exerted, either as regarded the number of banks selected, or the amount deposited in them. This bill, too, expressly authorizes him henceforth to employ as many as he may think proper, provided there be not less than two at each of the principal points of collection. Under these indefinite terms may be included every custom-house (about one hundred) and every land office (about fifty) within the limits of the Union. It may be said that, at many of these, there are no banks. But let it be known that they could be employed as depositories, and they would spring up at every point of collection, ready to receive the public money, and to trade upon it as capital. He was unwilling to leave so vast a power in the discretion of the Secretary.

When we reflect that in the space of ten years we have lost by State banks upwards of a million of dollars; that in that time more than forty banks had stopped payment indebted to the Government, upwards of twenty of them banks selected as depositories; that nearly thirty (seven of them deposit banks) had failed in one year, and all of them during a period of profound peace, what might we not apprehend when the whole treasures of the Government should be constantly deposited in such institutions? Who could calculate the losses that may result from adverse circumstances, from over issues, from panics, more especially from war? an event at this moment considered by many as not improbable.

Among other difficulties that suggest themselves, is it not to be expected that collisions may arise between the selected banks and those excluded from Government patronage? There were already upwards of five hundred banks in the United States, wielding among them a capital of more than $200,000,000. Applications were daily presented from all quarters for an increase of banks and banking capital. Say that fifty or sixty are employed by the Government, will not the excluded banks, seeking to acquire a portion of its enormous patronage, or to protect themselves against it, enter into leagues and schemes to effect those objects? And will not the Government, in its own defence, be compelled to take part between these different sets of rival institutions—to endeavor, by all its power and influence, to sustain the one, and to cripple and control the other? Or must it withdraw its funds, and thus increase the embarrassment, perhaps effect the ruin, of those which had relied upon its power and its funds for protection? May not jealousies also arise, and contests ensue, among the favored banks themselves—complaints that some receive too large, and others too small, a slice of the Government loaf? To adjust these differences, to attend to these multiplied concerns, would indeed be an arduous task.

Again: should the Government require resources beyond its revenue, as in case of war it certainly would, he presumed it would seek for loans on the best terms they could be had. The millions necessary would probably be supplied by the excluded as well as the selected banks; and the incompatible duty may be thrown upon it of sustaining these two classes of rival institutions; the one accommodating it with loans, the other the depositories of its funds. To do this it must find out some new scheme; resembling, perhaps, the patent safety valve system of New York, and keep a locomotive plying from point to point to prevent explosions. Who is to conduct all this complex machinery? A Secretary of the Treasury! the incumbent of an office filled once in four years; perhaps, as he believed had happened, four times in one year. This officer was to become the manager of the new system; the head of what might be called the confederated banks of North America. The duties devolved by this bill upon the Treasury Department could not be well performed but by one whose life had been devoted to the science of banking. They would demand the information and the ability of a Baring or a Rothschild.

To aid the Secretary in the performance of his duties, the bill gives him power to inspect the banks in person, or by an agent. It would indeed be a humiliating spectacle to behold the head of the Treasury Department speeding over this extensive Union, from bank to bank, to overhale their accounts and count their specie. But the thing was obviously impossible. It must be done by agents. How important a trust to be confided to irresponsible individuals! What a door would it not open for stock jobbing, for intrigue, and management! The agent arrives; he visits the bank; he is seen to smile; up goes the price of stock: he frowns; the rumor gets abroad; a run is made upon the bank, and it stops payment!

More than half the whole revenue of the United States, derived from customs, is collected in New York; the residue unequally in the remaining States and Territories. Of the nine millions and upwards of nett revenue collected in New York in 1834, between three and four millions were required for disbursement in that State. The ratio of collections and disbursements necessarily varied in the different States, and must be different in different years. In the State of Virginia, during the same year, (1834,) the collections were $140,161 only; the expenditures $2,360,000, leaving a deficiency of collections to meet expenditures in that State of upwards of two millions. The bill ought to contain a provision for promptly transferring the surplus collected in New York, and other States, to those States where there was a deficiency. As this was conceded on all hands to be a hard-money Government, he hoped it would be transferred in specie; and that the people of the South might fill their purses with that beautiful coin of which they had heard so much and seen so little.

He must not harbor a suspicion that the State of New York, possessed as she was of great natural advantages, would desire more than her just share of the favors or benefits of the Government. The State he had the honor in part to represent repined not at the prosperity of any other. She rejoiced to see the blessings of the Union extensively diffused. She had, with that view, yielded up her vast western territory, and now beheld with pleasure on this floor the Representatives of the free and independent States into which it had been converted, and with which, he trusted, her generosity had laid the foundations of a friendship as durable as time. She wished all to participate in what was the common right of all, and would not believe that any would ask an undue share. The immense treasures of the Government, wherever collected, should be justly expended among the different members of the Union. If the revenues could not be kept down to the amount necessary to meet the proper expenses of the Government, some constitutional method should be devised for making a just disposition of the surplus. That surplus had been estimated, for a series of years to come, at about nine millions. The amount would necessarily depend on the continuance of what was termed the compromise, and the sincerity with which the friends of reform should endeavor to curtail the expenses of the Government. The present party, it would be recollected, had come into power denouncing the wasteful extravagance of Mr. Adams's administration. The charge had greatly contributed to the downfall of that administration. The retrenching party had now been in power six years; and, in that period, the expenses of the Government had been reduced from eleven or twelve down to twenty-two or twenty-three millions per annum. He did not think the extravagance of the general Government ought to be ascribed to the administration; though it was as justly imputable to the present as to the preceding one. The blame rested on Congress, which alone could authorize appropriations of the public money. He hoped the era of retrenchment was at length about to commence. A gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SPENCER] had called on the friends of the administration to redeem the pledges they had given. He thought there was no reason to apprehend, with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARRIS,] that they would not obey the call. The friends of the administration had not been deceived. They had been—he meant no disrespect to the members of the House—generously fed out of the public garner. He trusted the trumpet-call of the gentleman from North Carolina would again be sounded; and he pledged himself to unite with the friends of the administration in every effort to make this Government, what they said it should be, a hard-money Government; and to curtail the wasteful expenditures of the Government till they should even fall below the scale adopted during the extravagant administration of Mr. Adams.

Mr. R. said he was glad to find that the power of regulating the custody of the public money was distinctly conceded to be in Congress; and that the exercise of that power was courted by the Executive. Indeed, he did not understand the President, in his late message, as contending that it ever properly belonged to the Executive. If it truly and constitutionally belonged to the Executive, it could not, even with the consent of the President, be transferred to Congress; for Congress can exercise no executive power. If it be a legislative power, as seems now admitted, Congress alone could ever constitutionally exert it. This is the proper occasion to assert and maintain it; and to provide that the public treasure shall never again be controlled, except by the representatives of the people.

The chairman of the committee tells us this bill gives no power to the Secretary or the President over the public money. This is a mistake. It authorizes the Secretary, during the recess of Congress, to remove the deposits. It is true, it requires him to assign his reasons. So did the former law; yet, with the acknowledgment that the power of regulating the custody of the public money properly belonged to Congress, and with every reason to believe that they would not approve the act, he undertook to remove it. What he had done once he may do again; and it may be thought quite a sufficient reason to justify the act, that such is the will of him whose will is above the law.

Mr. R. said there were many objections to the bill which, in his desultory remarks, he had not noticed. He would, in conclusion, merely advert to the consequences, without meaning to discuss them, which, in a political view, might result from connecting the Government with numerous banking corporations. Would those interested in them dare to assert their political rights? Would they not be cautious, after what had occurred, how they ventured to find fault with executive measures? of being thought inimical to the administration? He dreaded, in this aspect, the operation of the system. We had experienced the advantage of separating the patronage of the Government from religion. He would rejoice to see it in like manner separated from moneyed corporations, and from the political press. The influence of religion, of money, of the press, over the human mind, was too tremendous to be wielded safely by any Government. Let the Government support the church, the banks, the press—the church, the banks, the press, will in turn support the Government in all its abuses. History testified to the truth of the proposition; and he could not but deprecate so dangerous a connexion. He should move, therefore, that the bill, with the proposed amendments, be committed to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report the best practicable plan of conducting the fiscal concerns of the Government without connecting it with moneyed corporations.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 11.

WASHINGTON AND BALTIMORE RAILROAD.

Mr. CHINN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill supplemental to an act entitled "An act to authorize the extension, construction, and use, of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad into and within the District of Columbia," passed December, 1829.

Mr. C., after stating that the bill merely altered, in some unessential particulars, as far as the public were concerned, the act already passed on the subject, moved that the bill be engrossed.

After a few words of explanation from Mr. MERCER, Mr. PARKER said all he knew about this bill was, that it contained four or five sections. He objected to any further action upon it until he had examined it.

Mr. McKIM was surprised, he said, that any one could for a moment entertain any hostility to this bill. He had no personal interest in its passage. He did not own a dollar in the stock of the company, and he never should, for he did not believe that the stock would ever yield any profit. He was authorized to say, by the president of the company, that, if no difficulty was interposed by the Government, the railroad would be completed on the 4th of July next. Mr. McK. explained the object of the bill, which, he said, proposed a change in the route of the road, which would be highly advantageous to the public.

The company had conferred with the authorities of this District in regard to the new route, and no objection whatever was made to it by them. The road would pass along the Tiber, through ground which was wholly worthless, for any purpose; and the depot was to be on the avenue, somewhere near Gadsby's hotel. The value of the ground was to be assessed, and paid for by the company. Unless the bill was passed, this great public work, on which the mail between this city and Baltimore was to be transported in two hours, must stop. He was surprised at the opposition to the bill manifested by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER said the gentleman ought not to be surprised that he should object to the hurried passage of a bill which he knew nothing about. He could not possibly be in favor of a bill which he did not understand. He wished to see the bill, and ascertain what it was. There was no probability that the work would be stopped if this bill did not pass this morning. All bills were on the same footing of emergency, and if we broke down the guards against precipitate legislation in regard to one bill, we might with equal propriety do the same thing as to all bills. While he said this, he entertained perfect confidence in the committee from which the bill was reported, but he could not take every measure upon the faith of the recommendation from a committee.

Mr. CHINN said that the public interest was in no way connected with this bill, and he hoped it would not be committed; if it was it would be lost.

Mr. PARKER moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till Monday; which was agreed to.

PUBLIC MONEYS.

Mr. GAMBLE moved to take up and consider a resolution heretofore offered by him, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for a plan for the keeping and disbursement of the public moneys without the agency of a bank or banks.

The motion being objected to,

Mr. GAMBLE moved to suspend the rule of the House, in order that he might attain his object; which was negatived.

CONSULAR CERTIFICATES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to define and further to provide punishment for the crime of forging or counterfeiting consular and other certificates and attestations; which was read twice; when

Mr. FOSTER moved its engrossment, after explaining that the bill was recommended by the Secretary of State, in consequence of a recent and very ingenious forgery, for which there was no provision in the present law.

After a few words from Mr. FILLMORE,

Mr. McKINLEY moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill till Monday; which was agreed to.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of that part of the President's message which relates to the extension of the judiciary system of the United States, and of the bill from the House of Representatives to amend the judicial system of the United States, it being manifest that the time to elapse before the constitutional termination of the present Congress is insufficient to mature and pass any law on the subject to which the message and bill refer.

Mr. FOSTER said this resolution was reported by a majority of the committee, and, as he dissented from it, he moved the following amendment to it:

Strike out all after the word "resolved," and insert, "That the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred that part of the President's message which relates to an extension of the judicial system of the United States, be instructed to report a bill by which the benefits of said system may be equally extended to all the States of the Union."

Mr. FOSTER said the committee had reported this resolution for their discharge from the consideration of the subject, on the ground that there was not sufficient time remaining for the House to act on the bill. He submitted that this reason was insufficient, as the committee, he thought, ought to obey the order of the House, and make their report; when it would be for the House to determine whether it would act or not upon the bill. In the next place, he thought the reason insufficient, because, in his opinion, the House had the necessary time for acting on the bill. The measure was not a new one. It was matured and understood, and it had once been thoroughly discussed in the Committee of the Whole. The time had arrived when every one must see that the South and West were as much entitled to the benefits of the circuit court system as the Eastern States. The only question was, whether we should enlarge the present circuits, or establish new ones; and that was a point on which the House could decide in one hour as well as in a year. The bill had been once reported, but could not be taken up, on account of some informality. It was recommitted in order to get rid of this objection, and now the committee refused again to report it. He hoped the committee would not be discharged.

Mr. HARDIN moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland, hoped, he said, that the gentleman would withdraw that motion, and permit the House to take a direct vote on the question whether the subject should be taken up for consideration at this session or not. He had not a word to say on the subject. Every member would judge whether, at this stage of the session, the House had time to take up and consider a bill remodelling the whole judiciary system of the United States.

Mr. HARDIN thought, he said, that an appropriate way to dispose of the subject would be to lay it on the table.

Mr. FOSTER asked whether, if the resolution was laid on the table, the committee, not having been discharged, would not be obliged to report the bill.

The SPEAKER replied, that to lay the resolution on the table would be considered as an indication, on the part of the House, that it would not expect the committee to report.

The motion to lay the subject on the table was then withdrawn, at the request of

Mr. GARLAND, who strongly opposed the proposition to discharge the committee. The subject, he said, had been presented to Congress as one demanding its attention in almost every message from the President for several years past; but it had always been postponed in consequence of the press of business. He asked whether it was denied or doubted by any member, whether the new States were entitled to the same privileges with the old States? Why could not the bill be reported? Would the committee be discharged on the presumption that the House would not act on the bill? He hoped the committee would report the bill, in order that it might be ascertained whether the House would refuse to do justice to the new States. Until the House had voted directly against the proposition, he would not believe that they were disposed to withhold from the West and Southwest the benefits of the circuit court system. If the resolution were laid on the table, that would be an indirect mode of expressing the opinion of the House. He hoped the House would not evade the question, but meet it by a direct vote, that it might be seen who were the members who were disposed to exclude the new States from a share in the advantages given by law to the old States.

Mr. McKINLEY felt, he said, as much solicitude as any one on this subject. It had long been before Congress, but he had never seen any disposition manifested to do any thing with it. He saw no hope of bringing the question to a proper result within the few weeks which would intervene between this and the close of the session—the expiration of this Congress. He was far from being satisfied with the bill before the committee; and, if they reported it, it would only take up the time of the House for nothing. He moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject till Tuesday next.

Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland, appealed to the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw that motion, and enable the House to act finally on the subject this morning.

Mr. WATMOUGH moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day; which was agreed to, 122 rising in the affirmative.

Mr. CROCKETT said he must throw himself on the indulgence of the House, to ask, what was no more than justice, that the House would take up a bill reported early in the session—

The CHAIR stated that the motion was out of order. By the vote of the House yesterday, all the bills were postponed till the bills embraced in the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] were disposed of.

DEPOSITE BANKS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate the public deposits of the United States in certain local banks.

Mr. ROBERTSON continued the argument commenced by him yesterday in opposition to the bill introduced by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said, it is with great reluctance, Mr. Speaker, that I differ with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] on this question, concurring as I do entirely in his principles, not only in relation to the Bank of the United States, but to the powers of our federal Government. I must, however, be pardoned, sir, for differing with that gentleman, in considering it my duty at this time to adopt some measure limiting executive discretion, and regulating in the best practicable manner, under existing circumstances, the deposits of the public money.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GORDON] has stated that, under this new system, New York has the "lion's share." It is true, sir, we have the lion's share, but not of the profits of your revenue system. Under our old laws, granting long credits, we enjoyed the use of the public money, and some millions of capital were employed for the purposes of trade; but under our modern plan of cash duties and short credits, we have the lion's share of the burden of advancing more than half of the whole of our revenue from imports, before it is possible to collect it from the trade of the country. It would, therefore, be manifestly unjust to withdraw from the banks in New York any portion of the public money faster than it may be required for the service of Government. But were such a measure proposed, would either of the gentlemen from Virginia ever advocate the transfer of our revenues from place to place merely for the uses of trade? Would they ever sanction, in any form, so manifest an abuse of the public money? I am sure they would vote for no such proposition. Gentlemen seem to think that New York is exclusively favored. She desires not, sir, that the public money should remain with her a day after it may be required for public use elsewhere; but, as she is compelled to advance the revenue to Government, she has a just right to expect that it will be withdrawn only for the service of Government, and not for the purpose of furnishing capital to facilitate trade in any quarter of the country.

It has, sir, suited the purposes of the advocates of a Bank of the United States, ever since the commencement of our Government, to represent the collection, safe keeping, distribution, and disbursement, of our national revenues, as a very mysterious and complicated affair. While trade annually collects, deposits, transfers, and disburses, its thousands of millions, it is gravely contended that this Government cannot manage its twenty or thirty millions without the agency of a national bank. Why, sir, if there was not an incorporated bank in the Union, there would be no difficulty whatever in the management of our finances, for other agents equally efficient would occupy their places; and I hope that the time will come when we shall be able to dispense with the agency of all banks, especially those of circulation. I am as little disposed as either of the gentlemen from Virginia to advocate the cause of State banks; but at the present moment there are two reasons for continuing the plan judiciously adopted by the Treasury. The State banks selected are the safest places of deposit for the public money; but the strongest motive which induces me at this time to advocate the system is, that by continuing to collect our revenue through these agents, we can make them instrumental in the great work which has been so successfully commenced, of reform in our currency, by aiding in excluding our small note circulation.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GORDON] has told us that the President has "possessed himself of the whole revenue of the country," and that "our rights and our liberties are in danger." The gentleman surely cannot have forgotten the act of March, 1809, referred to by the Secretary of the Treasury, under which all public moneys in the hands of disbursing officers are directed to be deposited in banks to be "designated for the purpose by the President of the United States;" an act which was not repealed even by the charter of the Bank of the United States, and which stands to this day the law of the land. Under that act, sir, continued for six-and-twenty years, our Presidents were authorized to control, so far as the mere question of deposit was concerned, some five hundred millions, for the use of our army, navy, and for other Government purposes. If there is any thing substantial in this argument about the union of the purse and the sword, or any abuse in the exercise of this control over the public money, the legislative and not the executive branch is responsible to the country for its origin.

[Mr. GORDON disclaimed having said any thing about the union of the purse and the sword.]

I know, sir, the gentleman did not use the words, but it was the inevitable inference from his argument.

But, Mr. Speaker, higher subjects have arisen out of the simple question whether our revenue should be deposited in one or another set of banks—questions of federal power and executive patronage. I had hoped, sir, for the sake of the public tranquillity, that after the violent storms of party through which we have so recently passed—in which our social ties were dissolved and even the strong bonds of friendship and affection broken—I had hoped that ambition would have been satisfied with the sacrifice, and that we should have at least enjoyed a temporary armistice. But it seems the war is to be renewed, and that after our triumphant victory in the general contest throughout the Union, we are to be involved in a guerilla warfare. Sir, let it come when it may, and in what form gentlemen please. We have but one favor to solicit from our antagonists. It is, that whatever may be the character of the war, whether local or general, it may be conducted in a more liberal, generous, and tolerant spirit, than has been exhibited by our public men in the late struggle for political ascendancy.

There are also some other preliminaries to be settled. Gentlemen may borrow our name or adopt our principles if they please. I do not now refer to the gentlemen from Virginia, who have always occupied democratic ground, but to their new allies. They must, however, pardon the friends of this administration for protesting against this novel and bold attempt, by an adroit movement, to take from them the ground which they have so long and successfully occupied, and suddenly to convert them into advocates of federal power and executive patronage. We have been denounced, sir, here and elsewhere, even by members of this body, as the supple instruments of the Executive, and as the partisans of power. And it is not a little singular that we have been most loudly condemned by those who have been zealously employed for twenty years in erecting here an enormous fabric of federal power, with all its abuses, corruptions, and patronage. And now sir, these architects of power suddenly turn about and denounce, as vassals of the President, the very men who have been instrumental in laying their great federal work in ruins. The gentleman from Virginia, too, [Mr. GORDON,] tells us that "a majority of the representatives of the people are seen rallying on the side of power." I appeal, sir, to the candor and the justice of that gentleman, who is an old member of this House, whether this is not the first House of Representatives in twenty years containing a majority of republicans faithful to the constitution. The time seems to have arrived, sir, when obedience to the will of our constituents is a proof of vassalage to power, and when to violate our instructions is a constitutional prerogative of the Representative, and a manly evidence of exclusive patriotism and independence!

But the fate of this House, sir, is moderate, when compared with the President's. He is the universal dispenser of patronage—the ambitious absorbent of all power. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GORDON] has charged him with executive usurpation. I again appeal, sir, to the candor of that gentleman, whether the whole history of his administration does not, in all its great measures, contradict the charge. When that distinguished man was first elevated to preside over the executive department of our Government, he found the broad banner of federalism—I care not for names, sir—floating over both of our legislative halls; he found every branch of this Government moving on in a harmonious career of usurpation. The President saw his position, between power on the one side, and the welfare of his country on the other. Had he abandoned the cause of those who placed him in that high station, he would have become at once the idol of every advocate of federal power throughout the Union. But, with the fidelity and patriotism of a great and honest man, he formed the bold resolution to grapple with wealth and power. It was under his administration that the great work of reform commenced. With a wise caution, he made his approaches gradually. He was the first President since the war who had the moral courage to encounter the hostility of our manufacturing corporations, by recommending an equalization of our taxes, and the reduction of our revenue to the measure of an economical public expenditure. Alarmed by these executive movements, sustained as they were by the people, the great architects of our restrictive system produced their celebrated compromise bill. Was the President an advocate of executive patronage when he voluntarily rejected this branch of it, and drew upon himself the vindictive hostility of our manufacturing corporations? Was he an advocate of federal power and patronage when he returned to the legislative branch the bill to recharter the Bank of the United States? To that very body from whence it emanated—to that Senate, now presenting itself to the nation as the stern and unyielding adversary of federal power and patronage—to those distinguished gentlemen, who are now most loud in denouncing executive patronage, and who appear to be most alarmed at the extent of it, and most shocked at the abominable abuses and corruptions of Government.

It depended on the President alone to determine whether federal power should continue to rest on this broad foundation, and whether the Executive should be armed with this monstrous engine of corruption and patronage. Had he decided on signing that bill, if he had not gained their support, he would have at least moderated the hostility of all concerned in the fate of that institution—of its thousands of presidents, directors, stockholders, officers, dependants, and customers, throughout the Union. Faithful to the constitution, this bold public servant rejected their petitions and the power proffered by the legislative branch, and drew upon himself a storm of abuse, unparalleled in the history of political warfare.

But again, sir—was the President an advocate of federal power and patronage when he returned bill after bill relating to internal improvements?—when he rejected these propositions of the legislative branch to arm the executive with a power spreading the engineers and the revenues of this Government into every State and every congressional district in the Union? Clothe the Executive with that power, give the President that patronage, and you revolutionize your Government; for he would effectually command a majority of this House. Yet he who has rejected these repeated propositions of both branches of the Legislature is now denounced as the great absorbent of power by the very men who projected this magnificent scheme of federal internal improvements!

The President, sir, has been instrumental in effecting a great reform of the corruptions and abuses of federal legislation. He has restored to trade, so far as this Government is concerned, its natural jurisdiction over banking and manufacturing, and to each community, the construction, regulation, and control, of its internal improvements. He has raised the States from a condition little better than provincial, and elevated our legislation above the concerns of trade, to the higher and more dignified offices of State. He has, in his public course, exhibited an extraordinary spectacle to the world. We have seen under his administration the Executive repeatedly rejecting the temptations of the legislative branch of our Government. Exercising a rare public virtue, and, contrary to the inherent tendency of executive power, he has sternly rejected measures calculated to enlarge his patronage, and to extend the sphere of executive dominion. Contrary to the anticipations of those who framed our constitution, the legislative branch, neglecting its duty, had ceased to be the vigilant sentinel of the Executive. On the other hand, through the firmness and integrity of the President, Congress has been arrested in a wild career of usurpation. He has given us, too, sir, another evidence of his patriotism. It is seldom that we shall see a man of military habits, and of martial character, when transferred to the highest civil station in our land, firmly resisting the encroachments of wealth and power, and rejecting, throughout his administration, a patronage which would have enabled him to rule the nation. We shall not often, sir, see a man of acknowledged martial propensities, steadily adhering to the democratic principles of earlier years, and never abandoning his great purpose of relieving his country from the despotism of a Government corrupted and controlled by avarice and ambition. He stands, sir, on a proud, a "great eminence, where the eyes of mankind are turned to him. He may live long, he may do much; but here is the summit."

It is at the close of this great reform that, from amidst the scattered ruins of federal power, we hear the accents of despair and doleful lamentations about the corruptions and abuses of our federal Government. We are told of the demoralizing effects of patronage; that our experiment is about to fail; that our Government ought not to be and will not be supported in some parts of the country; that our destiny as a free and united people is almost fulfilled; that the citadel of liberty totters to its base; and that reform or revolution is inevitable! Fortunately for our country, it is not very difficult to discriminate between the inspirations of the prophet and the wailings of ambition. Happily for our Union, the hopes of many generations of distinguished men are destined to perish in our political conflicts, before the time will arrive when the assaults of ambition can shake the strong foundations of our Republic.

I congratulate both the gentlemen from Virginia, Mr. Speaker, that some of our ancient adversaries seem to have abandoned their principles, and that we are all now to become the stern enemies of federal patronage and power; that for once we are to be united in a vigorous attempt to reform the abuses and corruptions of our Government. But, sir, gentlemen must pardon me; this is not merely a question of custom-house officers, pensioners, and postmasters; ambition should have a loftier aim: it should strike at the source of patronage and power, corruption and abuse; at that vicious system of legislation which was corrupting and breaking down the Government of our Union, and is now silently but inevitably revolutionizing every State Government in the land. We must go back, sir, to the origin of our Government fully to comprehend the nature of the evil, before we can understand the remedy. The origin of all our corruptions and abuses will be found in a vicious and corrupt system of legislation, adopted by Congress in 1789. There were among our public men of that day, Mr. Speaker, in reference to affairs of Government, two master minds: the one bold, able, and eloquent; the other profound, comprehensive, and original. These two distinguished men advocated opposite plans of Government. Hamilton adopted the ancient mercantile system of Europe, which had grown up under a monarchy, and was harmonious with despotic institutions. Jefferson was a disciple of a new school: he advocated a more simple and free plan of government, better adapted to develop and increase the resources of a nation, and entirely harmonious with the nature and design of our free institutions. Hamilton's plan was founded on avarice—Jefferson's on patriotism. The tendency of the former system was to universal corruption, dissension, and restriction; of the latter, to universal justice, harmony, and freedom. Habit and education favored the adoption of the ancient system, and to this origin may be ascribed all the vices, corruptions, and abuses, which have since grown up under State and federal legislation. Under this federal Government we persevered in it till it was about producing, what it must in time produce in every country where it is adopted, universal corruption, dissension and restriction. Another generation of such legislation would have destroyed our confederacy. Fortunately for the country, we have, under this administration, checked the vicious course of federal legislation. We have ceased to intermeddle with the concerns of trade in banking and manufacturing; we have given up to each community the construction and control of its roads and canals; and now, sir, relieved from these laborious and officious duties, with which we never had any legitimate or constitutional right to intermeddle, we have leisure to attend to those high offices of State which we have neglected ever since the adoption of the constitution. Instead of employing ourselves, session after session, in making tariffs, banks, roads, and canals, we can now make amends to the country for past negligence, and begin the work which should have been commenced in 1789. We leave our Post Office Department entirely isolated, unconnected with, and irresponsible to, any other Department of the Government; we allow it to collect and disburse its own revenue, without the agency of the Treasury or the authority of appropriation; to enlarge or contract its business and its engagements; we suffer it to grow up, from an insignificant beginning, till its receipts and disbursements amount to millions, and till our post routes have been extended from thousands to millions of miles; we leave the Department for more than forty years wholly unregulated and uncontrolled, and then wonder at abuses and corruptions, which have existed from its origin, and which can be ascribed to the negligence of the Legislature. We impose restriction on restriction on our foreign trade; enact hundreds of vexatious and useless commercial regulations, calling for the services of thousands of officers; and the very legislators who framed these absurd laws are now astonished at the result of their own labors, and are the most clamorous against custom-house officers and executive patronage. We abandon the high offices of State to manage the affairs of trade, and leave our land and Indian concerns to take care of themselves, and then are surprised that abuses should exist in these departments. Such, sir, are some of the consequences of acting upon what may be termed, on this side of the Atlantic, the Hamiltonian plan of government. We have done much to reform the abuses and corruptions flowing from it under federal legislation, but we have still more to do. Half of our absurd and useless commercial regulations should be repealed—the Post Office, Land Office, and Indian bureau, nay, every department of our Government, require investigation and organization.

But, sir, the reform must not stop with an inquiry into the corruptions and abuses of federal legislation. Our State Governments, some at least, if not all, have outstripped even this Government in a rapid career of vicious and corrupt legislation. We have spread over the country thousands of corporations in every branch of trade, and erected Government companies to disturb and rival the ancient and natural establishments of frugality and enterprise. We have introduced a spirit of gambling into every branch of trade, by giving these companies a credit not founded upon capital, but law, and have granted our chartered adventurers the privilege of bankruptcy without holding their property responsible to their honest, and, in some instances, ruined creditors. We have gone on from one absurdity to another, creating offices and salaries for the dependant relatives of the capitalists, till we have at last ascertained that the whale trade cannot be conducted without Government aid, and an act of incorporation! After having prosecuted this bold trade for more than a hundred years, with a courage and enterprise justly commanding the admiration and the wonder of the world, our wise legislators of this Hamiltonian school have at last discovered that Government whaling companies are absolutely necessary to enable us to conduct this branch of trade with economy and success. We have travelled through the whole circle of industry, and have given a political power to corporations, which, if this spirit be not arrested, will control every State Government, introduce gambling into every branch of trade, and pauperism into every county in the Union.

The credit of the State, too, is resorted to on every occasion, and for all purposes. Following our vicious example, the States have become stock-jobbers, money-brokers, and dealers in exchange. In some, they have made themselves partners in banking institutions of their own creation. In other States the banks are founded on borrowed capital, for which the credit of the State is pledged. Louisiana has recently become an endorser for two banks to the amount of seventeen millions—and even one of our Territories has followed this vicious example. We may soon expect to hear of Florida bonds on the royal exchange. The credit of the State should be sacred. It should never be used but for great public purposes, or in the emergencies of war. Legitimate commercial credit—that credit which is sound, because legislation has no agency in its creation, never would appeal to Government for its aid at any crisis. But in England and in this country we have authorized a species of bank credit, which cannot sustain itself in periods of alarm without producing universal distress; and Governments have been compelled to interpose, to save the country from mischiefs of legislative origin. Abolish your Government bank credits, and trade would never appeal to you for aid. The credit of the State would then be used, as it ought to be, only for the purposes of the State.

But, Mr. Speaker, the greatest and most alarming abuse now existing in this country is the incorporation of near 600 banks of circulation, with an aggregate capital of more than two hundred millions of dollars. It is to this point reform should be mainly directed; for until this legislative abuse is corrected, there can be no effective and permanent reform of the currency of this country. Banks of deposit, discount, transfer, and exchange, savings banks, and trust companies, are useful institutions for facilitating the operations of trade, giving velocity to the circulation of commercial credits, and securing the accumulations of labor and wealth. But these institutions are the natural creations of trade, and would have grown up in this age of commercial improvement in every civilized country, without the aid of Government, and through voluntary associations of capital, had not bankers been taught, by a vicious system, the habit of dependence upon Legislatures—had they not profited by the folly and injustice of Government, which granted to them the use and profits of a circulation, founded on law and on the authority of Government, at the expense of sound private credit, and the credit and currency of the State.

These banks of circulation are the offspring of law, and not of trade; and, like every legislative interference with the business of men, they produce incalculable mischief. Happy would it be for the country if the evil could be remedied by the suppression of small notes. This measure, so far as it may tend to diminish the quantity of circulation and to substitute a better currency, is advantageous; but if we stop there, we still leave the country exposed to the great calamities flowing from this abuse of legislation. We perpetuate, in another form, a vicious species of credit, to contend with and to impair sound commercial credit—a currency which can neither be regulated by Government nor controlled by the laws of trade, and a legislative standard of value which conflicts with the standard of the world.

Trade, sir, is destined to suffer at all times, and in all countries, from an inherent and universal tendency to speculation. Modern ingenuity has contrived a variety of commercial credits, which undoubtedly accelerate the circulation of national wealth but unfortunately increase disasters resulting from over-trading. Government, yielding to the selfish representations of avarice, has interposed its authority, and has rendered this existing and permanent evil truly calamitous, by aiding in the circulation of a credit which trade, if left to itself, would never tolerate. On what basis, sir, does this Government bank credit rest? Departing from every rule established by trade for regulating and sustaining private credit, our Legislatures have incorporated banking institutions throughout the country, and, in most cases, have authorized them to loan their whole capital, and to issue twice that amount, and in some instances more, in notes payable in specie on demand. What capitalist, sir, whether possessing one hundred thousand or ten millions of dollars, who traded on such principles, could ever keep his notes in circulation, whether promising to pay specie or not? The public could have no confidence in an adventurer whose speculative spirit would tempt him to risk suspending payment, whenever commercial confidence should be impaired, from any cause whatever. Such is the solid foundation of that credit which is patronised by the State. Government can do what trade finds impracticable: it can give currency to a species of credit which, without the aid of its authority, would never be entitled to public confidence. It gives circulation all over the Union to the notes of hundreds of small banks in the interior, trading in some instances to the full extent of legislative liberality. When we see those institutions spread over the land, founded upon a basis so speculative and absurd, forcing by every possible means their notes into circulation, promising impossibilities, can we be surprised at panics, and commercial alarms, and embarrassments? If every bank in the Union could avail itself of this generous legislation, we should have some hundreds of millions of circulation, attended with annual and universal bankruptcy. We are happily saved from such a calamity by the salutary power of the laws of trade, which counteract the folly of legislation. But the power of trade is limited; it cannot control the circulations of the small banks in the interior, and it is that paper with which this country is destined to be flooded, if this monstrous abuse of legislation be not corrected. It is time, sir, for our capitalists on the Atlantic and Gulf of Mexico to reflect whether it would not be best to part with their share of this legislative patronage, and to give their aid in saving the country from the disasters incident to such a currency. It is worthy of the inquiry of every State Legislature in the Union, whether the evils resulting from a bank note circulation do not greatly overbalance all its convenience as a currency. But if, sir, this currency is to be perpetuated in defiance of our constitution—if we mean to persist in a course of legislation as vicious as it is unjust—we owe it to the country, at least, to protect trade and labor from the effects of this abominable legislative abuse. If we will have Government banks, we ought certainly to require that they should never abandon the prudent rules of trade. We must either limit their dividends, or restrict their circulation to one fourth, or at most one third the amount of their capital. Without these restrictions, no matter what examinations, what guards, or what proportion of specie may be required, trade is destined for ever to suffer from panics and alarms of legislative origin; and a suffering community will contribute an annuity of millions to those who are authorized to abuse the credit of the State—to the very authors of their embarrassments.

What reform, sir, of the currency can we accomplish while we have four-and-twenty Legislatures, besides our Territorial Councils, authorizing their banks to issue some three or four hundred millions of notes redeemable in specie, when every bank charter in the Union is essentially an act to prohibit the importation of specie into the United States? This contest between our constitution and State legislation, between a metallic and a paper currency, ought not to be, and will not be, tolerated by the democracy of this Union, who are resolved to carry out the principles of this administration, and firmly to adhere to the constitution of their country. It is unworthy the dignity of legislation to recognise the quibbling distinction between bank notes and bills of credit. The former are essentially bills of credit, issued under authority of the State, and bills of the most mischievous character. If we do not abandon this legislative abuse, we may surrender all hope of reforming the currency.

The great experiment, Mr. Speaker, attempted in this country, and on the other side of the Atlantic, to substitute paper for that ancient standard which has been adopted by the world, and has continued to measure the value of property for thousands of years, will be found, in the end, as visionary in principle as it is disastrous to nations. No nation can establish its own independent paper standard, without subjecting property to the fluctuation of the currency.

tuations not only of its foreign trade, but to the vicissitudes of internal banking. The former regulating the quantity of the world's standard, the latter of your own, you have, in spite of all your contrivances, two standards, which are perpetually coming in conflict. When we succeed temporarily, as we sometimes do under this system, in banishing our metallic currency, we part with the only salutary regulator which trade has to correct excessive speculation. When we have a specie circulation, over-trading sends it abroad, speculation is soon checked, and it returns with the ebb of trade. The operation of a paper circulation is directly the reverse. Instead of diminishing, paper increases with over-trading; banks and trade mutually stimulate each other to excess; they continue on in a wild career, till an enormous expansion of credits of all kinds raises the value of the whole property of the nation far above the standard of the world; then it is that your paper standard suddenly falls in its legislative office, and property violently falls even below the standard of the world. The interior portions of a country may escape some of the violence of the shock; but where your legislation comes in contact with the world's law—where paper encounters specie—there will the shock be felt in all its severity. The experiment making in this country and in England cannot succeed. No legislative contrivance of any one country can conquer the eternal legislation of the globe. And whatever nation may undertake to follow the example of England, and make the experiment, must expect to share her fate; for a bank-note standard, no matter what may be the size of the notes, ceases to act as a measure of value at the point where speculation is suddenly arrested by alarm or panic, and the ancient standard of nations becomes at once the only and triumphant regulator of the value of property. Amidst these convulsive shocks, the capitalist may escape, but the fortunes of trade will be shattered; ruin will spread through the land, and thousands, nay, millions, will be added to the ranks of pauperism. Such is the result of this great experiment to establish an independent standard for the value of property; and such will be the melancholy history of trade in every country where it is the permanent policy of Government to sacrifice the welfare of millions, by granting annuities to privileged bankers, and by authorizing them to circulate and abuse what is essentially the credit of the State.

And what great public considerations are there for inflicting on our country a currency fraught with such calamities? None, sir, but the imaginary creations of those who would govern nations by legislative contrivance. Falsely alarmed at the rapid diminution of the precious metals, Governments have actually employed agents to travel from nation to nation to ascertain the quantity of specie in each country, and to compare the amount in circulation in different ages of the world. It must have relieved their apprehensions to learn that we have only from three to five thousand millions of current coin, and from seven to ten thousand millions of coin, bullion, and plate! Again, sir, the increased trade of the world requires, it is said, a larger quantity of circulation. And are we to be told, in this age of confidence and improvement, when modern ingenuity has multiplied and extended commercial credits in forms which never existed in earlier ages—when the great mass of the transactions of trade throughout the world, whether between nations or in communities, is carried on without the agency of bank notes or the precious metals—when trade is enabled by its own ingenuity almost to dispense with the aid of currency in all its great operations—are we now to be told that the quantity of current coin in the world is not sufficient to supply the wants of commerce? I trust the alarmed advocates of a paper currency will dismiss their apprehensions, when they learn that trade creates its own agent, (circulation,) and that it is constantly employed in supplying itself with all it requires, without any legislative aid.

Our modern statesmen, of this legislative school, have pushed their inquiries so far that you can scarcely take up a report on finance, in any country, without finding its author bewildered amidst the speculations of this absurd system. You will find in almost all of them some grave discussion about exchanges and the quantity of currency necessary for the circulation of the country: questions, sir, with which Governments have no concern; but which belong exclusively to trade. Government regulates the value, trade the quantity, of currency; and would, if left to itself, perform the office better than all your laws. Why, sir, there is appended even to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the question before us, a statistical table of the quantity of circulation (paper and metallic) in each country, according to its population. Why not, sir—for it would have been equally useful and proper—why not append tables of the countless millions of other circulations: of bills of exchange, notes of hand, orders, transfers, bank drafts, checks, letters of credit, and commercial credits in every form? Why not give us the aggregate of these great substitutes of modern invention for currency and bank-note circulations? If Government had any concern at all in the matter, the inquiry is infinitely more important; for, instead of one hundred millions, these circulations, the creations of trade itself, amount in the aggregate to thousands of millions. The financiers of this ancient school, sir, might as well push their inquiries one step further, and require from our merchants statements of the amount of transfers in their ledgers! There is no inquiry too extravagant for a system founded in absurdity.

But we are told we must submit, sir, because it is impossible for trade to dispense with the use of bank notes. The commercial world moved on without them for some thousands of years, it is true, and even now but a small portion of mankind actually employ them for commercial purposes; and yet the United States cannot dispense with them. But again, we hear of the ruin which would follow if you attempt to withdraw from circulation your Government bank notes! Trade, sir, withdraws, in every year between the seasons of issue and redemption, in every part of this Union, and without the slightest inconvenience to itself, commercial credits—in other words, its notes and other obligations—to an amount infinitely beyond the whole metallic and paper circulation of the country; and yet our banks cannot follow its example, and pay their debts; they cannot withdraw some seventy or eighty millions from an aggregate of commercial credits amounting to thousands of millions, without ruining the country. Sir, if our Legislatures will borrow wisdom from the laws of trade, and our merchants will not permit themselves to be duped, as they were last winter, your Government bank credits may be withdrawn at the same seasons that other commercial credits are cancelled, when the demand for money and credit ceases. And, sir, when the season of activity returns, these circulations, the offspring of trade and not of legislation, will reappear in another and a legitimate form, which will never interfere with the currency of the country. But why, after all, it is asked, should we dispense with a currency so economical, and which saves so much interest upon idle capital annually, which would otherwise be lost to the nation? Sir, of what consequence is it to the nation to secure in perpetuity to our privileged bankers these millions saved? Can any such miserable consideration ever indemnify the country for the countless millions wasted in every revulsion—for the ruin and misery spread over the land?

Mr. Speaker, with great deference to the distinguished but enthusiastic writers in favor of this modern imposture on mankind, I must at least be pardoned for hoping that the day will arrive when the thousands of speeches, essays, reviews, pamphlets, and volumes, which have appeared in favor of this bank-note standard, will be banished from the halls of legislation in every enlightened and free land, to those more appropriate theatres, the humane but melancholy receptacles of broken minds. I hope, sir, the time is not distant when those who are intrusted with the high office of legislation throughout this Union will learn that banking, in all its branches, is exclusively an affair of trade, and that currency is a concern of Government alone; that neither should ever be permitted to interfere with the province of the other, and that each should be rigidly confined to the jurisdiction assigned it by the constitution.

It is, Mr. Speaker, to this paramount abuse of Government that the attention of the American people should now be directed; and while we vigilantly superintend the conduct of our public officers, whether State or Federal, let us also examine our own unconstitutional usurpations, and thoroughly expose a legislative abuse, calculated in the end to destroy the morals and prosperity of all, and to revolutionize the character of our people and the nature of our Government.

Sir, if these abuses be persisted in; if corporations are to be multiplied throughout the land; if the credit of the State is to be abused for banking purposes, and the dignity of Government degraded by partnerships in trade; if a perpetual annuity of millions is to be thus indirectly collected for the benefit of banks established under the authority of Government—then may we anticipate, before many generations shall have passed away, the thorough corruption and revolution of every Government in the Union. Perpetuate these legislative abuses, and the time is not distant when your Representatives will volunteer their services to your thousands of powerful corporations, and when avarice will control every Legislature in the land. Whatever controls your laws governs your country. You will be ruled by avarice—that “domineering, paramount evil,” to which “there is a natural allegiance and fealty due from all the vassal vices, which acknowledge its superiority and readily militate under its banners.” Your Hamiltonian plan of legislation will then exhibit its revolting results: your Government will be founded upon wealth, your people ruled by legislative corruption and despotism.

Thus far, sir, the cause of reform has been triumphant. We have in six years accomplished much; but we have now to encounter a more formidable antagonist, sustained, in a measure, by deep-rooted prejudice, and by the abuses of State legislation. While this great work of reforming our currency and our legislative abuses is not to be accomplished in a day, it is not to be postponed from any false alarms, or from any unfounded apprehension of its impracticability. I have witnessed, sir, in my limited term of public service, many revolutions equally important and less to be anticipated. Who would have believed in 1829 that, in less than six years, reform would have prostrated such powerful antagonists as the Bank of the United States, our manufacturing corporations, and our federal system of internal improvements? What man is there, sir, with the remotest chance of success in the presidential contest, who would dare to avow himself the advocate of these exploded doctrines? Why, sir, in 1829, I had the honor of presenting to this House a measure offering commercial reciprocity to all nations—a measure far better than the one subsequently adopted; for it would have reformed, not only our tariff, but the commercial restrictions of other nations; but when I reported that bill, proposing a reciprocal maximum duty of thirty per cent. on the foreign value, it was instantly and indignantly rejected on its second reading. But, sir, what did we see in the short term of four years from that date? The very same gentlemen, who were so astonished and indignant in 1829, recording their votes for a measure which swept away the whole system from our laws, without the consolation of securing foreign reciprocity! They voted for a measure reducing the duties to a maximum of twenty per cent. on the home value. On this bank question, too, how many of us have repudiated our opinions—how many are there who, two years ago, were the vigorous advocates of some Bank of the United States; who could not imagine it possible to manage our finances without one, and who would now be the last to advocate the incorporation of any such institution? Have we not reason to hope that, in two years more, some of the warmest advocates of our State bank circulation will be satisfied that it is a legislative abuse, and unite with us in demanding its reform?

Nor, Mr. Speaker, are the advocates of reform to be intimidated by the denunciations of distinguished men, whether in the North or in the South. I regret, sir, that a gentleman for whom I have personally always entertained the highest respect, should have denounced the reformers of this country, who constitute, in fact, the great body of the American people, as agrarians. I regret to learn, from a professed advocate of commercial freedom, that “the unbalanced democracy of the Middle and some of the Northern States will pass, by a rapid transition, from anarchy to despotism.” That, sir, can never be the fate of the unbalanced democracy, in any portion of this Union, while they enjoy the right of suffrage and universal toleration. But are we to be told in this enlightened age, and that, too, by a distinguished man, that the principles contended for by the democracy of this country are agrarian—leading to anarchy and despotism? The cause, sir, of commercial freedom, internal and external, is the cause of universal freedom, of civil liberty, of natural rights, of morals, of religion, of every thing that sustains a rational, just, and stable Government. It is on these grounds that commercial freedom has been advocated for a century by the most illustrious philanthropists and statesmen on both sides of the Atlantic.

Were Franklin and Jefferson agrarians, sir? Was Adam Smith an agrarian?—that great founder of the system of commercial freedom, who was the first to embody and explain, for practical use, the theories of earlier writers—the illustrious advocate of that external freedom of trade which, as described by an ancient writer, enables us “to taste the spices of Arabia without feeling the scorching sun that brings them forth; to shine in silks which our hands have never wrought; to drink of vineyards which we never planted; to use the treasures of those mines in which we never digged; to plough the deep and reap the harvest of every country in the world.”

The author of the Wealth of Nations was one of those great men of the last century who dared “to assume the responsibility” and to encounter boldly the rapacious and vindictive spirit of avarice. In defiance of its hostility, he published to the world, in the very same year which gave birth to our declaration of independence, a plan of government admirably adapted to the free institutions of our country—the only one that can make us what we then declared ourselves to be—a free, equal, and independent people. The author of that great work perfectly understood the character and power of his adversaries, and anticipated the storm he was about to draw upon himself. “To attempt,” he says, “to reduce the army, would be as dangerous as it has now become to attempt to diminish in any respect the monopoly which our manufacturers have obtained against us. This monopoly has so much increased the number of some particular tribes of them, that, like an overgrown standing army, they have become formidable to the Government, and, upon many occasions, intimidate the Legislature. The member of Parliament who supports every proposal for strengthening this monopoly is sure to acquire not only the reputation of understanding trade, but great popularity and influence with an order of men whose numbers and wealth render them of great importance. If he opposes them, on the contrary; and still more, if he has authority enough to be able to thwart them, neither the most acknowledged probity, nor the highest rank, nor the greatest public services, can protect him from the most infamous abuse and detraction, from personal insults, nor, sometimes, from real danger, arising from the insolent outrage of furious and disappointed monopolists." Such was the language of this eminent writer of the last century. How admirably has he described the conduct, position, and fate, of our Chief Magistrate, during the assaults of the last winter, occasioned by the downfall of the bank! Our State Government banks are now in the position which was occupied by the manufacturers of Great Britain in 1776, and our own in 1828: they are struggling to perpetuate laws similar to those which, in the language of Adam Smith, "the clamor of British merchants and manufacturers, in 1776, had extorted from the Legislature for the support of their own absurd and oppressive monopolies."

Was William Pitt an agrarian, sir? I believe he has never been claimed as such on either side of the Atlantic; and yet he ranks among the ablest of the disciples of Adam Smith. He commenced his ministry by waging an unsparring war against a legislative fabric, the work of centuries. He swept this ancient lumber from the statute book, and, in defiance of all the prejudices of his countrymen, and the clamors of the monopolists, he made his commercial treaty with France. In a celebrated speech of his in 1792, on public income and expenditure, at the very time when Hamilton was fastening for ever, as he supposed, this ancient mercantile system upon his country—at that very moment was Pitt disclaiming it altogether, and eulogizing the illustrious author of the Wealth of Nations. He congratulated England on her unparalleled prosperity, on her vast accumulation of capital, which was acting "with a velocity continually accelerated," and which nothing could stop but "some public calamity, or some mistaken and mischievous policy." He disdained to ascribe any portion of the national prosperity to legislative contrivance or interference. He attributed it to "the first and most obvious cause, the natural industry and energy of the country"—to improvement, invention, commercial credit and enterprise; to peace, internal tranquillity; and last, but not least, to that "union of liberty with law, which, by raising a barrier equally firm against the encroachments of power and the violence of popular commotion, affords to property its just security, produces the exertion of genius and labor, the extent and solidity of credit, the circulation and increase of capital, which forms and upholds the national character, and sets in motion all the springs which actuate the great mass of the community through all its various descriptions. The laborious industry of those useful and extensive classes, (who would, he trusted, be in a peculiar degree the object of the consideration of the House,) the peasantry and yeomanry of the country; the skill and ingenuity of the artificer; the experiments and improvements of the wealthy proprietor of land; the bold speculations and successful adventures of the opulent merchant and enterprising manufacturer; these are all to be traced to the same source, and all derive from hence both their encouragement and their reward." Such were the doctrines of Pitt, till revolutionary France declared war against England. Amidst the convulsions of that war he abandoned his principles—undertook to manage and control the concerns of the Bank of England, and, with a rash judgment, brought upon his country calamities which she will never cease to feel till Parliament terminates the war which Great Britain is waging against the currency and standard of the world.

Next in the agrarian ranks stands an illustrious man. Though not perhaps equal to Pitt as a practical statesman, of a superior order of mind; the most profound, original, and eloquent of political philosophers—I mean, sir, that celebrated statesman, Edmund Burke. No writer has denounced the abuses of legislation with greater ability, or more just severity. He disposes of your tariff-mongers with the harsh but well-merited sarcasm, that "a teasing custom-house and a multiplicity of perplexing regulations ever have and ever will appear the masterpiece of finance to men of narrow views." He disclaims this interference of Government with the concerns of men, as unworthy the dignity of statesmen. "The State ought," he says, "to confine itself to what regards the State"—"statesmen who know themselves will, with the dignity which belongs to wisdom, proceed only in this, the superior orb, steadily, vigilantly, severely, courageously; whatever remains will, in a manner, provide for itself. But as they descend from a State to a province, from a province to a parish, and from a parish to a private house, they go on accelerated in their fall." When Government, he says, "will not trust to the activity of avarice in pursuit of its own gains; when it secures public robbery by all the careful jealousy and attention with which it ought to protect property from such violence; the commonwealth, then, is become totally perverted from its purposes: neither God nor man will long endure it; nor will it endure itself." Such were the doctrines of Edmund Burke, the most eloquent and able advocate of natural rights, till, startled by the bloody spectres of the French Revolution, the powers of his great mind gave way; he abandoned the cause of mankind, and, trembling with fear, clung still closer to the throne, as to a rock of safety.

Such, sir, were some of the illustrious men of the last century, who laid the foundation of a great modern reform in Government. The spirit of our age cannot be mistaken—reform or revolution must ultimately be the fate of every enlightened country. There is a tide in the affairs of nations as well as of men, a slow but steady current setting against ancient, vast, and accumulated encroachments of wealth and power. War, calamity, or disunion, may occasionally interrupt it for a time; but it is destined to flow on for ages, till reform shall have corrected the abuses and corruptions of enlightened Governments, secured to men their natural rights, and to nations internal and external tranquillity. In this country we are contending against legislative abuses, privileges, and monopolies, of comparatively recent origin. In England reform has a more formidable antagonist to encounter—the venerable fabric of ages, founded upon a mighty ruin of violated rights. The struggle will be severe, the contest long, the civil revolution may go on in peace, as I trust it will; but let stern and unrelenting power beware of the consequences of too stubborn an adherence to its usurpations; let it not attempt violently to resist the modern spirit of freedom and reform, lest, in a great and tumultuous conflict, as in France, "ancient rights and prescriptive authority" should be swept away in a torrent of blood.

France, too, with her 3,600,000 national guard, and her 32,000,000 of population, cannot long submit to be governed by 160,000 privileged voters. Spain and Portugal are agitated, Germany is in a feverish condition, and unhappy Poland already ripe for revolution. It may be ages before the light of freedom will dawn upon the boor, the Cosac, the Calmuc, or the Tartar—it may never shine upon the benighted followers of oriental prophets—the anticipations of the philanthropist and the statesman may never be realized; but, sir, while the civilized world enjoys the liberty of the press, the right of suffrage, and universal toleration, the hope never will be relinquished, that the time will come when the enlightened nations of Europe and America will enjoy universal harmony, justice, and freedom. While reform moves on, guided by the intelligence of an age illustrious for discovery and improvement, spreading rapidly through the medium of the press from nation to nation, the hope never will be abandoned that, in some future age, the productions of the world will contribute freely to supply the wants of the world; that confederate nations will establish a code of public law founded on the principles of universal justice, and that the civilized world will enjoy, in peaceful and unrestricted intercourse, the countless and immeasurable blessings of free, equal, and just Governments.

When Mr. CAMERON sat down, Mr. CLAYTON, of Georgia, rose and said: Mr. Speaker, I have two objects in wishing to address the House upon the question under debate; the first is to justify myself against a calumny, and the other is to defend my vote against inconsistency. I am accused abroad, and, what is worse, at home too, of being bank-bought. This is the charge against every man who dares to exercise the least liberality of sentiment or independence of opinion; and, to use a familiar phrase, if he does not walk the chalks exactly as they are drawn, he is every thing but an honest man. He is accused of bribery, speculation, assassination, corruption, fraud, lying, deceit, and indeed every species of meanness.

Mr. Speaker, if the world believed every thing that is said of public characters in America, they must consider Congress as a den of petty rogues, and the nation as a province of polished pickpockets. Let me, for the amusement of the House, present them with a true picture of their character, as portrayed by the public journals of the country, those faithful registers of all sorts of information, those truthful reflectors of public morals, and not less charitable memorials of private character. And to this end I would ask you to go with me, in your imagination, to Europe, to a large reading-room, for instance, in London. Suppose a large collection of people assembled in that place, and, as is not unfrequently the case, one more bold than the rest calls the attention of the crowd to some interesting extracts from a North American paper, just from the seat of Government of that great Republic, that land of liberty, of equal laws, of pure institutions, and whose glorious traits every 4th of July celebration "rings through the world with loud applause." He reads:

Extract from a fourth of July oration.

"Here, in this land of liberty, the oppressed of all nations, fleeing from the tyranny of the old world, may find an asylum in the purity of our Government, the sanctity of its principles, the patriotism of its statesmen, and a certain protection in the equality of its laws."

A toast on that occasion.

"The American States—confederated upon principles of liberty, justice, and equality, present a sacred refuge to all who shall fly from the force, the follies, and the frauds, of priest-ridden Europe."

The assembly all cry out, "glorious people! Magnanimous nation! Happy Government!" But stop, says the reader, let us see what this is on the other side. He reads:

Extract from the President's letter to one of his Secretaries.

"The deposits must be removed before Congress meets, or the bank will raise enough of the members to prevent it."

Extract from the Government press.

"Senators Clay and Webster are the feed lawyers of the bank, and hence their great exertions in its behalf."

From the same.

"Senator Calhoun instigated the ASSASSINATION of the President."

From the same.

"Senator Tipton has valuable lands on the Wabash, and hence he is trying to get an appropriation to improve the navigation of the latter, with a view to improve the value of the former."

Extract from a letter of a Washington correspondent.

"Senator Webster gets a fee of $5,000 to aid in passing a bill to pay off the French claims."

From the same.

"Governor Tazewell, of Virginia, pure and immaculate as he is considered, has received $50,000 from the United States Bank."

From the same.

"Representative A. S. Clayton, who was so violent against the bank, has received an accommodation from that institution, and it has glued his tongue to the roof of his mouth."

Was there ever such a set of cut-throats! cries one. What a Botany Bay set of scoundrels! says another. Nothing better, says a third, could be expected from the descendants of convicts! Oh! the impudent braggarts!

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the commentary upon all this? Suppose Mrs. Trollope, or Basil Hall, or the Duke of Saxe Weimar, or some of that tribe of lying journalists who are hired to steal reputation just because they have no reputation of their own, had gone home and said these things of an American Congress; what do you imagine the good people of the United States would have thought about it? Would it not have produced a deep sensation throughout the whole land? Would not every American of high and honorable feelings have considered himself grossly scandalized in this malevolent attack upon his country's character? Nations have characters as well as individuals, and it is the sum of individual character that forms a nation's. It is utterly impossible for a community of thieves to make an honest nation; therefore every man's character is identified with the character of his country. When, sir, did any traveller ever, in the worst condition of his bile, say such things of us as our own commonly called well-regulated press? They speak of our manners, customs, and intelligence, in terms of derision, and this excites our indignation in a very high degree; but they say but little about our morals, and nothing against our honesty; and yet, Mr. Speaker, our own press would make the world believe, (and that very world, too, who are looking upon us with a jealous, not to say envious eye, on account of our free principles,) that the great fountain-head of our legislation, which forms the heart and motive power of these great liberal principles, is as corrupt as the most varied infamy can make it. Can any thing more delight foreign nations, differing as they do from us in their forms of government, and trembling under the dread of the influence of enlightened freedom upon their coercive institutions, than to hear that we are likely to sink under the moral distemperature of our system? If they believe our own testimony, they have a right to form that conclusion; and, false as we know it to be, yet we sit here, indifferent as to the consequences of such pestilential slander, tamely acquiescing in every malicious calumny that emanates from the press, or from correspondents in or out of this House; and, what is worse, powerless as we are to suppress the mischief, it meets with no condemnation from the people, whose own country and character are as much affected by it as our own; it arouses no portion of their sensibility, though it strikes the deadliest blow at the whole moral frame of a Government that forms the boast of a periodical festival, and the theme of their perpetual admiration.

Although, Mr. Speaker, I cannot flatter myself to be able to remedy this evil in the general, yet, so far as concerns myself, I can and will denounce the foul obloquy attempted to be cast upon my public and private character; and I ask the indulgence of the House to allow me to do so on the present occasion. It was here I received the attack, and it is here, before I part with you, I wish to repel it. I am fully aware of the indelicacy of trespassing upon the patience of others, while an individual is talking about himself; but generous minds will make all due allowance for the feelings of one who has not only his own, but the reputation of his offspring, to defend against a well-aimed blow, calculated to imbitter his and their future peace. Besides, Mr. Speaker, the House is more interested in this matter than they might at first suppose; for, having lost my character among you, you ought to bear with me while I attempt to retrieve it. I firmly believe I came here an honest man; and if I have lost that reputation, it must be from the truth of the saying that "evil communications corrupt good manners."

I have been charged with having changed my opinions with regard to the bank question, and that such change has been effected by a large accommodation from the bank. I feel confident, with the members of this House of all parties, the refutation of such reckless defamation would be unnecessary; but, Mr. Speaker, there are thousands out of it who might attempt to make other thousands believe it, merely because I had not denied it. I proceed, then, to a history of the transaction which has given rise to this charge. Two years ago, when I came on to take my seat in Congress, I brought on a large sum of money, in Georgia currency, to fulfil a contract for machinery in the city of New York. Upon my arrival here, I found that Georgia money was seven per cent. below par. I immediately sent it back to Augusta, by a friend, to purchase a bill of exchange upon New York. I received information from this friend of its safe delivery to the factor to whom it was sent. From this last individual I could learn nothing, though repeatedly addressed. Thus strongly threatened with a heavy loss, and still more harassed by the consequences it was likely to involve, I awaited the event with unusual anxiety. I was held in this suspense during the whole session of Congress, and finally was informed that my agent had used the money, and had failed. This information I received the day after Congress adjourned. It is impossible, if it were necessary, to describe my feelings at the moment. A large sum of money faithlessly embezzled—an urgent contract to be met in six days, without the means of satisfying it—the loss of a handsome discount for the want of prompt payment—from home, and consequently away from all my resources—among strangers, and compelled by a sick family to remain in Washington—I leave you, sir, and this House, to conceive of my situation. I had sufficient proof at the time what generous minds will do under such an unlooked-for difficulty, and am now fully able to appreciate the difference between an act of disinterested friendship and the envenomed heart of a slanderer.

As soon as I read the letter informing me of my misfortune, I handed it over to some one of the gentlemen with whom I boarded, and mentioned the embarrassing perplexity it occasioned in the failure of my engagement, a matter of almost as much concern as the loss itself. In an instant, and unsolicited, General ROBINSON, Senator from Indiana, stepped aside to a table, and, knowing the amount I wanted, drew a note for it, payable at the branch of the United States Bank in this place, endorsed it himself, and was immediately and voluntarily succeeded in that kind act by two other Senators and three members of this House, whose names I beg their permission to mention, as well for the generosity of the act as in testimony of my grateful acknowledgments for the favor it conferred. The other Senators were Col. KING, of Alabama, and Judge MAXEUX. The gentlemen of this House were Capt. McISTERN, of Maine, Gen. HAWKINS, of North Carolina, and the lamented Judge BOULDER, of Virginia. They presented it to me, remarking that they hoped it would relieve my present embarrassment. In the warmth of feeling which such generous and unexpected kindness inspired, and certainly in violent contrast with such as but a few moments before occupied my mind, I accepted their friendly offer, though it was to borrow money from a bank against which I was, and am still, opposed; not, however, without expressing my apprehension, which has been fully realized, that an uncharitable world would place an improper construction upon the affair. To obviate which, Col. KING, with his characteristic generosity, went himself to the bank, fully explained all the circumstances under which the loan was asked, and was wholly instrumental in procuring the accommodation. Thus, then, a loan, sought in consequence of an urgent and unforeseen necessity, created by an unexpected act of perfidy—acquired in the most open manner—upon the best security, six endorser's worth two hundred thousand dollars—from an institution whose business it is to lend money for gain, and made in strict compliance with its rules, has been tortured into a peace offering, designed, as it is said, and so received by me, to silence my opposition to it! Language fails me to express, in a sense of becoming self-respect, the scorn which is due to such heartless illiberality. Every dollar of this loan was paid before it became due, and my endorser's notified of the fact. And, sir, it is the only transaction I ever had with this bank; and will now say, if that bank, or any other, will produce a demand against me, I will agree to pay them off in diamonds, if they prefer that kind of currency to gold and silver. Nay, sir, and I mention the fact in no vain boasting spirit, but to show that I am not under the necessities which usually imply bank accommodations, if any one else can show a just claim against me, I am ready to meet it with the same promptness.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is a view of this matter which, though it may not be necessary, yet it is not improper, to present. Besides the facts which so forcibly, as I humbly conceive, stamp falsehood and confusion upon the calumny, the act charged upon me is without a motive. All human actions have their motive, and, generally speaking, the character of the act is tested by the motive which produces it. I could not have received the money as a bribe, for every dollar of it has been returned. It was only a loan for a short time, and consequently rendered me only a very temporary benefit. Now, if money was my object, I could have gotten a great deal more, and for a much longer time, without interest or repayment, from the bank's competitor. Is it recollected where I stood? What place I occupied? Who possessed in a higher degree than I did the confidence of one who has larger rewards to give than the bank? Rewards of honor as well as money! I stood in the front ranks of opposition to the bank, and greatly ahead of some of those who have got their reward and gone to glory. If I could in my conscience have gone all lengths against the bank, right or wrong, who disputes the fact, since what has taken place, that I might have gotten anything I pleased? It is no heavy draft upon credulity to say that the road to high preferment was an "uncompromising hostility to the bank," and no man had a better start than I had, for I had opened against it long before I came to Congress, and long before the President himself. But because I could not say the seizure of the public money from the bank, the wresting it from Congress, the proper guardians of the people's money, and placing it under the control of the executive branch of the Government to increase its power and patronage, was right and proper—a proceeding that every real friend of the President, some of the ablest presses that supported him, and most of his confidential advisers, condemned at the time as unwise, unnecessary, unjust, and unjustifiable—behold! I was bank bought, and had changed my opinions.

And, Mr. Speaker, who are they that have accused me of this delinquency? Would you believe it, they are some of the old quondam friends of the bank, who have all at once got their minds enlightened upon the subject, and have now become the warmest enemies of that institution. So much so, they have lately, as members of the Legislature of Georgia, declared the bank a highly dangerous establishment, and given some instructions to their Senators about it, though they would not say it was unconstitutional; a matter of much more concern to the republican party. Some of these very men, and all the party to which they belong, formerly believed this bank was highly useful and necessary, and, as I will show you presently, were very anxious to obtain a branch of it in Georgia, saying it would have "a salutary tendency to keep the local banks within a sound issue of their paper." A celebrated paper in Georgia,* belonging to this party, and known to be their leading paper, reprobated, in the strongest manner, three years ago, my opposition to the bank, said I was no "financier," that I was meddling in business I did not understand; I had better come away, and cease my opposition, for I would find nothing wrong in the institution; that it was constitutional and necessary, and ought to be rechartered. Now, sir, this was the cry of this press and its party, and these are the very people who are now charging me with changing my opinions with regard to the bank. Indeed, I could not incur much blame for inconsistency if I were to confess the fact, especially if I rested my justification on their own change of opinion, for a man cannot well be wrong who keeps himself well balanced on the opposite side of any question these gentry may advocate. But, sir, as to the application for a branch in Georgia, permit me to read you the following letter, dated Milledgeville, Georgia, December 25, 1831:

"The Bank of the United States having lately sent agents to Augusta and Columbus, in Georgia, to understand the benefits that might accrue to that institution in the establishment at each of a branch bank, and also to understand whether such establishments would conflict with public opinion, or be in accordance therewith, we the undersigned, members of the present Legislature of Georgia,† do hereby express our opinions on the subject as aftermentioned, viz:

"That if the Bank of the United States shall come to a decision that it is interesting to establish at either or each [both] of these places a branch of its bank, the measure will advance a majority of the interests of the inhabitants of the circumjacent country within the State of Georgia, as also that of South Carolina on the one side, and that of Alabama on the other. We give two of the reasons in favor of this assertion:

"First, because money borrowers can there procure loans at six per cent. per annum; and, second, because the operations of the Bank of the United States have the salutary tendency to keep the local banks within a sound issue of their paper. And, therefore, if the Bank of the United States decide that the places in question are of sufficient consequence to induce the establishments in question, the sooner, in our opinion, it is done, both for the bank and the country, the better."

I have now done with this branch of my subject, and thank the House for the very indulgent and attentive hearing which they have afforded me on this truly unpleasant topic, and shall proceed to the other part of the question, viz: the reasons for my vote.

In presenting my reasons for voting against the bill on your table, and sustaining the substitute offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOMMON,] I shall briefly urge what I have always done against the Bank of the United States, viz: that any concern on the part of the general Government, with banks of any description, is not only unconstitutional, but inexpedient.

I do not intend to argue the constitutional question at large, and what I do say on that subject is wholly intended for those who have always thought with me that the Bank of the United States was unconstitutional, and who have aided in putting it down on that ground. The bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means designs to substitute State banks for the United States Bank; and I shall attempt to show that whatever renders the latter unconstitutional will apply with equal force to the former.

The friends of the United States Bank have always maintained, and so it was decided by the federal court, that it was an instrument "necessary and proper" to carry into effect certain powers of the constitution. The whole argument is summed up in this remarkable statement, found at the head of Mr. McDuffie's able report: "The earliest and principal objection urged against the constitutionality of the bank was, that Congress had not the power to create corporations. That Congress has a distinct and substantive power to create corporations, without reference to the objects intrusted to its jurisdiction, is a proposition which never has been maintained; but that any one of the powers expressly conferred upon Congress is subject to the limitation, that it shall not be carried into effect by the agency of a corporation, is a proposition which cannot be maintained." Here, then, it is admitted that Congress has no right to create corporations unless they are intended to carry into effect certain expressed powers of the constitution.

We who have opposed the bank contend they have no right to create corporations for any purpose; and if a corporation is nothing more than an instrument to execute certain powers of the constitution which Congress cannot create, it cannot use such an instrument created by any one else. Let us illustrate this idea. Mr. McDuffie laid down the powers which he said the bank was intended to execute. 1. To aid as a fiscal agent in collecting and disbursing the public revenue. 2. To borrow money. 3. To regulate commerce. 4. To coin money and regulate the value thereof; or, in other words, to regulate the currency. These are all the powers a bank can execute.

Now, if we deny that Congress cannot create a bank for these purposes, who can? Can a State do it? No one will contend for this. But it is gravely maintained that, if a State has created a bank for other purposes, Congress may take that bank to do what she cannot create a bank to do herself! If Congress cannot create a bank to execute its powers, it is because, we say, there is no such expressed right to be found in the constitution. Nor is it such an implied power as is "necessary and proper" to carry into effect other powers. The power must be expressed or implied which Congress can use. How is it possible to evade the force of this argument as against State banks. Where is the authority, expressed or implied, to use a State bank for executing those very constitutional powers which a federal bank cannot do? Take, for instance, the power "to collect and disburse the revenue." Congress cannot incorporate a bank to do this; but then it is contended it may take a bank already incorporated by a State for that purpose; and you give as a reason, that a corporation is a person in law which you can employ as you would any other person. And pray are they any thing more than a person in law after you have created them? If there is no other consequence in creating a corporation but making it a person in law, where is the harm of corporations? Is there any difference between your creation of a person in law for your own purposes, and a person in law created by a State? But, to test this matter still further, if you can execute one power with a State bank, you can another. Will it be contended that you can regulate commerce or the currency with State banks? Remember these are, also, two of the powers which it was said the United States Bank was intended to execute. If you make a distinction between these and the first power mentioned, you give up the question. You must take all or none. If you say that State banks cannot execute these powers, it must be because the constitution confers no such right, and then you virtually admit that, "to collect and disburse the public revenue," is such a power as the constitution does confer, and, if conferred upon a State bank, it is equally so upon any other bank: exactly what has been contended for by the United States Bank. It always maintained that, if there was one single power it could be instrumental in executing, it was a constitutional institution.

But mark the consequences of the reasoning which gives to the federal Government the right to use State corporations for objects which they cannot accomplish by corporations of their own creation. What was gained by withholding the power from the general Government to grant charters, if they can take those granted by States as instruments for the execution of any purpose they may wish? The argument leads to this result: you cannot make Governors, Legislatures, and judges, for the States, but you can take them, after the State has made them, for your use. So far from this being true, it has been determined that you cannot use State courts to carry any of your judicial powers into effect. But what appears to me conclusive upon this subject, if the mere creation of a corporation is all that stands in your way to use them for any purpose you may think proper, and that you can take a bank corporation created to your hand by a State, that you may take any other State corporation for enlarging your powers. You cannot create turnpike, railroad, canal, or manufacturing companies, for the objects of their incorporation, but, after the States have made them, you can take them and go to work. You cannot incorporate colleges and academies for the purposes of education, but, when the States have done it, then you can come in for the use of them to any extent your love of implied powers may prompt. It will not do to say you have a constitutional right "to collect and disburse your revenue," and therefore to use the means necessary and proper to that end. This was the grand argument of the Bank of the United States. If you can use means already provided, you can provide means yourself. But if it be granted that you can use means already provided, to execute one power of the constitution, you can for any other: and recollect you claim the power to effect internal improvements, and to encourage domestic manufactures. Now, where are you to be stopped in the use of all the companies I have just named for these last-mentioned great objects, if you can take banking companies to execute any other power of the constitution? It is impossible to draw a distinction between the two cases, and more fearful and important consequences may flow from this measure than can well be conceived by the most far-reaching forecast.

I come now to the last thing proposed, an inquiry into the expediency of the law; and I lay down this proposition, and boldly affirm that it cannot be contradicted, that, whatever reasoning is used against the expediency of the United States Bank, it will apply with equal force to State banks. I challenge the most acute ingenuity, and defy the rigor of the most discriminating intellect, to frame an argument against a federal bank, upon the ground of expediency, that will not immediately exert a like authority over State institutions.

I presume it is well recollected, for the fact is dignified with a place in the annual message, besides its repetition in numerous other State papers, that the principal charges against the United States Bank are: 1. Too much power. 2. Interfering with elections. 3. Buys up the press; and 4. Corrupts the public morals. Does any one remember any other objections besides these, or such as would naturally classify themselves with these? If not, let us now examine how it is possible for State banks to escape from the operation of these objections? What is meant by too much power? or what is this power? Is it not money? Is not this the great instrument by which banks operate? by which they exercise their immense control over the wants and wishes of society? by which they regulate the value of every thing; and, operating upon the varied interests of men, with an influence as fixed as destiny, and as certain as death, they have a most tremendous power? But is the power confined alone to the United States Bank? Is money less powerful in a State bank than in a federal bank? Is it managed differently? by people of a different character? for different objects? Are five hundred State banks, united in a political league, less able or less inclined to the exercise of power than one bank and its twenty-four branches? No: just as true as was the fact which the dying father exhibited to his children, when he wished to impress them with the virtue of harmony, that one rod was more easily broken than a bundle closely united, so is the truth of the proposition, that there is more power in five hundred than in twenty-five banks.

The interfering with elections, the buying up the press, and the corrupting of the public morals, are merely the effects of the great money power we have just been considering; and I put it to the candor of gentlemen to say whether they are not as likely to follow from the influence of money in one condition as another, especially if it is used in precisely similar situations, employed by similar intelligence, and for exactly similar objects? By the bill on your table, the Government can, and, such is its love of patronage and power, it never rejects an opportunity to increase its dominion, it will draw into its service five hundred State banks. Now, let the imagination range for a moment over the wide-spread field of this active, restless, grasping power; see it managed, politically, by one ambitious mind; view its diversified operations, first upon the people, then through them upon State Legislatures, then through these upon Congress, and through this last upon the legislation of the country; see its effects upon the officers of the Government; upon speculations in the public lands; upon stock-jobbing; upon trade; in fine, running its fibres into every soil it can possibly penetrate, and then say, is there no dread of connecting this vast power with the executive branch of Government? I confess it presents fearful forebodings to my imagination.

You say the United States Bank interfered with elections: grant it; but what could it do in comparison with five hundred State banks connected with the Government? Has any one made a calculation of the immediate political power it brings to the support of the hand that wields it? Bear with me while I present it to your view. Five hundred banks will average, including directors, officers, and agents, twelve persons to a bank; two hundred stockholders, and one thousand debtors in the course of a year, besides other thousands who are constantly seeking to become debtors, which cannot well be taken into the calculation, but over which every one must perceive the banks must exercise the most subduing control. The result of this estimate gives upwards of six hundred thousand persons, and, making a deduction of a sixth for over-estimate and other drawbacks, will leave half a million, with all their friends; and, when added to those who are daily seeking bank favors, it forms altogether one of the most stupendous political fabrics ever reared by the art of man. Joined to the other vast powers of the federal executive, in distributing twenty millions of dollars, and conferring one hundred thousand offices, if some future Chief Magistrate, less virtuous than those who have preceded him, and more ambitious of higher honors, do not succeed in the acquisition of sole and exclusive rule, it will be owing to the singular interposition of Heaven's guardian protection—a protection almost undeserved, by reason of the blind and servile infatuation which urges us in crowds to bend our necks to the yoke.

The substitution of State banks, to perform the business of the federal bank, is a clear admission that we cannot do without banks;* and if hereafter the experiment should fail, it will drive us back to the old institution, and then there will be a complete triumph over the constitution. The friends of that instrument will have lost all they have gained by the present overthrow of the bank. It will be perpetuated upon us for ever, and the constitution will remain a living, crippled memento of the instability of all human institutions. The inexpediency of this measure will be apparent, if we only suppose, which is by no means unreasonable, for like causes produce like effects, that the State banks should act precisely as the United States Bank is said to have done, in subsidizing the press, violating the elective franchise, and corrupting the public morals; what advantage have we gained? And will it not prove that it is only the master, and not the principles, we have exchanged? This view is presented under the idea that the banks continued their opposition against the Government, as did the United States Bank; but if their influence should happen to be turned in its favor, who does not perceive the thing would be ten thousand times worse?

I am in favor of the amendment to the bill, because it is intended to separate the Government from all connexion with the banking system. It provides that all the receipts and expenditures of the Government shall be in hard money; and if the cry which we heard last summer about gold and silver, and all that sort of thing, was not the veriest trickery, to cajole the people for political effect, the friends of hard money ought not to lose a moment in supporting it also. Let us hear no more about hard money if this measure is rejected; and let the community know that the meanest juggling has been used, first to betray and then to destroy them.

Mr. Speaker, I am free to confess that I once believed that State banks could answer the purposes of Government as fiscal agents, and so expressed myself in an elaborate essay against the Bank of the United States. But my opinion was formed entirely on theory, and without the opportunity of testing the argument from any thing like experience or proper information. Since then I have seen and heard much upon that subject. The facts which had been presented to this House, and the able discussions they have undergone, have shed a flood of light upon the subject, and I am constrained to own, that every conclusion, drawn from the testimony and its commentary, not only decides against a further continuance of the Bank of the United States, but renders the same verdict against all banks, of whatever character or description. To confess, repent, and be forgiven, is the creed by which I hope to live and die.

I have now done with the subject, and, sir, I am fully aware of having obtruded upon the House many remarks in relation to myself that bear the aspect of seeming arrogance. I assure the House that no such spirit animates my bosom. I am about to close a long life of public service, in which there has, perhaps, been much to censure and but little to praise. But I can, in great sincerity, say, whatever may have been its errors, they have been—to use a very common but expressive phrase—of the head, and not of the heart. In parting with you, although it may seem to be voluntary, I will not conceal from you the fact that I have every reason to believe I have lost the confidence of my constituents. Whether it is deserved for any thing I have done here, I leave you to judge. It is true I have not been removed from my trust, but it is only because not I did seek its renewal. Men, with whom it has been my pleasure to serve, and whose exalted worth and talents have secured for derides, and therefore constantly reproaches, his administration, as this unfortunate gun-boat system. Other great men ought to beware how they experiment it too far.

*When Mr. Jefferson came into office, he and his friends had said so much against the navy, as a useless drain upon the Treasury, that he was obliged to cut it down, but substituted in its place the gun-boat system, which plainly implied we could not do without a navy. Well, the gun-boat system failed, and the navy was restored. What was the consequence? There is nothing in the whole history of that statesman that so signally them an equal reputation with the most distinguished upon this floor, have been put aside after the most faithful services, and such as had acquired for their State the very highest character. I could not have expected to have shared a different fate, because with them I have felt and acted; and our principles of action, to every useful purpose, have been the same. I was, therefore, extremely anxious, under circumstances like these, in retiring, perhaps for ever, into private life, to leave, as a memorial to my children, the pleasing reflection that, if I had done no good for their country, I had done no harm to a reputation, which, in after times, it may be their pride to honor and to imitate.

When Mr. CLAYTON had finished,

Mr. MANN, of New York, rose and said that he had not designed to trouble the House with any remarks upon this subject; and he should not have done so but for some observations which had fallen, in the course of the debate, from the two honorable gentlemen from Virginia [Messrs. GORDON and ROBERTSON] who addressed the House yesterday and to-day, which Mr. M. said he felt himself constrained, as a Representative from New York, to notice. He must, therefore, ask a few moments' indulgence. If, sir, I have not mistaken the scope of their remarks, the honorable gentlemen object to the passage of this bill because about thirteen millions of the revenues of this Government are collected in the State of New York, to be deposited in her State banks, and used in the promotion of her already overgrown commerce; thus operating like a pecuniary tariff in her favor. The gentlemen then go on to speak of that State, which, by courtesy, they denominate the empire, with an army of forty Representatives on this floor, possessing population, facilities, resources, and political power, presenting to the vision of gentlemen ideal dangers to the prosperity and welfare of the other States of this Union; and therefore it is argued that great circumspection should be used here in respect to our national legislation, so as not to increase those advantages and facilities which New York is always so ready to embrace and improve. The inference which it appears to me necessarily follows from the scope of the remarks of the gentlemen, taken altogether, (and I state it as an inference,) is, that the power of New York is not only too great in the Union, but that she will use it for political and improper purposes of self-aggrandizement.

[Here Mr. M. yielded the floor to the gentlemen from Virginia, [Messrs. GORDON and ROBERTSON], who explained, and said that they had not intended to utter a word disrespectful to the State of New York; that they admired that State, and its rapid progress and improvement; and Mr. GORDON protested against any inferences being drawn by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MANN] which his language did not warrant.]

Mr. MANN resumed, and said that he had not understood the gentlemen as using disrespectful or unparliamentary or uncourteous language towards his State or her Representatives; and he had not misunderstood the scope of their remarks, from which he had drawn the inference which he had stated as necessarily following from their propositions and premises. This inference (said Mr. M.) seems constantly to disturb the imagination of gentlemen in both wings of the Capitol, presenting a vision continually before their eyes, inasmuch that, judging by the observations which a seat on this floor for a single session has enabled me to make, I conclude that no question of general or national importance can be considered and discussed here without involving considerations and allusions appertaining to the State of New York, and her career as a member of the confederacy. Her advantages, her institutions, her legislative and political policy, are arrayed and reviewed, censured, and sometimes freely condemned, on this floor. Her public men, charged with the administration of her local and State affairs, have sometimes been attacked with epithets as senseless as they are unjust. Her banking system seems to have the misfortune, with gentlemen, to meet with no favor, except distrust and disapproval.

Sir, if gentlemen who discourse so largely about New York, her laws and institutions, her wealth and commerce, would take the trouble to examine them more closely, and learn more of their nature, extent, and utility, I trust they would find more to merit their commendation, and less to denounce and condemn. I do not know that it is proper to arraign the legislative or local policy of any State of the Union upon this floor; yet I have, perhaps too often, been a silent witness of the exhibition here, and in the other branch of the national Legislature, in respect to the State which, in a very humble part, I have the honor to represent. I have supposed that the States, keeping within the boundaries established by the constitution of the United States, had the power to manage their own affairs in their own way. But if honorable gentlemen are disposed to look into New York, for good or for evil, I will join them in aid of the most scrutinizing examination into her political history, her public policy, laws, and institutions. I would ask their particular attention to her systems and provisions for public education; to her social and moral condition; to her jurisprudence and legislation; to her system of internal improvements; to her proud financial condition; to her banking and monetary system; to her internal resources; to her intelligent, industrious, and enterprising population—in which, at last, they will find the secret of the power, the wealth, and expansive greatness, of New York, apparently so much dreaded. Let me ask gentlemen in what State or country will they find the affairs of a local Government better conducted to secure the ends of good government, the happiness, rights, and liberties, of the people, than are those of New York? Are her finances and resources wasted or perverted to improper objects? I will not here make invidious comparisons, but invite gentlemen, in their own States, to imitate rather than to indulge in unreasonable or unfounded jealousies of the legislation and power of New York.

But, Mr. Speaker, when has New York used her commercial or political power in the Union for selfish or improper purposes? When has she endangered the Union of these States, or swerved from the political faith and principles which she derived from Virginia through those apostles of political liberty, Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe? For thirty-two years since the adoption of the constitution, the vaunted "Ancient Dominion" has held the control of the executive and legislative policy of this Government, during all which time New York has stood firmly by her side, advocating her faith and practice under the constitution, without having dreamed of "the alternative" which might permit her to change her course or her principles. Let the history of her action during the late war—pouring out her best blood and treasures upon the altar of the country, while another portion of the Union occupied a position at Hartford more than equivocal, while the very Capitol in which we are assembled was a heap of smoking ruins under the eyes of the "Ancient Dominion"—shield the State of New York from any inferences of a purpose or intention to use her dreaded political power in the confederacy for selfish or improper purposes. Sir, what has been the recent position of New York in the trials to which the strength of our institutions have been subjected? Has she stopped to consider "any alternatives," or has she stood by the constitution and the principles which she derived from the fathers of the "Ancient Dominion," even though the gallant sons of those fathers may have doubted and hesitated as to whether the path of their sires led on to the fountains of patriotism? She has maintained the firm and even tenor of her way through all the vicissitudes and changes which have been going on around her, and she will continue to adhere to the ancient republican faith promulgated from Virginia, even though the talented public men of the latter may, in some instances, indulge their fears that such adherence will lead her to a position in the Union which will not permit those who "discourse of Rome to say that her wide walls contain but one man."

Sir, what is the position of New York at present on this floor? Is it equivocal or alternative? Is it in opposition to the constitutional doctrines so long cherished in favor of strict construction? Is it opposed to the rights of the States? When have her Representatives arraigned at this bar the admitted constitutional legislation, the policy or measures, of one of the State Governments of this Union? And when, sir, after having done so, have they then maintained that the State Governments have the power to review and nullify the constitutional measures of the national Government? Sir, the State of New York may present to the views of some honorable gentlemen the political enigma, about which they discourse, but cannot understand; yet, sir, she has never been found to be a political meteor, traversing the abstruse regions and metaphysical mazes of the political firmament. But, Mr. Speaker, the sin of New York is her physical and numerical greatness—her overgrown external commerce and her internal trade, resources, and advantages. Sir, I know not how to reply to the position that my native State is physically too strong already, and that greater dangers are to be apprehended from its increasing strength and multiplying facilities and resources. I cannot regret it; that would be a "treason most foul." I cannot profess its weakness; the facts would not sustain me. I do most sincerely desire its increasing prosperity, and I must be admitted to enjoy this natural desire. New York, sir, has never been the recipient of your bounty. She has never asked at your hands more than strict justice in the distribution of your favors, and has not received even that. Her commercial advantages depend upon the laws of nature, and of these she cannot be deprived by legislation. Transfer your public revenues from the natural aids they afford to her commerce, as the honorable gentleman from Virginia proposes, and you will not materially affect the progress of New York in her commercial career, since she does not rely upon adventitious advantages. She has, however a right to demand at your hands equal and impartial justice. She asks nothing more. While New York is the medium and instrument by which so large a portion of the public revenues are collected, can you, in common and equal justice, deprive her of the advantages which her situation confers? You cannot, and ought not. For many years past those revenues have been under the selfish and odious control of the United States Bank, with interests opposed to those of New York; and has this circumstance arrested the commerce and prosperity of that State? We have, sir, I confess, sometimes inconveniently felt the power of an unseen hand striking at our welfare, but not sufficiently to retard permanently our progress.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to express the hope that we may hereafter be able to discuss and consider the various questions presented here, without drawing into review the local affairs and legislative policy of any of the States of the confederacy, unless it shall be to derive useful lessons to guide us in the path of duty by their example or experience; and let me add the hope that the various amendments proposed to the bill under consideration may be rejected, and the bill passed into a law.

Mr. WILSON, of Virginia, addressed the House in opposition to the motion to consider the bill as made by his colleague, [Mr. ROBERTSON.] He was also opposed to the amendment of Mr. GORDON. Believing that the Bank of the United States would not be rechartered, he was satisfied that it would be necessary to employ the State banks as the fiscal agents of the Government. He was, therefore, in favor of perfecting the present bill; and although he had some doubts on the subject, still he should probably vote for the amendment which had been suggested by another colleague, [Mr. MOORE], to insert the names of the State banks in the bill, so as to leave as little discretion as possible to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. VANCE asked what was now the question before the House? He expressed his wish to offer an amendment, when in order, which proposed a distribution of the revenue among the banks of the different States in proportion to their relative population.

The amendment, by permission, was read, and is as follows:

"SEC. —. Be it further enacted, That in all cases where the amount of revenue collected in any State is greater than what would be its due proportion, estimated by a comparison between the whole revenue of the United States collected on imports, and the number of the members of the House of Representatives, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be credited, at the commencement of each month, by the deposit banks in the districts where such excess shall be collected, to the deposit banks in States where no collections are made, or where no such excess exists, an amount in ratio equal to their representation in the House of Representatives, as aforesaid. And the amount to be deposited shall be charged to the banks in whose favor such deposits are made; and the amount of the sum so charged be forthwith communicated to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall cause the same to be so regulated and adjusted as to assign to the depositing banks, in the States where a deficiency exists, the just proportion, by the standard aforesaid, to which such States are entitled. And the said depositing banks shall not charge on drafts to individuals or companies, for the moneys thus placed to their credit, to exceed one fourth of one per centum. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to see that the provisions of this section be carried into effect in good faith, and that he cause to be made out all forms and instructions necessary to accomplish that object."

Mr. HANNegan, after adverting to the bills pending before the House, and expressing his extreme reluctance to make the motion, moved the previous question.

The CHAIR having stated the question,

Mr. WILLIAMS moved a call of the House.

The CHAIR stated that, according to a decision of the House at its last session, this motion could not be interposed between a motion for the previous question and a question on its being seconded by the House; and though his own convictions were opposed to the decision, he should, out of respect to the authority of the House, submit to it, and he therefore pronounced the motion for a call to be out of order.

Mr. McKINLEY, thinking with the Speaker, took an appeal to try the question.

Mr. BRIGGS demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MERCER sustained the appeal, on the ground that, should it be decided that no call could be permitted till after a vote on the seconding of the previous question, and should the members brought into the House by the call be opposed to the previous question, and negative it, the debate, however important, must, under the existing rule, stop, and the subject go off until the next day.

Mr. WILLIAMS took the same ground, and insisted that the motion for a call was a privileged motion of the highest class, and came in of right.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, took a different view, and contended that the former decision of the House had been correct: because a call for the previous question, until seconded, was an imperfect motion, and not regularly in possession of the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND thought it was of little consequence which way the question was determined; but was in favor of standing by the decision, for consistency's sake.

The House being now full, Mr. McKINLEY withdrew his appeal.

Mr. BRIGGS renewed it, and demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. WISE moved an adjournment; but it was negatived.

The motion for a call was now withdrawn.

Mr. BRIGGS inquired whether the question of order fell with the withdrawal of the call.

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative.

The question then being on the seconding of the previous question, it was negatived: Ayes 96, noes 100.

So the House refused to order the previous question.

The question then being on the motion to recommit the bill with instructions,

Mr. POLK demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. BURGESS obtained the floor, and, having commenced a speech, moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. POLK asked the yeas and nays on this motion; whereupon

Mr. BURGESS withdrew it.

Mr. FILLMORE now demanded a division of the question; and it was accordingly put, first, simply on recommitment, and decided in the negative: Yeas 91, nays 115.

So the House refused to recommit the bill.

A motion to adjourn was negatived: Yeas 93, nays 102.

The question then recurring on the amendment offered by Mr. GORDON, (proposing to make collectors the custodiers of the revenue, &c.,) and the amendment thereto, moved by Mr. EWING, (proposing a plan for a currency board, &c.,)

The question on the amendment of Mr. EWING was then taken, by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative.

So the amendment was rejected.

Another motion to adjourn was negatived.

The amendment moved by Mr. GORDON was then decided by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 33, nays 161.

YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, Heman Allen, John J. Allen, Chilton Allan, Archer, Barber, Beale, Beatty, Campbell, Claiborne, William Clark, Clayton, Amos Davis, Davenport, Deberry, Foster, Gamble, Gholson, Gordon, Griffin, Heath, Letcher, Lewis, Martindale, McComas, Pickens, Robertson, Spangler, Steele, William P. So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOON moved the previous question.

Mr. FOSTER and Mr. MARDIS remonstrated; but Mr. BOON refused to withdraw the motion.

Mr. BURGESS moved an adjournment; whereupon the yeas and nays were demanded, but refused, and the motion was decided in the affirmative: Ayes 95, noes 86.

So the House adjourned.

THURSDAY FEBRUARY 12.

BOUNTY LAND.

Mr. CASEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill granting a bounty in land to the organized militia men, mounted militia men, and rangers, who defended the frontier during the late war with Great Britain. After the first reading of the bill,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved that the bill be rejected, (being the form of motion in course, when objection is made to the second reading of a bill.) In support of this motion, he said that the bill was calculated to extend a system which, in his opinion, it was the policy and interest of the United States to check. The class of troops embraced in the bill were regularly employed on a contingent service, at one dollar a day. No bounty was intended to be given to them, and they were not entitled to it any more than the militia. If the bill should pass, Congress would be compelled to extend the same provision to at least one hundred thousand militia.

He believed that the most arduous service performed during the late war was by the militia who were called out to defend the Atlantic border, and, if the bounty was given to any troops, it ought to be given to them. He had not a word to say against the character of the services performed by the rangers; but, if we established the principle of this bill, we should be obliged to grant a similar bounty to the forty of fifty thousand militia called out by the State of Virginia during the war, and to the militia called out by all the rest of the States. For the purpose of checking the delusive expectations to which the bill would give rise, he moved its rejection.

Mr. CASEY did not wish, he said, at this time, to go into a discussion of the bill, but merely to say that it had for some time been under consideration in the Committee on the Public Lands, before which it was brought upon a memorial from the Legislature of Illinois, referred to that committee. He hoped the bill would take the regular course, and be printed, together with the long report accompanying it, which would explain to the House the principles on which the bill rested.

Bounty Land.

Mr. CLAY thought, he said, that the gentleman from North Carolina was disposed to treat this proposition rather too unceremoniously. There was nothing in it, as it appeared to him, so shocking as to induce the House to reject it without consideration. In the principal view taken by the gentleman he was mistaken. He said the bill would lead to the extension of the bounty to a hundred thousand militia; but there was an essential difference between the ordinary militia and the troops proposed to be provided for in the bill. The militia served only for three months in many instances, and never longer than six months; but the rangers were bound to serve twelve months, and did serve for that time. This was as long as the thirty-ninth regiment of infantry of the regular army had been required to serve. Mr. C. referred to that regiment, because of its having been, perhaps, the only one that did not serve for a longer period. In what did the services of the regular troops differ from those of the class of troops proposed to be provided for in this bill. Had the rangers any advantage in pay over the regular troops? They were bound to furnish their own horses, arms, and accoutrements, and to provide for their own subsistence, and their pay was one dollar per day; but the regular infantry were provided by the Government with arms, clothing, subsistence, &c. He would not pledge himself to vote for the bill, but it was not so palpably monstrous and absurd, on its face, as to render it proper for the House to refuse to consider it. The gentleman said this was a contingent service. In what was it contingent more than any other service? The rangers were called out for the defence of the frontier, and were always either in camp or in action; and they were in as much active service as any troops who served during the war. He hoped the House was not prepared to reject the bill in the manner proposed.

Mr. CHILTON rose, he said, not to detain the House with many remarks on the subject, but to express a hope that claims of so meritorious a character as were those of these troops would be allowed some consideration. He was not disposed to extend the pension system to all who served during the war, but he would be gratified if every individual who was engaged in that war, and who was in such indigent circumstances that he could not procure a quarter section of land to settle and cultivate, should have it given to him by the Government. The bill was not of so explicit a character as he could desire. He could not see how far it was intended to carry the system. When the subject came up ultimately for decision, the House could modify the bill, but he hoped it would now be read twice and committed.

Mr. VINTON was glad, he said, that the member from North Carolina had made this motion. He thought it time for the House to take care of the public land as well as of the other property of the public. This bill embraced not only the rangers, but all the militia who served during the war, without regard to the term of service. A man who has enlisted for fifteen days was entitled under it to the bounty of one hundred and sixty acres. If the rangers knew the terms of service at the time when they enlisted, and if they had been paid according to the terms of their enlistment, upon what ground could they now come to the Government for a bounty in land? You gave your revolutionary soldiers, who served during the whole war, one hundred acres only, and at a time when the land was worth very little in comparison with its present value.

The land we now propose to give was in the midst of flourishing and populous States; whereas, the bounty land given to revolutionary officers and soldiers was in a far distant and unsettled wilderness, and virtually in possession of numerous and formidable Indian tribes.

If the bill were suffered to be committed and lie over, we should have petitions from all parts of the country for the extension of its provisions to every class of troops who served during the war. No service, he was sure, was performed during the war harder than that of the Virginia militia called out to defend the seaboard. The service at Norfolk was attended with more danger and hardship from pestilence, not to speak of any other danger, than any service performed by the rangers or other troops. There was no reason why the bounty proposed to be given to the rangers, should not be given also to the militia.

Mr. SPEIGHT regarded this motion of his colleague, he said, as very unfortunate, because it operated to exclude all the morning business properly before the House. He was called on by this motion to vote against a bill, with the details of which he was necessarily unacquainted. While he professed to be as great an advocate for the interests of the old States in the public lands as any one, he felt also for the gallant men who had left their families and their homes for the defence of the country, and he was very willing to make a small donation in land to every individual who braved the hardships of war to protect those who remained quietly at home. He desired that the bill might take the usual course, and asked the yeas and nays on the motion of his colleague.

Mr. CHILTON ALLAN said, whatever were the exact provisions of the bill, the course proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WILLIAMS] was very unusual. There were no two members who understood the bill in the same way, and yet it was proposed to reject it without consideration. How much time did the House expend in considering bills in which a single individual only was concerned, and yet it was now proposed to reject, without consideration, a bill embracing a large class of claims. If the bill was not sufficiently precise and distinct, it could be modified so as to be intelligible; and, if it were so fraught with mischief as to be unworthy of the countenance of the House, its rejection, after due consideration, would carry with it more moral influence.

Mr. REYNOLDS said this subject was presented to the House by a memorial from the Legislature of Illinois. If the proposition was entirely destitute of any merit, it ought still to be treated with common respect, as coming from the Legislature of a State.

[Mr. WILLIAMS here rose to explain. He said that no course, in regard to any bill, which was in order under the rules of the House, could be supposed to be disrespectful to a proposition or to the source whence it proceeded.]

Mr. REYNOLDS did not intend, he resumed, to impute to the gentleman the design of treating the bill disrespectfully. He contended that both the merits of the proposition and the character of the source from which it came, entitled it to a deliberate consideration by the House. The gentleman from Ohio opposed the bill because the rangers got all they were entitled to under their contract. But how many individuals were every year relieved by the House, who had no claims upon ground of rigid contract? If these men deserved the bounty as much as other troops who had already received it, there was as little impropriety in giving it to them now as there would have been at the time when the contract was made. He trusted that the motion would not be sustained.

Mr. ASHLEY said that he had risen to make some explanations, inasmuch as he believed the services of these troops were not duly appreciated by the House. He believed that no class of troops had done more real service than the rangers, who were enlisted for twelve months, to defend the frontier. They were obliged to purchase their own horses, clothes, arms, and subsistence; and, though their pay was a dollar a day, their compensation could not be considered as greater than that of the regular infantry of the United States. They had not only to subsist their horses, but when they were disabled, they were obliged to procure others, or go on foot. He had had, himself, the honor of a command in this corps, and he had frequently known the men, after losing a horse, to hire or buy another. He had no doubt that their actual expenses were fully equal to all the pay they received. As many of these men were lost in this service as of the regular troops in any other service. He was, therefore, clearly of opinion that they should receive the same bounty that the infantry received, although it was not in the contract, yet it was as proper to give it now as it was in the first instance. He did not altogether approve of the details of the bill, and when it came before the House, he should move some amendments to it.

Mr. EWING said the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] was very careful of the public land; and he thought he ought to be equally so of those who guarded and defended the land. He hoped the bill would be suffered to take the ordinary course, and that the men who served in defence of the frontier would be placed on a footing of equality with those who had already been rewarded.

Mr. LINCOLN rose, he said, to offer a few words in explanation of the vote he should give. Though a member of the Committee on Public Lands, he was not aware that the bill was to be reported this morning, and he was not prepared to go into the discussion of its provisions. It provided for a bounty in land to a particular class of troops who served in the last war. These troops were enlisted for twelve months, and it was stipulated that they should have one dollar per day, and the grant of the proposed bounty, in addition to that allowance, would be regarded as warranting the expectation of the same grant to every militia man. The provisions of the bill were enough to comprehend all the militia who served during the war, and applied as well to those who served for one day as to those who served a year. The bill, if passed, would, in his opinion, secure to every militia man, whether he served for a longer or shorter term, one hundred and sixty acres of land. Gentlemen might judge what quantity of the public lands would be required for this purpose. He thought the bill ought to be rejected in its present stage.

[Here Mr. LINCOLN's remarks were cut off by the expiration of the hour; and, on motion of Mr. WATMOUGH, the House took up the orders of the day.]

Mr. WATMOUGH asked the House to take up the navy bill, and after modifying it in the manner which had been proposed, to order it to be engrossed for a third reading; but the motion was objected to.

STATE DEPOSITE BANKS.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill to regulate the deposit of the public money of the United States in certain local banks; the motion of Mr. BOOX for the previous question on the bill still pending, and not ascertained to have been seconded by a majority—

Mr. PATTON moved a call of the House.

The SPEAKER, for reasons which he had before given, decided the motion to be out of order pending this, according to the settled rule of the House; though he was of opinion himself that the decision of the House which had settled the rule was incorrect, and ought to be reversed.

Mr. PATTON appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BRIGGS called for the yeas and nays on the question, and they were ordered.

The question was then discussed for some time by Messrs. PATTON, MILLER, FOSTER, SPEIGHT, CAGE, SUTHERLAND, MERCER, E. EVERETT, J. Y. MASON, JONES, H. EVERETT, HALL of North Carolina, and HEATH, when the question was put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" and decided by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 91, nays 113. So the House decided that the decision of the Speaker, declaring a motion for a call of the House not to be in order between the making and the seconding of a call for the previous question, should not stand, and that the motion for a call was in order.

The question being put upon the motion for a call of the House, it was negatived.

The question was then put on seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. GRAHAM appealed to Mr. BOOX to withdraw his motion for the previous question, but he refused.

The question was thereupon put, and decided as follows: Ayes 97, noes 105.

So the motion was not seconded.

The question then recurring on the bill,

Mr. BINNEY addressed the House at large in opposition to the bill; but proposed, in case it must pass, the following amendments:

1st. Requiring the returns of the State banks to be much more minute and extensive.

2d. Requiring the banks to retain specie in their vaults to the amount of one fourth of their circulation and of their public and private deposits.

3. Requiring the banks to pay two per cent. interest on public deposits.

4th. Requiring certain guards on the securities given.

5th. Requiring, if the deposits shall be removed by the Secretary of the Treasury, that he shall render his reasons to Congress; and if the same shall not be approved, the deposits to revert to the bank.

6th. The Secretary of the Treasury to publish monthly the returns from the banks, in two of the papers.

Mr. PATTON said he was in favor of the principle of the bill. At the same time he was willing and determined, so far as it depended on him, that every member of the House should have an opportunity of submitting any amendment which he might deem calculated to perfect the details of the bill; whether these propositions of amendment came from those who were hostile or those who were friendly to its principle. For this purpose he was willing to sit as late every day as was possible, consistent with the physical capacity of members to remain in session, until the bill was finally disposed of by the House; and it was with this view he had that day demanded a call of the House when the previous question was moved, in order to defeat that motion. Mr. P. took it for granted that such amendments only would be proposed as were bona fide, and for no indirect and unavowed purpose. It was probable that he would agree to some of the amendments which might be offered by others, and he had it in view to propose one or two himself, which, however, are not of so material a character as to induce him to vote against the bill in case of their failure. Mr. P. proceeded to say that he did not feel so well informed on the principles of the banking system, or the course of trade as connected with the general question of currency, as to enable him now to speak upon the subject of the particular amendments offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIRNEY], and which doubtless had been offered by him under a full conviction that they were proper and necessary for the perfection of the system of the bill on the principles of its friends. Nor is it my intention, said Mr. P., to enter into any elaborate discussion of the comparative advantages or disadvantages of carrying on the fiscal operations of the Government through the instrumentality of a Bank of the United States, or by the employment of banks chartered by the States. The time for that discussion has gone by. I agree in the opinion just expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, with his usual candor, that the question of the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States is settled. That battle has been fought and won. [Mr. Bixler here said, in an under tone, "fought and lost."] Ay, sir, fought and lost to the bank, and fought and won to the country. But though it has been thus decided, and is so acknowledged to be by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, yet I could not listen to the speech just delivered by him, without being struck with the resemblance which existed between the Bank of the United States, the redoubtable champion in the contest, and another champion, whose exploits are recorded in Hudibras, and of whom it is said that,

"He fighting fell, and falling fought,
And being down, still laid about."

It was impossible to see that, while it was confessed that the question was settled, the honorable gentleman's argument was mainly intended to show that there could not be any safe reliance upon any means of conducting the financial concerns of the Government, without the aid of a Bank of the United States. This was doubtless the conscientious conviction of that gentleman, and now, as formerly, avowed with his usual frankness, and maintained with his accustomed ability. But why discuss that proposition? It is decided by that tribunal which has jurisdiction to decide it, (the representatives of the people,) and the decision has been sustained, and more than sustained, by the only earthly tribunal to which they are responsible—their constituents, the people themselves. The inquiry now presented, and which must be decided, is, what is to be done now that a Bank of the United States is out of the question? To that I wish to speak; but before I do so, it may be proper to devote a few remarks to some other topics which have been introduced into this debate, and to which I consider it proper that some reply should be made.

Another great battle, Mr. Speaker, (connected with or growing out of this bank struggle,) has been fought—fought and won for us—and fought and lost for our opponents; as to which, some of the combatants seem unwilling to admit that they are beaten. Some gentlemen seem not to be satisfied with the triumphs they have celebrated, and the jubiliations they have enjoyed! You of course understand, Mr. Speaker, that I allude to the questions arising and discussed here last winter, upon the removal of the public money from the Bank of the United States. The clamor and outcry then made against the Executive, for having committed flagrant encroachments on the legislative department, it seems to be the desire of some again to revive, and again to bring into discussion.

Imputations upon the independence and integrity of judgment by which this House was governed in its decisions upon these questions, however common, and however much to be expected and little to be regarded elsewhere, it was to be hoped would not have been indulged in here. I do not mean to enter upon the field of argument to vindicate myself, and those who agree with me on those questions, from such imputations. I cannot, however, reconcile it to my own feelings to pass them over in silence, and I will say, that whenever, wheresoever, and by whomsoever, the issue may be made upon the propriety of those decisions of the House, I am ready to meet it. Whenever that glove is thrown down, and the lists are regularly open for the trial of conclusions, I am ready, if an abler and more skillful advocate of the constitution will not do it, to take it up; and, armed with the panoply of truth and reason, without any vain and weak reliance upon my own powers, I do not fear the conflict. I am ready to maintain that the proceedings of the executive department of the Government, in relation to the removal of the deposits, were not encroachments on the legislative department of the Government, or usurpations of power in violation of the limitations of the constitution and the prescriptions of law. I defy any man to show, by any fair reasoning, that those proceedings were in opposition to the principles of civil freedom, or that they placed the public revenues under the control of the Executive in any other form, or to any greater extent, than they have been placed under the uniform interpretation of, and universal practice under, the constitution and laws, from 1789 to the 1st day of October, 1833; and that any intimations that the decisions of this House on these questions justify the reflection that the representatives of the people are prostrated at the feet of the Executive by the influence of the power and patronage of the Government, is wholly unauthorized, and cannot be sustained. I have already shown, and can show more fully and conclusively hereafter, whenever it may be proper and necessary for me to do so, that the principles maintained here last winter, by myself and others who agreed with me, and which were understood to have received the sanction of a majority of this body, are in conformity with those recognised at the foundation of the Government, admitted ever since, and acted on by all parties, and were, by many of the enlightened statesmen who were instrumental in establishing the constitution, then and ever since deemed consistent with, and even essential to, the preservation of liberty and the public good.

I have no more to say on these topics. I recur to the question. The Bank of the United States having ceased to be the depository of the public money, and this House having decided that they shall not be restored to that institution, what shall we do? Is it necessary and expedient that the present condition of the public money, deposited in the State banks, should be permitted to remain? Whether we shall define more precisely the extent of the executive authority in relation to it, and limit and restrain the discretion now confided to that department under the existing laws and the long-settled interpretation of those laws? And by what provisions, and under what conditions, the public money may be deposited in certain State banks? Or whether we can dispense with the use of the State banks, and resort to some other expedient?

The employment of the State banks as depositories of the public money is called an experiment, and no little ingenuity has been displayed in ringing the changes on this word, with a view of ridiculing the idea of making an experiment on this subject. I am surprised that even some of the opponents of the Bank of the United States should speak of the employment of the State banks as depositories of, and as agents to collect, keep, and disburse, the public money, as an experiment. I deny that it can, with any propriety, be called an experiment. There is nothing novel in it. It has been going on from the time of the establishment of the first State bank to the present day. State banks have been selected and employed, as they are now selected and employed, by the Secretary of the Treasury, as fiscal agents of the Government, in collecting and disbursing the public money, during the whole period from the adoption of the constitution to the present moment; and this embraces periods when a Bank of the United States existed, and when it did not exist. Let me recall the recollection of the House to the history of the country on this subject. In the year 1811, when the old Bank of the United States had been in existence twenty years, and when judgment of death was about being pronounced upon it by the Congress of that time, a report made by the then Secretary of the Treasury showed that a large proportion, upwards, I believe, of one third of the whole of the public money in the treasury, was deposited in the State banks; and that, of twenty-one depositories, eleven of them were State banks, and nine consisted of the Bank of the United States and its branches. It is, moreover, a fact that, in all the New England States, during that whole time, there was but one branch of the United States Bank located, (in Boston,) notwithstanding the number of the collection districts, the hundreds of ports of entry, the vast amount of mercantile capital and commercial enterprise employed in these States. In Connecticut there was no branch of the United States Bank; none in Rhode Island, which, though small in territory, has always been extensively engaged in foreign trade, and possessed a large amount of capital. So that, even after the first Bank of the United States had been in operation twenty years, the State banks were more frequently used as places for the deposit of the public money than the Bank of the United States and its branches; and the fiscal concerns of the Treasury, in reference to the collection, safe keeping, transfer, and disbursement, of the public money deposited in these banks, were as well and conveniently managed as in reference to that deposited in the Bank of the United States. When the Bank of the United States expired, in 1811, the same system of employing the State banks was continued and extended, and the whole revenue was collected through the State banks, and deposited in them, or such of them as were selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, and employed on such terms as were agreed on between the Treasury Department and the banks, respectively; and we have the authority of Mr. Gallatin, in a letter written in 1812, that "no difficulty has been experienced in the transmission of the public money; and, with the exception of Norfolk and Savannah, the revenue has generally been as well collected as heretofore." What was the cause or extent of the difficulty in the excepted places I am not informed, but I presume they were temporary and inconsiderable.

I hold in my hand extracts which I have taken from the speeches made by gentlemen belonging to each of the great political parties which divided the country in 1811, and had intended to refer the House to them. Under present circumstances, however, I will not read them. They prove that the opinion was universal, at that time, that when the Bank of the United States ceased to exist, the employment of State banks must be extended to those places where theretofore the Bank of the United States and its branches had been used as depositories. All admitted that as the only alternative. The friends of the Bank of the United States insisted there was no other; and, as that would fail to answer the purpose, the Bank of the United States ought to be rechartered; and, on the other hand, the opponents of the Bank of the United States, contending that the State banks had already been, to a great extent, employed; that they were entirely competent to constitute a safe, cheap, and convenient agency in enabling the Treasury to collect, safely keep, and conveniently disburse, the public money. Through all this time, then, from 1789 to 1816, through all administrations, and by all political parties, and especially by that party which was called "republican," this "infernal agency of State banks," as it has been characterized by one of my honorable colleagues, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] has been employed, under the superintendence of the Secretary of the Treasury, and, as it would seem, approved and admitted by all to be the best in the absence of a Bank of the United States.

It is, then, (said Mr. P.,) a misapplication of terms to call the agency of State banks, as places of deposit for the public money, an experiment. It might have been called so in 1789. But surely its having been tested by experience of its successful operation from that time down to 1816, without the loss of a dollar to the Treasury, justifies me in saying that it is no longer proper to call it an experiment. If any thing has occurred since to show that it cannot be depended on, undoubtedly it ought to be candidly considered and duly weighed. It is accordingly insisted that it has signally failed since 1816, and that this is proved by the state of the currency at that time, and by the one million of dollars of unavailable funds, now in the treasury, which we have regularly and ostentatiously paraded before us as the proof of the inability of the State banks to furnish safe, cheap, and convenient depositories. These unavailable funds consist of the notes of some insolvent State banks, which failed some years after the close of the war, and the notes of which, to the amount above mentioned, were in the treasury, and have not been redeemed; and of balances due from some State bank depositories. But do gentlemen suppose that we are so blind, or that we can be so blinded, as not to be able to trace this loss to its true cause? Do we not all know that the deranged and unsound state of our currency, the depreciation of the paper of some of the State banks, and the insolvency of others, at that time, grew out of the state of war? That all the resources of the country, public and private, were put in requisition to furnish the means of carrying on a war which, after all, left us with a burden of one hundred and twenty millions of debt? Can there be any man who supposes that there is something so magical in the name of a Bank of the United States, or so efficacious in the fact that it is created by this Government, instead of by the State Governments, as to believe that, if the Bank of the United States had been in full operation during the war, the same derangement of the currency would not have occurred—the same suspension of specie payments, the same depreciation of its paper, and that of other banks? The necessities of the country compelled almost all the State banks to stretch their credit to the utmost, to assist the Government, until it failed and was exhausted. All institutions of this kind, which did not close their vaults, cease all active business, and refuse all aid to the Government, were involved in the common calamities of the war, which affected the value of every species of property, and visited with its infections all the recesses of trade, and every ramification of society. It was in the midst of this state of things that it was suggested to Congress, through the Treasury Department, to aid the resources of the country by establishing a Bank of the United States, which should be compelled to loan to the Government, when required, thirty millions of dollars; and was authorized to dispense with specie payments, with the consent of the President. This project failed in Congress. It was demonstrated by Mr. Webster, then a member of this House—and of whom I may say, however erroneous and objectionable are many of his political opinions, that he challenges the admiration of all for his profound sagacity and consummate ability—it was demonstrated by him that it was perfectly idle to establish a bank on such principles—that it would begin in insolvency, and that the whole scheme was little better than a sort of legalized bankruptcy; and yet such were the necessities of the Government, and the peculiar exigency of the times, that it seemed, by many of our most patriotic statesmen, to be demanded and justified. Congress, however, rejected it, and passed a sort of compromise bill, by a vote of 120 to 37, by which the bank was not required to loan money to the Government, and was bound to redeem its notes in specie.

The veto was applied to this bill by Mr. Madison because of these features, which rendered the bill wholly useless in relieving the country during the exigencies of war. Who that looks back upon these historical rem-iniscences, as to the pecuniary condition and necessities of the country, and the cause of that condition, can be so visionary as to suppose that a Bank of the United States could have prevented the deranged state of the currency? could have protected its own notes from depreciating? could have avoided the suspension of specie payments? have relieved the Government from the necessity of receiving its revenue in the notes of local banks? and, consequently, being exposed to and suffering the very loss which is now, with so much boldness, charged to the account of the State banks, as evidence of their unfitness to be the fiscal agents of the Government? A Bank of the United States, like all other banks, must be affected by convulsions in the political world and revolution in the world of trade. Treasury notes, issued upon the credit of the Government, and for the redemption of which all the resources of the country were pledged, we know were at a depreciation of more than 20 per cent. in the market about the close of the war, and even the Bank of the United States itself, three years after it went into operation, so far from having corrected the evils of a deranged currency, under the influence of the same causes which affected State banks, was itself, as is notorious, upon the verge of insolvency. That, in 1819, the amount of specie in its vaults was reduced to about $75,000, and, but for the extraordinary forbearance of Congress, in permitting it to retain the public deposits under such circumstances, and in failing to resort to a seire facias to repeal its charter, notwithstanding the numerous instances of violations of charter reported by the committee of the House, the bank must have stopped payment, and we would have had to bewail the existence of a much larger amount of unavailable funds in the treasury than is now so frequently relied on to prove the State banks to be unsafe.

I maintain, then, Mr. Speaker, that the State bank system, as to the deposits, is not unsafe; that it has not failed; but has been, and is now, in the "full tide of successful" prosecution.

I will trouble the House with a reference to an extract from the report of Mr. Gallatin to a committee of the Senate, in 1811, in which, after showing that, in the present state of the banking system, being now firmly established, and extending to every part of the United States, he proceeds to say that "State banks may be used, and must, in case of a non-renewal of the charter, [of the Bank of the United States,] be used by the Treasury."

It is in conformity with this opinion, from which, in 1811, there were no dissentients, that the present bill has been brought forward. I will also refer to some remarks made at that time by a gentleman who then, and ever since, has occupied a large space in the public eye, and who then had no little influence over public opinion—I mean Mr. Clay—who said: "About the commencement of this year, (1811,) there appears, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 7th January, to have been a little upwards of two millions four hundred thousand dollars in the treasury of the United States; and more than one third of this whole sum was in the vaults of the local banks.

"In several instances, where an opportunity existed of selecting the bank, a preference has been given to the State bank, or at least a portion of the deposits has been made with it;" and this, in some instances, where a branch of the United States Bank was located in the same place.

And again: "I cannot subscribe to the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, if it is meant that the ability to pay the amount of any deposits which the Government may make, under any exigency, is greater than that of the State banks," &c.; "with regard to safety, I am strongly inclined to think it is on the side of the local banks."

The Bank of the United States, it is conceded, is to be dispensed with, and it is believed that there are insuperable objections attending the only other scheme which has been brought into competition with the employment of the State banks. The very decisive vote by which that scheme (Mr. Giddens's amendment) has been rejected by the House, shows conclusively that it is not likely to receive the sanction of the House or of the people. However plausible it may be on its face, however captivating to the fancy of those who have prejudices against all banks, and who think any connexion between the Treasury and banks dangerous in a political point of view, it is easily to be perceived that these objects are not to be accomplished by the plan proposed. It is in these respects wholly delusive. Admitting the existence of the deprecated evils under the bank system, the scheme, as proposed, for disconnecting the Government and banks does not go one iota towards the accomplishment of the object. The whole effect of it would be to transfer the power of selecting the deposit banks from the Secretary of the Treasury, and confer it upon the subordinate officers of the Treasury. The money will still be deposited in the banks; for it is not proposed to compel the collectors and receivers to keep the public money in specie in their own houses; and, if it were, it would only render the scheme more indefensible; and the whole matter, therefore, ends in changing the person in whom you will repose confidence—whether in a high officer of the Government, the elevation of whose position, placing the eyes of the whole country upon him, furnishes a guarantee against any improper use of his discretion, or whether you will devolve this discretion on a mere subordinate, or upon an army of subordinates, whose livelihood depends upon their retaining their offices, who are less exposed to the public gaze, and perhaps less under the restraint of high moral considerations; who may be stimulated by a desire to propitiate the powers that be, to abuse their discretion; and whose situation is such that they may give the worst effect to this kind of influence when they choose to exert it: and all this is to be accomplished at a vast increase of expense, a considerable multiplication of officers, and a great addition to the patronage of the Executive. This scheme, then, in the present state of things, cannot be approved. And, in truth, in whatever aspect this matter can be regarded, whether as a political question or as a mere financial one, it must end in a choice between the Bank of the United States and the State banks.

Great objection is made to the employment of the State banks, on the score of the dangerous political influence which would be created. This objection is made, not only from the friends of a United States Bank, who can see no such danger in a Bank of the United States, but with more reason by the opponents of a Bank of the United States. With great apparent consistency they say they consider the Bank of the United States dangerous to the liberties of the country, and that all the objections apply with equal force to the State banks. But, Mr. Speaker, it must be recollected that the danger apprehended from the United States Bank never was supposed to arise from the incidental financial connexion between it and the Government. The power it possesses, and which is regarded by those who do so regard it as dangerous, is derived from other sources; from its immense capital, with numerous branches located in different parts of the country, all wielded by one directory, and governed by one will; making it, like the fabled Briareus, with a hundred arms, obedient to one mind and supported by one immense body. Thus constituted, it is a giant holding the public credit in its hand like a bird, which it can control or crush at pleasure.

The developments of the last year or two have given awful force to the apprehensions which had been previously indulged, of the dangerous power of such an institution, whenever it became its interest to use that power to control public opinion, or in any other way affect disastrously the credit and currency of the country. These evils are not, I think, to be apprehended from the State banks. They will derive very little aid, in point of political power and influence, from the inconsiderable proportion of the public revenue derived from the deposits, distributed as they must be amongst a great many of them. They are scattered all over the country, exist by distinct and unconnected charters of incorporations, derive their existence from the State Governments, and are themselves watched by and must keep watch upon other and rival institutions; and each and all of them having very limited capital. Under these circumstances, I must regard all that is said about the danger of a league of State banks, and the tremendous political influence and controlling patronage which is to be derived from using the State banks as places for the deposit of the public money, as entirely fanciful and deceptive.

No little hostility is displayed against the State bank system, because, somehow or other, it seems to be imagined that it is calculated very greatly to enhance the prosperity of New York, and to work in some way or other injuriously to other parts of the country; and it is vehemently assailed here and elsewhere in this spirit. Now, I am entirely at a loss to comprehend all this. The city of New York, being the great commercial emporium of the United States, the entrepot of a very large portion of our commerce, is, and must necessarily be, the place for the collection of an equivalent proportion of the revenue. But I do not well see how that should be a cause of envy, jealousy, or distrust, against New York, or against the State bank system. It is the city which feels the benefit, not the State of New York particularly: not the interior of New York, any more than the interior of Pennsylvania or of Virginia. Much revenue is received there, because much commerce comes there. But no more is received than would be received if the revenue was collected by a United States Bank, or by collectors and receivers. New York will be just as much benefited by one system as the other. We ought not if we could, and we could not if we would, deprive the city of New York of the commercial advantages derived from her natural position, and from the concentration of capital there, in pursuit of the most profitable investments of it. You have neither legislative authority nor moral power to do it.

Mr. Jefferson once said that it was idle for a Legislature to say, by law, that there should be towns where God and nature had said there should not be towns. In the same sense, I say that any efforts you can make, by your legislation, to check the growth or to arrest the prosperity of New York, will be as vain as the efforts of an infant to fetter the limbs of a giant. You cannot do it, unless you can command the winds and the waves, and vainly arrogate the power which the courtiers of Canute persuaded him he possessed, and say to the waters of the sea, thus far shalt thou come, and no farther. All those allusions, then, on this subject, and in this debate, to the particular interest which New York feels in this question, and the no less significant and equally pertinent references and sneers at the safety fund system of that State, I cannot regard but as wholly misplaced, and having very much the appearance of unworthy appeals to prejudices of the very lowest kind.

I stated in the beginning of my remarks that I was in favor of the principle of the bill. I am not only willing but desirous that some law should be passed on this subject, with such provisions as may be calculated, in the wisdom of the House, to increase the security of the public money, and restrain, define, and limit, the discretion now confided to the executive department, under the existing laws, so far as that discretion can be safely restrained. But I do not feel so much solicitude on this subject as some gentlemen display; nor do my anxieties proceed from the motives assigned by some others. Happening to be one of those who consider the present arrangement made by the Treasury Department for the employment of State banks as depositories of the public money, as authorized by law, and the long-settled interpretation of that law, frequently sanctioned by Congress, I am not animated by the sentiments which inspire those who say that the public money is now under the unlimited control of the Executive; that the President has seized the money of the country, and holds it without law and against law. Neither the President nor the Secretary of the Treasury have, or claim to have, any thing more to do with the money than to take care that it is deposited for safe keeping in proper places, and that it is faithfully and scrupulously and promptly applied to the satisfaction of the appropriations made by law, and that none of it is paid away but to satisfy such appropriations. For this purpose, the Secretary of the Treasury now, as every Secretary before him has done, has selected State banks as depositories, and upon such terms as he supposed beneficial to the public interests.

The state of things, in this respect, which exists now, has existed ever since the foundation of the Republic. If the Secretary of the Treasury now errs as to his authority under the law to do so, he errs in company with all the Secretaries who have gone before him, through the administrations of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe. When the old bank went down, in 1811, in those palmy days of genuine republicanism of the old school, to which certain politicians are in the habit of referring with exultation, and contrasting with what they esteem the political degeneracy of the present day—during the presidency of the mild and virtuous Madison—the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gallatin, made arrangements with the State banks to keep the public money, they had not the perspicacity to perceive that they were committing a flagrant encroachment on the powers of the Legislature; that they were seizing the public treasure, and might be suspected of a design to establish a league of banks for political purposes, endangering the liberties of the people. These are all discoveries of modern times. In 1812, on the 8th of January, Mr. Gallatin, in obedience to a resolution of this House, made a report to the House, showing all the details of the process by which he had consummated this grievous invasion of the laws, and this enormous outrage upon the principles of civil liberty, viz: that a Secretary of the Treasury should presume to direct in which banks the treasure should be placed for safe keeping, until it was wanted; and, strange to say, the Congress of 1812, like all other Congresses before and since, until the 1st day of October, 1833, were so dull in comprehending the laws as they are, or so indifferent to the discharge of their public duty, received and printed this report, without any exhibition of apprehension for the safety of the public money, the supremacy of the laws, or the liberties of the people. The employment of the State banks has not heretofore, is not now, and I hope never will be, used as an instrument of political power. If it was desired so to use them, I do not think the attempt would be successful to any material extent.

The power of Congress, however, to select the place of deposit by law, and to prescribe the terms of employment of the depositories, is not questioned by any body; and we may safely rely on their wisdom, and the intelligence and virtue of the people, to provide a remedy for any political evil which may be seen. But, although I do not feel so much anxiety as others profess on this subject, I am willing, and even desirous, for the purpose of satisfying all, that some bill should be adopted, regulating the deposits of the public money in the State banks, with such provisions as may be thought best calculated to promote the safety of the public money, its convenient disbursement, and to guard against any abuse of the executive department in its superintendence.

I propose to offer, at a suitable time, an amendment to the bill, in that part of it which provides that, in 1838, no bank shall be employed as a depository which issues notes under the sum of $10; and the notes of no bank which issues such notes shall be receivable in payment of Government dues. While I agree to the provision as to banks issuing notes under $5, which is to be immediately operative, I object to the prospective legislation before referred to. This is an experiment how far we can, by regulations of this description, suppress the issue of small notes, and increase the amount of specie which shall be kept in actual circulation. The object is an exceedingly desirable one, and I am willing to co-operate in effecting it, so far as we can by legislation. Its successful accomplishment, however, requires the united efforts of the States, and may be frustrated by a variety of circumstances over which we have no control. It cannot possibly be known beforehand whether the subject will be effectual, and it is better to wait and see the operation of the bill as to the notes under $5. If it be successful, it can hereafter be carried further by a new law. Our successors will be much better able than we are to decide how far it can be carried; and whether the state of things in 1838 will authorize it. This legislation in anticipation is always injudicious, when no very strong motives for it exist. It was precisely out of a species of prospective legislation, somewhat of this kind, that much of the difficulty of the contest about the deposits arose. The bank charter contained a provision by which it was declared that the deposits of the public money should be made in the Bank of the United States, with certain qualifications. It was contended that this was a contract by which all future Congresses were bound for twenty years. Whether this was truly a contract, or not, I have never given myself the trouble to discuss; for it is wholly immaterial to the question of the legality of the removal of the deposits. But, admitting it to have been of the nature of a contract, it was exceedingly unwise thus to restrain the legislative authority, even if it was not unconstitutional, as I think it was. In relation to the provision of the bill now under consideration, directing what denomination of notes should be receivable in 1838, and prescribing a rule of this sort, by which the qualification of a bank to be a depository of the Government is made, three years in advance, although not unconstitutional, it is certainly inoperative, unless to control our successors, whom we ought not thus to restrain. It may happen that Congress, in 1838, would not be willing to pass such a provision, and yet it might be impracticable to get a majority of both Houses to repeal that which we now make. For these reasons I shall propose to strike out this provision from the bill, when it is in order to do so, unless I hear some satisfactory reason why it should not be done.

I do not mean to discuss the propriety of the several amendments offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; they will, no doubt, be examined by the members of the Committee of Ways and Means, to which I presume they have been submitted, and by them considered.

Mr. E. EVERETT said he wished to offer an amendment to the bill when the proper time should arrive. He expressed his approbation of the several amendments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIXBY.] He last year voted against the bill; for he regarded it as part of an illegal system, in violation of the existing law chartering the Bank of the United States. He said, if the amendments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIXBY] were adopted, he should vote in favor of the bill. He was opposed to placing so much power as that of selecting the deposit banks in the will and discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. He was aware of the difficulty of the case; but his plan, he thought, would obviate it; and that was to place the money in those banks that would pay most for its use, all other things being equal, and taking care that it be perfectly secure. Such a provision was equitable, and he hoped would be adopted, and he should offer it hereafter to the consideration of the House.

Mr. WILDE rose to appeal to all parties, the friends of the amendments in particular, to bring the question to a close. There were only sixteen days of the session remaining, and the present discussion was arresting all the business of the country. Every speech made in favor of the amendment was virtually in favor of the previous question. The House had shown a disposition to permit the question to be taken directly on the several amendments, and he hoped the discussion would terminate.

Mr. GRAHAM offered an amendment providing that four per cent. per annum should be paid for the use of the public moneys by the banks in which they were deposited, and that the Secretary of the Treasury keep a proper book of accounts, &c. Mr. G. said: that, at this late hour, when the day is far spent, and the patience of all must be exhausted, I do not propose to detain the House, further than to explain, very briefly, the object of the proposition I have submitted. The amendment I have presented for the consideration and adoption of the House is predicated, I conceive, upon just principles and reciprocal benefits. The bill under discussion proposes to deposit hereafter all the public moneys in the local and State banks. By adverting to the last annual report and estimates of the Treasury Department, it appears that the revenue collected and accruing from all sources, during the year 1834, amounted to twenty millions six hundred and twenty-four thousand seven hundred and seventeen dollars; and the balance in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1834, was eleven millions seven hundred and two thousand nine hundred and five dollars, making an aggregate sum of thirty-two millions three hundred and twenty-seven thousand six hundred and twenty-three dollars. This large sum of money is the property of our constituents. It has been collected from the pockets of the people for governmental purposes. Now, sir, when we are about to commit the public treasure to the keeping of banks, and give them the profitable use of it, shall we not require of them to pay a reasonable interest, as a fair equivalent for the benefits which they will derive from holding and using the public deposits? We, sir, are the guardians of this trust fund, and a high sense of public duty imposes upon us the responsibility of making such a disposition of the national treasury as will secure both principal and interest, whenever the public service may need it. If the public money be deposited in the banks, without adopting this, or some similar proposition, will they not use it and loan it out? And who will derive the interests and profits accruing therefrom? Will the Government or the people? Not at all. Then who will reap the rich harvest, by enjoying the use and loaning out of the public funds? The answer is obvious: Private stockholders; the wealthy capitalists of the country! The consequence is, the people must borrow their own money of the banks, and pay interest to private persons for the privilege of using their own money. Is this not converting public property to private purposes without an adequate equivalent? The amendment I propose is neither new in principle nor in practice. I understand, from a highly respectable source, that the Scotch banks uniformly pay interest upon all their deposits. But we have this principle in successful operation nigher home.

I have learned, sir, (said Mr. G.,) from looking into the revised statutes of New York, that that great State deposits her immense revenues in such banks as pay the highest rate of interest for the use of the public money. This is as it should be. When we reflect what great advantages these banks will derive from their connexion and association with the general Government; when we bear in mind how much of character, of credit, and of confidence, will be acquired and inspired by the contemplated relation of Government agent and stockholder, which the deposit banks will hold and enjoy over their equal and rival institutions; when these fortunate banks are gathering such profitable crops, and receiving such large dividends, not upon their own means, but upon our money, I think it is quite reasonable they should pay us a small share of the proceeds. I hope, sir, the amendment will be ingrafted into the bill; and that the people may derive an interest for the use of their own treasure.

After some discussion, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BINNEY's amendment, which had been offered as a whole, was, on motion of Mr. POLK, divided into its several sections; and the question being on the first, viz: that which requires the returns from the banks to be more particular than is required by the bill, was agreed to.

The question then being on the second amendment, which requires the banks to retain an amount of specie in their vaults equal to one fourth of the whole amount of their circulation and deposits,

It was opposed by Mr. McKINLEY, and, at the request of Mr. JONES, of Georgia, was modified by Mr. BINNEY, by striking out "one fourth," and substituting "one fifth." After some discussion by Messrs. JONES, POLK, PARKER, and McKIM, Mr. BINNEY demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. CAMBRELENG opposed the amendment, which he considered as going to destroy the bill.

The question was now put, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 109, nays 99.

YEAS—Messrs. John Quincy Adams, H. Allen, John J. Allen, Chilton Allan, Archer, Ashley, Banks, Barber, Barnitz, Barringer, Bates, Baylies, Beale, Beaty, Bell, Binney, Briggs, Burd, Burges, Campbell, Carmichael, Chambers, Chilton, Claiborne, William Clark, Clayton, Clowney, Corwin, Crane, Darlington, Davis, Davenport, Deberry, Denny, Dickson, Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Ewing, Fillmore, Foster, Philo C. Fuller, Fulton, Gamble, Garland, Gholson, Gilmer, Gordon, Gorham, Graham, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hard, Hardin, James Harper, Hazeltine, Heath, Heister, William Jackson, James, Seaborn Jones, Kinnard, Luke Lea, Letcher, Lewis, Lincoln, Love, Lucas, Martindale, Marshall, McComas, McKennan, Mercer, Milligan, Miner, Moore, Phillips, Pickens, Pinckney, Plummer, Potts, Ramsay, Reed, Rencher, Robertson, Schenck, William B. Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thomson, Vanderpoel, Van Houten, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Whallon—99.

So the amendment of Mr. BINNEY, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. POPE moved a resolution making this deposit bill, and the bill transferring the books and agency of the pension fund from the Bank of the United States to the Treasury Department, the standing orders of the day until disposed of; but, before any question was taken upon it, the House, on motion of Mr. BEATY, Adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 13.

SOUTH SEA EXPEDITION.

The motion of Mr. PHILLIPS, heretofore submitted, to print 2,000 extra copies of the report and documents accompanying the bill in relation to a naval expedition to the South seas, was taken up and agreed to.

DEPOSITE BANKS.

Mr. PLUMMER moved a reconsideration of the vote of the House adopting the second amendment, moved yesterday by Mr. BINNEY, to the bill regulating the public deposits in certain local banks, requiring each bank to retain in their vaults an amount of specie equal to one fourth of the whole amount of their circulation and deposits.

Mr. POLK called for the consideration of the motion now; but it was decided to be out of order.

USE OF THE HALL.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY moved that the National Temperance Society be permitted to have the use of the hall of Representatives on Monday evening next.

It was objected to.

Mr. W. then moved to suspend the rule of the House, in order that he might be enabled to submit the motion; which was agreed to: Yeas 117, nays 37.

The motion was then submitted and agreed to: Yeas 103, nays 41.

PRIORITY OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POLK, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That bill No. 563, entitled a bill regulating the deposits of the money of the United States in certain local banks, and the bill No. 564, entitled a bill to repeal so much of the act entitled "An act transferring the duties of commissioner of loans to the Bank of the United States" as requires the Bank of the United States to perform the duties of commissioner of loans for the several States, be the standing orders of the day for this day at one o'clock, and on each succeeding day at twelve o'clock, Saturday excepted, at the same hour, until disposed of; and that, until the hour of twelve o'clock on each day, the business of the House shall proceed in the order prescribed by the rules of the House; but it shall be in order to present petitions and memorials on Mondays.

Post Office Reports—Relief of Citizens of Arkansas.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative, two thirds not voting affirmatively.

Mr. McKINLEY rose to a point of order. He asked whether the rule of the House required a vote of two thirds for the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER decided affirmatively.

POST OFFICE REPORTS.

Mr. CONNOR, from the committee appointed at the last session to investigate the affairs of the General Post Office, made a report therefrom, which he said he would move to lay on the table, without reading, unless some member should wish to have it read.

Mr. GARLAND called for the reading of the report.

Mr. CONNOR said its extreme length had induced him to propose to lay it on the table, but he would withdraw it, as the gentleman wished it to be read.

Mr. GARLAND withdrew the motion to read.

The report was then ordered to be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY, on the part of the minority of the committee, made a report on the same subject; which, on his motion, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BIGGS moved that 25,000 extra copies of each of the reports and accompanying documents be printed; which motion lies over one day.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. GILMER asked the House to take up the joint resolution offered by him in relation to an amendment of the constitution, on the subject of the election of President and Vice President, and for other purposes. His object, he said, was to have it read a second time.

An objection being made,

Mr. G. moved to suspend the rule.

Mr. DICKINSON asked the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative—150 to 56.

On motion of Mr. GILMER, the joint resolution was then read a second time, and its further consideration postponed till Thursday next, and made the special order for that day.

Mr. HANNEGAN laid on the table an amendment to the above joint resolution, providing that the Senators of the United States be elected directly by the people; which was ordered to be printed.

BOUNTY LAND TO INDIAN RANGERS.

Mr. WILLIAMS withdrew the motion which he offered yesterday for the rejection of the bill from the Committee on Public Lands, "granting a bounty in land to the organized militia men and rangers who defended the frontier during the late war with Great Britain."

The bill was then read a second time, and

Mr. CASEY moved that it be committed to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. CARR asked the yeas and nays on that motion, and they were ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

VIVA VOCE ELECTIONS.

Mr. REYNOLDS moved that all business be postponed, in order to proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him on the 24th of December, requiring all elections of the House to be made viva voce; but it was objected to.

Mr. EVANS moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day, and the motion was agreed to.

The House then took up and made an appropriate disposition of a great number of bills. The bill for the

RELIEF OF CITIZENS OF ARKANSAS,

Who lost property by a treaty with the Choctaws, was taken up, and, after the adoption of some amendments,

A debate arose on the bill. It was opposed with vehemence by Mr. VINTON, of Ohio, who went into a history of the circumstances of the case, and remonstrated against rewarding, with a donation of one hundred and sixty acres, men whose only merit was the having trespassed on the public land, and refused to leave what they had seized, until compelled by military force.

Mr. SEVIER replied, as warmly, adverting to the uniform policy of the Government in granting pre-emption rights to those who had thus settled on the public domain; and contended that it was a right belonging to all citizens thus to settle until the land was sold to individuals. He also adverted to the circumstances in which the bill originated. Those who had resisted the power of the Government, and had been removed by force, had received a larger grant than was by the bill claimed for those who had removed without dispute. The Government had seized their farms, and given them to the Choctaws; and this bill was only to remunerate them, though not to the same amount with the extent of their loss. These squatters were his particular friends, and he meant to stick to them.

Relief of Citizens of Arkansas.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. BURGESS replied. He considered squatting as a vile term; but he used it because it had been sanctioned by practice. In his opinion, it amounted to something very like stealing. It was true, pre-emptions had been granted to those who, in the early days of our country, had put their lives in their hand, and exposed themselves to the tomahawk of the savage. But these men had gone in profound peace upon lands not theirs, without any danger, and from a mere selfish desire of property. He went into a denunciation of such a practice, and dwelt upon the bad policy of encouraging it. If the farms of these claimants had been seized for public use, let there be a board to examine and ascertain the facts, and report on the justice of their claims. The bill amounted to an abandonment of our land system.

Mr. EWING, of Indiana, replied to Mr. VINTON, and reminded him of the early settlement of Ohio, the Connecticut grant, Symmes's purchase, &c. He insisted that the citizens of Indiana and other new States should now enjoy advantages which were formerly possessed by Ohio. He then went into an eulogium on the squatters generally, who thus obtained better homes than many of them had enjoyed in Rhode Island. The new States were aware of their rights, and if they were refused here, they would resort to another course, not so agreeable to Rhode Island and Ohio, and to which they ought not to be driven. Government could use the squatter to protect it in times of war; but, after seizing his house and little piece of land, it turned them off to cover themselves with the bark of the oak, and take any other course they pleased. Claims in the East could be granted to the amount of millions; but the poor squatter was cast aside because he was ignorant of technical rules of evidence.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Missouri, said that the right of the poorer people of the United States, who could not purchase land on the seaboard, to go to the West and get homes for themselves, had been recognised, and ever would be, by the public sentiment, though it might be denied on this floor. He dwelt on the useful services of these pioneers in opening and improving the wilderness, and in defending the country in time of war. But apart from this general view, he insisted on the equity of the bill in granting land to men who had peaceably quitted their homes when required by their Government, after others, who had resisted desperately, had received a larger amount.

Mr. HARDIN moved to amend the bill by confining the selection to land subject to entry.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said that the gentleman from Arkansas, when in robust health, was at least a match for all who could oppose the policy of the bill, but his health being at this time impaired, Mr. M. would explain the grounds on which the bill rested. He then went into the history of the origin of the measure which had driven these squatters from their improvements, although entitled to a pre-emption right, and of the compensation which had been allowed to the persons thus removed; and dwelt upon the equitable claim of those who had quietly obeyed the order of Government over such as had resisted it; yet the latter got much more than was now proposed to be conferred on these claimants.

Mr. VINTON responded—recited again the ground he had before taken, but admitted that, if these settlers were entitled to a pre-emption right, the case was changed, and that they ought to be requited by pre-emption rights elsewhere. But he doubted exceedingly that they had the smallest right to the land. He then went on to vindicate his course as a vigilant sentinel over the public property, whether in money, land, ships, or other things. The public lands were held in trust, and the charge was of a sacred character. He then replied to the allegations which had been brought against his State; went into the details of Symmes's purchase, &c., denying that the settlers on that tract had ever been squatters; but, on the contrary, had paid both Symmes and the Government. He then went into a history of the speculations of the Scioto Company. Three hundred French families, who had paid 100,000 crowns in Paris for their lands, were driven from their property, save a few who were too poor to remove, and these had received land from the Government, yet were losers, not gainers, by the transaction. He insisted that this was a far different case from that of the Arkansas settlers. He detailed the circumstances of the first grant to these latter, as originally moved by Mr. BAXTON, in the Senate; and he concluded by insisting that, if such persons were to be rewarded, the public domain had better be relinquished.

Mr. BURGESS replied, with much severity, to the remarks of Mr. EWING, who seemed to boast of being the Representative of men who seized what did not belong to them. So let him: "Like master, like man." But he protested against such a charge upon men of Rhode Island, who had gone into Indiana. They had all paid for their land. He protested against the charge upon the old States of opposing poor men getting a home; but they endeavored to furnish him with employment at home. If he chose to chase bright visions in the West, they did not hinder him; but they were utterly opposed to seizing lands, without title or without price. Mr. B. dwelt with delight upon the value and importance of the Western domain, as the resource of the Union for the most valuable public interests. But if the practices now growing common in relation to it should proceed, it was time the Government abandoned the whole.

Mr. PARKER thought, if these settlers had a fair claim, it ought to be stated and proved under the investigation of a committee, and paid them in money. Let them be paid out of the treasury; he meant the treasury of money; for the United States had two treasuries, one of money, and the other of land. One had a key, the other none. If a man wanted land, it was only for somebody to move, and he got 120 or 160, or 640 or 1,280 acres; almost whatever he chose to ask. He wanted all claimants put upon a level, and all losses proved by the same evidence.

Mr. CROCKETT supported the bill, and was in favor of giving a home to every man who would pay for the survey. These were the men on whom the country could rely, and nothing would make them so love the country. A gentleman had said the country had two treasuries, one with a key, and the other none; but he believed there was no key to either. There was nothing in the President's message pleased him so much as the recommendation of giving homes to poor settlers. He began to think the President was almost turning a Crockett man.

Mr. HANNEGAN said he did not rise so much for the purpose of debating the merits of the bill under consideration, as of replying to and repelling the unwarrantable and insidious aspersions so unjustly cast upon the Western country by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURGESS;] aspersions for which no cause could be assigned, no reason found in what was then pending before the House, or had been previously uttered in debate; charges the most extraordinary that he had ever heard uttered on that floor, and without the shade of provocation. To them, however, and to the gentleman from Rhode Island, he would not reply in the spirit that had dictated that gentleman's wanton reproaches upon a race of people about whom he knew nothing, and to whose habits he would, in all likelihood, for ever continue a stranger. Mr. H. said his surprise had been increased, when he reflected from what quarter this attack came; from one whose sectional attachments, if we are to judge by what has often escaped him, are as strong as man's can be. One whose tongue was never silent when New England was assailed; whose eloquence had so often stirred his auditory, not only on that floor, but elsewhere, in repelling the thrusts made at the land of "the Pilgrim fathers."

For the love borne by the honorable gentleman to his native land, for his defence of her, for his devotion to her interests, he (Mr. H.) honored him. But, sir, is it not strange to hear from such a source a wanton violation of those very feelings in others, which he professes to hold so sacred in himself? Can we credit the sincerity of his professions of attachment to his own home, when, with cold, unfeeling levity, he openly mocks at the attachment of others? Can such a man be sincere? Are not his professions false and hollow?

The invidious remark of the gentleman, in replying to the honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. Mason,] "that he would not have expected so much of the demagogue from one so near the waters of the Potomac; that it was better suited to the West, where stumps were plenty," however it might answer the views of the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, in making his court to Virginia, was by no means calculated to heighten him individually in the estimation of the House, or to elevate his character before the country for candor and justice. For the purpose of exposing the injustice of the remark, so obvious to all, it will be unnecessary to institute any comparisons, resort to any appeal, make any reference to times past or present. What the West was, all the world knew; what her sons were, had been tried in the hour of difficulty, of danger, and of death. Promptly responsive to their country's call in the moment of her necessity, when girt around by enemies, they had not, they would not, no, God forbid that they ever should, stop to inquire whether her cause was right or wrong, after the sword had once been drawn, the standard unfurled, and the shrill bugle sounded the rally for her defence. To the call of their whole country they had promptly responded, as a body; in defence of their own loved "West," as individuals, they would be equally prompt, whenever occasion required a sacrifice or a hazard at their hands, for the maintenance of her honor or her interests.

Who would have recognised to-day in the scornful contemner of the habits and the customs of a large portion of the Western people, the same individual who, on some former occasion, has so feelingly and beautifully pictured out his own New England, her smiling fields, her admirable institutions, her evidences of devotion to the common cause of liberty in other times! And true it is she has them; her Bunker's Hill, her Bennington; and not these alone, but with equal pride cannot the West turn to her evidences of devotion to the same holy cause? Has she not her New Orleans, her Tippecanoe, her Thames, her Raisin, where the blood of her best, her noblest sons flowed freely out, an offering before the high altar of the whole, the common country? The hour will never come when her sons shall look with coldness or indifference on these fields, or regard with feelings other than those of holy pride the oft-repeated instances of her attachment to the cause of liberty, and the Union. What, (said Mr. H.,) is it a reproach to have sprung from the "West," that "West" whom her sons love so well, whose very name stirs up their hearts, quickens their pulses, as the name of a fond mother in whose lap they have been nurtured? To her they ever turn with fond affection, thankful to God that their eyes had opened first in her unsullied retreats; that first they had seen the sun shine down on her free and green hill-tops above, and their waters roll on their way through her rich and beautiful valleys below. And this pride, and this love, every true son she has will carry with him through life, the dearest of all cherished affections—the deepest imbedded in his heart; he will carry it to every country, to every climate, where destiny may cast him. It will cease—it will be lost—and lost only, when the grave closes over the last throbbings of earthly attachment.

The remark of the gentleman, intended so sarcastically to be felt in this House, at the expense of my colleague, [Mr. Ewins,] when he treats him as the specimen of the people he represents, and with indecent levity aims to excite a transitory mirth by the infliction of a deadly wound, not upon his (Mr. E's) feelings, but the character of those from amongst whom he comes, is what I had not expected from the gentleman—it would almost seem to be consistent only with the workings of a heart whose malevolence seeks for its gratification the miseries of others. I would offer no rebuke to the gentleman from Rhode Island; his years are many, his hairs are white, and thinned by time—mine are the reverse—the contrast checks in me that oppression of feeling which swells almost too high for control. But that intended sarcasm carried with it a compliment the highest that I would ask at the hands of mortal man—I would ask no more than to be regarded as the personified delineation of the courage, the generosity, the honor, and the chivalry, of that people in the midst of whom I first drew breath, and surrounded by whom I have grown to manhood.

A few remarks concerning the people whom the honorable gentleman is pleased to designate as "land robbers," "thieves," "depredators," whose offences, morally, fall nothing short of the crime of larceny. It requires no little stretch of imagination to recognise, under these epithets, that industrious portion of our community in the West, numbers of whom have emigrated from New England, and who, being without the means of purchasing, have become, with their families, the actual occupants of small portions of the soil, for which they ask no other favor than a pre-emption right, at the minimum price of the Government. Far different are the feelings by which they have been led to make for themselves a home, their families a shelter and a subsistence. It is their aversion to the very crimes of which the gentleman speaks that has induced them to leave the older and the compactly settled portions of the country, where even industry is pinched too often by want, and to brave the exposures, the severities, and the hardships, incident to the life of him who goes into the bosom of the forest, depending upon his axe for the roof that must shelter, and upon his rifle for the food that must furnish, not him alone, but those to whom nature has given the dearest and holiest claims upon his exertions and his existence. They have gone to avoid the miserable condition of the thousands who are now lingering about the purlieus of the large cities, pressed by want, struggling with famine and cold, the honesty of whose hearts has been crushed, the firmness of whose integrity has finally bowed before the fierce influence of hunger and necessity, and who have been forced to sustain existence by continued depredations upon the persons and property around them, and, living alone by plunder and pillage, have sunk into all the excesses of crime. These same miserable outlaws, had their lot been cast amongst the class so bitterly contemned by the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, would have presented a far different picture of humanity—one more grateful to the heart that looks with benevolence upon the race of human kind.

With all the attachment borne by the gentleman from Rhode Island for his own State, and the high opinion he has of her working population, I think the contrast between their condition and that of the backwoodsmen—the squatter, to use that word which sounds, as the gentleman says, so horrid to his ears—will present, even to his view, a picture more favorable to the latter. Take the class who labor for subsistence in the large manufacturing institutions, and what does that labor produce to them, at the end of each week, more than will barely answer the pressing demands for food and raiment? Successive years of labor will find them still the same—no increase of stores—no addition of comforts; far less of wealth or substance. The scanty pittance is expended, week by week, as it is earned. Wearied with his endless drudgery, and its miserable recompense, the laborer of years at last turns his eyes to the far off West—that land of promise, whose harvests, fame tells him, are golden—whose lands yield almost spontaneously to the wants of man. He seeks in her bosom the truth of the tale that has lured him, the reality of the vision that has flitted so often over his doubting senses. Is that vision confirmed? Is that tale the tale of truth? Has the land of promise been reached, and its harvests found ripening in the head? Wait the lapse of a few, a very few short years, and then seek the answer of the pilgrim himself. He will give it you beneath his own roof—he who sought the land of the stranger on foot, with scarcely the means of a dinner in his pocket, will furnish forth the comforts of his habitation. Humble it may be to the dweller in cities, but with comfort it abounds, and within is peace, and health, and plenty; and without, the eye is greeted by the beautiful and waving crop, and the grazing herds may be traced by the distant glade. It is his own, all his own; the fruit, the labor of his hands, and with cheerful delight he gazes over his farm, and feels, with honest pride, the independence of a freeholder. However kind may be the recollections with which memory visits the parent land, that memory is unclouded with regret, for he has exchanged toil for rest, penury for plenty, servitude for freedom. If Rhode Island, as often happens, has been his early home, the change is even greater; the cause of his rejoicing still more increased, for the high instrument, the paramount law which secures and guarantees his right as a man, his privileges and his protection as a citizen, is no longer a royal charter, a grant carrying with it the degrading evidence of a monarch's rule, the humiliating admission that his kingly condescension had more wisely provided for freedom than freemen themselves could. No, he has exchanged the government of this charter for a constitution, formed, perfected, adopted, in all its parts, by the people themselves; created at their will, based upon their confidence, and sustained by their affection, an honored and living commentary upon the great principle of human equality.

It is such men as I have described that have this day fallen under the denunciation of the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, and whom he thinks it would be discreditable to represent on this floor. For my own part, I am proud to acknowledge that such are many of my constituents, and I apprehend they would lose but little by any comparison that might be instituted between their moral condition, and that of the people of Rhode Island, or elsewhere. The very industry which they practise in acquiring for themselves a home is a sufficient compensation to the Government for her land, as it increases their attachment to her, by extending their interest in the soil. What constitutes the wealth, the reliance, the boast of any nation, but its population? What is the great and paramount object of all Government, if it is not the promotion of happiness and security among its people? Of all Governments that have existed, ours professes in the highest degree, and is, beyond doubt, in the outline, best calculated to promote the end desired. Yet, with all its advantages, much of the machinery may be, and is practically, misapplied.

We are doing what no good Government besides has ever done, and what is to be hoped will soon be eradicated from our system—we are making the public domain of the country a matter of speculation and profit upon our own citizens, for the purpose of increasing the Treasury spoils that are annually divided out on this floor. Instead of this course, were we to portion, in limited parcels, the whole domain as it might become settled by the class of people against whom the anathema of the honorable gentleman has been directed; were we to divide it amongst all the industrious poor of the whole country, willing to become its tenants, and reap its harvests, how much would not the sum of human happiness be raised? How immeasurably would the true wealth of the nation be increased?

But to this the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, and those who act with him on the main question involving the public lands, have an objection so deep—to the selfish politician so strong—that, notwithstanding the covert under which they would fain hide the true cause, no occasion passes without its exhibition. And this cause, and this alone, I do from the bottom of my heart believe has prompted the open and violent assault of the honorable gentleman to day, upon a whole race of people.

It is the fact, that political power and strength is gliding too rapidly from the East to the West. The population of the latter, growing in number, and directing all their energies to the development of the many resources kindly provided by nature, presents a scene of advancing power that has kindled up the jealousy of some in the Eastern section, who can view only the dark side of the picture—their own downfall in the prosperity of others. Sir, it will be all in vain; no checks can now restrain the growing prospect of the great valley of the West. Her march is steady, sure, and onward.

Against the very kind suggestions of the gentleman, that the proceeds from the sales of the public lands should be taken and distributed amongst the different States, for the purpose of educating all the children of the country, I would beg leave to protest, on many accounts. One reason, however, will be sufficient at this time. I do not wish to see Rhode Island raising the means for the education of her children out of the soil of Indiana. Let her raise those means at home; let her educate her own children with her own means, and we will educate our children in the same way. We will teach them the proper duties of the citizen; instil into them a pure love of the free institutions of their country; a readiness to defend them when assailed by outward foes, ay, or by intestine traitors; a just regard, too, for the feelings of all mankind: in a word, we will teach them all that man should be; just so much, and no more; and it will be well for the fame of Rhode Island, should the same course be hers in time to come.

Mr. Speaker, I have done. The rhetorical flourish of the gentleman in behalf of the poor Indian requires no answer; its use for sympathy, or ornament, in setting off a speech, however it might suit, were the Indians concerned in the matter before the House, is now of little avail either way, being entirely out of place. To the merits of that class, for a portion of whom the benefits of the bill under consideration are intended, I have borne and can bear every testimony that honest industry deserves. The bill itself has my hearty wishes for its success, and shall therefore most cordially and cheerfully have my vote.

Mr. HUBBARD, after some remarks on the character of the debate, and the difference of opinion as to the facts of the bill, expressed himself desirous of further examining them, and therefore moved an adjournment; which prevailing,

The House thereupon adjourned.

Territorial Bills.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14.

After the reading of the journal,

Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts, requested permission of the House to say a few words not connected with any motion or petition, but by way of explanation. In this request he had two objects in view: the one of a personal nature, the other of considerable interest to the community. It would probably be recollected that on this day week he had offered a resolution in relation to certain documents which he had moved for, and which, when obtained from the Executive, had been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. His resolution had proposed that this reference be accompanied with instructions to that committee to report forthwith, on that part of the annual message of the President of the United States to Congress, at the commencement of this session, which relates to the state of our affairs with France.

In the course of the observations he had submitted on that occasion, the expression had escaped him that the other branch of the Legislature, after deliberating fully and thoroughly on the subject-matter of the President's communication, had come unanimously to a determination "to dodge the question." It would be remembered that the Speaker of the House had arrested him at the moment, referring to that rule of the House which forbids any reference to proceedings in the other House of Congress. By thus arresting him, the Speaker (without any such intention, no doubt) had deprived him of the means of explaining. Mr. A. had submitted, and taken his seat in silence; but it had struck him as very hard that he should have been arrested on a mere formal rule of order, a rule which was violated every day by every member of the House, for a mere reference to the proceedings of the other branch of the Legislature. He had, consequently, inquired privately of the Speaker, why he had been thus called to order for doing what was allowed to other members every day. The Speaker had replied that it had not been on the ground of a reference to what had been done in the Senate, but of the manner of that reference; because the word he had employed was understood by the Speaker as disrespectful to that body. Mr. A. had replied to this, that it had seemed to him peculiarly unfortunate, when it had been merely his manner, and not the allusion he had made, on which he had been arrested and called to order, and thus precluded from making an explanation. That explanation he now wished to make, publicly disclaiming all intention of any thing disrespectful to the Senate. He disclaimed it in the most explicit manner; and, had the debate proceeded, it had been his intention ultimately to recommend that the same course should be taken by the House. He should have recommended the House to "dodge the question" for the present, in the existing state of our information. Mr. A. expressed his regret to learn that some of the members of the Senate had felt hurt at the expression he had used. He now, in the most public and explicit manner, declared that it had been far, very far, from his intention to inflict any wound upon their feelings. He thought that the Senate had acted as it was their duty to do, and the conclusion to which they had unanimously arrived was the conclusion which he should have been desirous that the House should adopt. But the Senate had acted; they had not gone to sleep on the state of our relations with France; and he wanted the House to show, by requiring its committee to do what every committee ought to do, that they were not sleeping over the rights, honor, and dignity of the country. This was the explanation he had desired to make on this part of the subject.

But there was another subject, far more important. He had been advised, by information from the great emporium of commerce, the city of New York, that considerable commercial excitement had been caused there, not by the action of this House, but by the remarks made by himself, or by what was called the stand he had taken; and he had seen paragraphs in newspapers, representing that such had been the effect that the holders of French goods, as well in New York as in Philadelphia, had advanced the prices of those goods in consequence. He regretted exceedingly any such effect. He should scarcely have believed it possible that such an effect could have followed from what took place in the House on that occasion. He should have supposed that the merchants of New York and Philadelphia would have drawn their inferences, not from what had been said in the House by any member, much less by himself, but rather from the action of the House itself; and whatever may, on the other day, have been his martial propensities, or however they may have been most erroneously misrepresented, he should suppose that reference would rather have been had to what the House did than to what had been said by him. Now, the fact had been, as the Speaker and the House would recollect, that Mr. A. had not been supported in his motion by any one party in the House. The House, so far from agreeing to his motion, had rejected it by a large majority, and had declined even to indulge him in his request for the yeas and nays.

This had been published to all the world; it was universally known; and he could not therefore have conceived it possible that such an effect could have been produced by any remarks made under such circumstances by him. But, in conclusion, Mr. A. wished to give notice (if such notice could be necessary) to all merchants of the United States, that there was not the slightest danger that any thing which might by possibility lead to war should proceed either from that House or from the other branch of the Legislature. He now said, upon his responsibility, to the nation, that there was no danger of any thing being done by either House which might by possibility lead to war with France.

He therefore trusted that the merchants would consent to reduce to their former level the prices of their lustrings, silks, and ribands, for the ornament of the ladies' dresses for the fancy balls, and not distress them by very unnecessary aggravations of price. God forbid that Mr. A. should be instrumental in taxing the ladies for the ornaments of their beauty.

TERRITORIAL BILLS.

Mr. C. ALLAN, from the Committee on Territories, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That this House will, on Tuesday next, take up and consider bills relating to the Territories.

Mr. POLK moved to strike out Tuesday, and insert Friday.

Mr. WARDWELL said that the adoption of the amendment would be equivalent to a determination not to do any more business of a private nature, (on claims, relief bills, &c.) this session.

After a word or two from Mr. POLK, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE moved to include in the motion the bill to fix the northern boundary line of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

Mr. ALLAN said the effect of such an amendment would be to give the go-by to the whole of the territorial business at this session.

Mr. ASHLEY remarked that much of the territorial business had been on the table since the last session, and expressed the hope that the House would agree to consider it.

Mr. ALLEN, of Ohio, earnestly urged the necessity of settling the boundary line between Ohio and Michigan.

Territorial Bills.

[H. OF R.]

After some further remarks from Messrs. ASHLEY, WHITE, of Florida, and LYON, of Michigan, Mr. McKIM called for the orders of the day; but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. WILDE, who moved a reconsideration of the vote of this morning, agreeing to the resolution offered by Mr. CARR JOHNSON.

After a few words from Messrs. ASHLEY, CLAY, and JOHNSON,

The motion to reconsider was agreed to, and the farther consideration of the resolution was, on motion of Mr. ASHLEY, postponed to Monday next.

Mr. PLUMMER, by leave of the House, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be communicated to this House the construction which the proper department or departments of the executive branch of the general Government place upon the twelfth section of the act of March 3, 1803, regulating the grants and providing for the sale of lands of the United States south of Tennessee; the act of March 1, 1817, enabling the people of the western part of Mississippi Territory to form a constitution and State Government, and the treaties of Pontatock and Washington, made with the Chickasaw tribe of Indians, so far as relates to the rights of the inhabitants of each township to the sixteenth section for the use of schools, and the right of the Government of Mississippi to five per cent. of the proceeds of the sale of the lands for purposes of internal improvement within that district of country ceded to the United States by the aforesaid tribe of Indians, at the treaty of Pontatock creek, made on the 22d of October, 1832; and whether, in the opinion of the Executive, the treaty-making power of the United States has or has not placed a specific performance of the compact made with the people of Mississippi beyond the control of the general Government, and whether any legislation of Congress is deemed necessary to enable the Government to carry into effect, in good faith, either of the provisions of the act of 1803, relating to the sixteenth section, and the act of 1817, relating to the five per cent., or the stipulations contained in the aforesaid treaties with the Chickasaws.

Mr. P. said, as early in the history of our Government as 1785, Congress adopted the policy of granting to the inhabitants located upon the public lands, section No. 16, in each township, for the maintenance of public schools, which will be found on an examination of the ordinance for the disposal of the public lands in the Western Territory. Neither the propriety nor expediency of that policy, which has become ingrafted into our land system, have ever been questioned by the most fastidious opponents of the interests of the new States. One of the propositions, and the first enumerated in the act to enable the people of Ohio to form a constitution and State Government, offered to them for their acceptance or rejection, was, that section No. 16, in every township, should be granted to the inhabitants thereof for the use of schools, unless previously disposed of; and, in that event, other lands equivalent thereto, and most contiguous, were granted in lieu thereof for that purpose. The twelfth section of the act of March 3, 1803, extended the same provisions to the people inhabiting the district of country south of Tennessee, including the present State of Mississippi. The act of March 1, 1817, to enable the people of the western part of the Mississippi Territory to assemble in convention and form a constitution and State Government, required of them, as a condition precedent to an admission into the Union on an equal footing with the other States of the confederacy, to provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, "That they for ever disclaim all right or title to the waste or unappropriated lands lying within the said Territory, and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; and, moreover, that each and every tract of land sold by Congress shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by the order, or under the authority, of the State, whether for State, county, township, parish, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the respective days of the sales thereof; and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States, residing without the said State, shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to persons residing thereon; and that no taxes shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and that the river Mississippi, and the navigable rivers and waters leading into the same, or into the Gulf of Mexico, shall be common highways, and for ever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said State as to other citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll, therefor, imposed by the said State."

The inhabitants of each township within that district of country had already a vested right to the 16th section for the use of schools, under the provisions of the act of 1803. That was one of the considerations which induced the convention to relinquish those important attributes of sovereignty inherent in the people of every State or nation. Another was, that five per cent. of the nett proceeds of all the lands lying within the limits of the said Territory, which should be sold by Congress from and after the 1st day of December, 1817, should be reserved for the making of roads and canals within and leading to said State. The people of Mississippi complied with the requisitions of Congress, and on those terms she was admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the other members of the confederacy. Mississippi has adhered strictly to the provisions of the ordinance in every minute particular. The federal Government has also, I admit, acted in good faith towards that State, so far as regards the lands to which the Indian title was then extinguished, and the lands subsequently ceded by the Choctaw tribe of Indians. The question now is, whether the treaty-making power of the general Government have or have not placed a specific performance of the contract beyond her control, by a subsequent contract or treaty made with the Chickasaws. The first article of the treaty of Pontatock creek, made between the commissioners on the part of the United States and the Chickasaw nation of Indians, on the 22d day of October, 1832, and ratified by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, on the 1st day of March, 1833, cedes to the United States unconditionally "all the land which they own on the east side of the Mississippi river." The moment of the ratification of the treaty, the State of Mississippi had a vested right to the section numbered sixteen in each township, for the benefit of the inhabitants of such township, under the provisions of the act of 1803. The second article of the treaty stipulates for the survey and sale of the country, and reads as follows:

"The United States agree to have the whole country thus ceded, surveyed, as soon as it can be conveniently done, in the same manner that the public lands of the United States are surveyed in the States of Mississippi and Alabama, and, as soon thereafter as may be practicable, to have the same prepared for sale. The President of the United States will then offer the land for sale at public auction, in the same manner and on the same terms and conditions as the other public lands; and such of the land as may not sell at the public sales shall be offered at private sale, in the same manner that other private sales are made of the United States lands."

As soon as the land is sold in the manner prescribed

in this article, that State will also have a right to appropriate three fifths of this five per cent. fund to the objects mentioned in the compact or act of admission, and to demand that the residue of two fifths should be appropriated by Congress in good faith to the Government of Mississippi. These rights on the part of Mississippi did not originate in the treaty with the Chickasaws, nor are they derived from any act of Congress since the admission of Mississippi into the Union; but they were granted to, or more appropriately reserved to, the Government of that State by the compact formed between her and the United States on her admission into the Union, in consideration of her relinquishing a portion of her inherent and sovereign rights to the general Government. Every compact or agreement between sovereign States is a treaty. The right of soil and taxation, which Mississippi yielded to the general Government, are admitted to be rights of sovereignty. These rights, which existed prior to the treaty with the Chickasaws and the survey of the lands, lay dormant in the State of Mississippi, and could not, according to a construction put on the compact by universal consent, be exercised by her until after the relinquishment of the possessory right of the Indians to the United States. The right of the State to the sixteenth section for the use of the inhabitants of each township becomes active, and may be exercised, as soon as the country is surveyed; and the right to the five per cent. accrues as soon as the land is sold. The third article of the treaty provides for the payment of all the money arising from the sale of those lands over to the Chickasaw nation, after deducting the amount of the necessary expenses. None of the lands have yet been sold by the general Government, nor have they all been surveyed. I will not be understood as intimating that it is not the intention of the general Government to comply strictly, in good faith, with every part of her agreement with Mississippi, either express or implied, made on the admission of that State into the federal Union. Inasmuch, however, as there is no express reservation made in the treaty of Pontotock, of the sixteenth section from sale, nor provision for the payment over to the State of the per cent. claimed by Mississippi, I feel it my duty, for the purpose of preventing any collision hereafter between that State and the general Government, to assert at this time her rights. Another reason for moving thus early in the matter, is the information I have received, from an authentic source, of the intention of the authorities of the Chickasaw nation to claim from the general Government a specific performance of the contract with them—that is, a sale of all the lands, without reservation of the sixteenth section, and the payment over to them of the whole of the nett proceeds of the sales, without regard to the rights of Mississippi. If the Chickasaws were ignorant of the existing rights of Mississippi, at the time they made the treaty, and understood that the whole of the ceded territory was to be sold, and all the proceeds paid over to them, the faith of the Government is pledged to give them an indemnity.

If a question should arise before the judicial tribunals of the country as to the validity of the two instruments, (I mean the compact with the people of Mississippi and the treaty with the Indians,) the decision must necessarily be in favor of the State. If it should be admitted, for the sake of argument, that the Chickasaw tribe of Indians were vested with treaty-making powers; that is, they were a sovereign and independent nation, which is necessary to authorize them to make a treaty, it could not be contended that either they, or the general Government, or both together, had the power to annul or change a treaty made with a sovereign State, so as to abridge, or in any manner affect, her sovereign rights, or the individual rights of her citizens. It is desirable, on the part of Mississippi, that she should know what course the general Government intends to pursue, in order that she may demean herself accordingly.

The resolution, according to the rules of the House, lies one day on the table.

COMPENSATION TO R. P. LETCHER.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, from the Committee of Elections, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That Robert P. Letcher, having been returned as the rightful member of the House of Representatives of the United States from the fifth congressional district of Kentucky, is entitled to compensation as a member of the last and present session.

Mr. HARDIN said the House knew very well that, last session, he entertained and expressed the opinion that Mr. Letcher was elected as a Representative in Congress from the State of Kentucky. But the House had determined that the proof was so complicated and obscure, they could not come to any conclusion on the subject; and they therefore referred the matter back to the people, not to examine the records as to the fact, but to make a new election. Both of the candidates were brought here, and detained here, by order of the House, although the House finally determined that they could not tell which of them was elected. His own opinion was, under all the circumstances, that both of the candidates ought to be paid, or neither of them. Some delicacy, on their part, prevented them, last session, from accepting any pay; but now, unless the House paid both, as he thought they ought to do, he would not agree to pay either. He therefore moved to embrace within the terms of the resolution Thomas P. Moore.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON said he hoped the amendment would prevail. The gentleman who had just sat down had fully spoken his sentiments on the subject.

Mr. WILDE asked the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, suggested to the gentleman who had moved the amendment, that it would be best to leave each case to rest on its own merits. He thought both of the gentlemen ought to be paid, but he was not willing to embarrass either claim by connecting them together.

Mr. McKIM here renewed the motion which he had suspended for the orders of the day, and the motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE REPORTS.

Mr. BRIGGS asked the consent of the House to take up the motion which he had offered yesterday, to print 25,000 extra copies of the reports of the majority and minority of the Post Office investigation committee, together with the accompanying documents.

Objections being made,

Mr. BRIGGS moved the suspension of the rule; which motion was agreed to, 114 to 18.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution,

Mr. SPEIGHT, who had yesterday moved to print 10,000, said he was not aware when he made that motion that the documents were so voluminous as they in fact were. He was satisfied that they could not be printed within any reasonable time, and that they must be divided into different parts. When it was considered that the newspapers would publish such parts as they chose of the reports and documents, and that in that way they would obtain a general circulation, he thought a much less number of copies than that which he had proposed would be deemed sufficient. He moved 5,000 copies.

Mr. BRIGGS said, if he varied his motion at all, it would be for the purpose of increasing the number first proposed by him. The gentleman said that the newspapers would print as much of these reports as would answer their purposes; but, in this way, the whole matter of this interesting subject could not be laid before the people of the United States. For several years past, no subject had obtained more interest among the people than this. The people of the United States still viewed it with intense interest. The documents related to one of the Departments of the general Government; one which reached every town and country in the Union; a Department which had been charged with gross mismanagement of its affairs, and with having expended the people's money for wrong purposes. This House had appointed a select committee to investigate the subject, and the gentleman who was placed at its head was the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, a decided friend to the administration. This committee commenced their duties in September last; had prosecuted the investigation with great patience and labor, and had now laid before the House the results to which they had arrived. How was the country to avail itself of these results? Was it to be done in any other way than by printing the reports and documents? The gentleman from North Carolina said that the documents were voluminous. But what did they contain? They contained the whole history of the operations of this Department. And was the expense of printing to be an objection to laying them before the public? The committee had come to results which would fill with regret the people, and the whole people, of this country. The people of all parts of the country looked to this House for information, and full information, on the subject. He, himself, he said, had had more calls for these documents than for any which had been printed this session. He would repeat, then, that, if he were to vary his motion at all, it would be for the purpose of increasing the number moved by him. Unless we printed a large number, the people never would get the information they contained. As to the newspapers, they would do what the gentleman had said they would do, publish such parts of the reports and documents as suited their purposes.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY said he wished to remark, in reply to the gentleman from North Carolina, that the documents accompanying the reports would not be so voluminous as the gentleman seemed to suppose. A sub-committee had been appointed to examine the papers and select such as it might be thought proper to print. That sub-committee had not yet reported, but he had no hesitation in saying that there was a great mass of documents which it would be unnecessary to publish. In relation to the extent of the documents which it might be found necessary to print, he could not speak with certainty; but the main fact was conceded, that, in both reports, the facts which were necessary to their proper understanding were referred to. He expressed a hope that this debate would not prematurely lead the House into a discussion of the affairs of the Post Office Department.

Mr. BYNUM would feel, he said, that he was unfaithful to his duty, should he attempt to exclude from the people any portion of the information which was necessary for them; but it was notorious that this House had made most profuse and extravagant expenditures in printing what was unnecessary. On divers occasions he had opposed the printing of documents not more than one half of which were ever, as he was well satisfied, sent from the Capitol. In his opinion, not more than one half or two thirds of the documents now proposed to be printed would ever be sent off. Go, said he, into your folding rooms, and into almost every shop, and you will there find many of these public documents which members did not take the trouble to send out. If we were going to put a stop to the extravagant expenses of the Government, let us, he said, set the example in this House. Here there was more extravagance in the use of public money than in any of the executive departments, and it frequently met with the support of those who were most clamorous about the expenditures of the Government. The American people did not look wholly to this House to be enlightened by the documents proceeding from it; for there were public presses throughout the country, from which the people could obtain the information. It was true that gentlemen could furnish their friends with the documents; but the number thus distributed would not be more than a drop in the bucket, in comparison with the actual demands of the community. Gentlemen thought there was no way to inform the people but to send the documents to their doors. But we could not attempt to do that to any extent. All that it was proposed to do was to print a certain number, even which number, he would venture to say, would never be distributed among the people. Did we not, he said, constantly see the little boys that attend us, picking up from the floor and removing large numbers of those useless documents printed by order of the House? No one would be benefited by the printing of a large number of the documents but the printers to the House. He should vote for the smallest number named.

Mr. CONNOR did not rise, he said, to enter into the general debate. He expressed his regret that some of the concluding remarks of the report of the majority of the committee were published in one of the papers this morning. The House, he hoped, would look to the whole of the facts and suggestions of the committee, before they formed an opinion as to the character of the conclusions to which the committee had arrived. As to the size of the documents, there might be, he said, and doubtless would be, many lopped off, but still a great number must come in. Both reports referred to papers, and it was proper that the grounds on which their opinions were formed should be printed. The great and the sole object of the committee had been, he said, to arrive at, and faithfully to present, the truth in regard to the subject of their investigation.

Mr. BRIGGS here modified his motion, proposing to print twenty thousand extra copies of the report without the documents, and five thousand with the documents.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said, if the question was simply on printing the report of the majority and minority of the committee, he should say nothing. But the question upon printing the documents accompanying the reports was a distinct one, and one in which pecuniary considerations were involved to some extent. It might not be proper to say much in regard to the expenses of the House, but he thought the House should reserve to itself some part of the counsel which it dealt out to others. It was certain that the reports and documents would form two or three large volumes. His own opinion was that the sub-committee would take out but a small portion of them; that they would form nearly three volumes of the ordinary size of Congress documents; and that five thousand copies would cost from 25 to $30,000. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Briggs] was of the opinion that these documents should be so widely disseminated that every man might learn, from the documents themselves, the same information which, ordinarily, they obtain from public newspapers. If so, we should print not five thousand, but five hundred thousand copies. The number proposed would furnish a few, but not the great mass of the people who wanted information on the subject. This was no argument against printing more than the ordinary number. There should be copies enough for the public press, for each member, and for some of their constituents. As to the number of the reports themselves he would say nothing. But as to the documents accompanying them, all the essential objects, by sending out two thousand copies, would be as effectually gained as by a larger number. If the motion to print five thousand copies should fail, he would, he said, move two thousand.

Mr. BURGESS said it seemed to be admitted that this was an important report, and it was admitted that the people were deeply interested in it. The question was, in what manner the people should get the information. If it was left to the public press to communicate it, the people would never get it fully and impartially: the newspapers would select such parts for publication as they chose, and the people would never be able to understand the subject. If we wish, said Mr. B., to let the people know the truth, we must print and widely distribute the report. He agreed to the motion to print 30,000 copies of the report, which, he said, would cost not more than 10 cents apiece. It was not for the paltry consideration of a few dollars that this House should withhold light from the people on a subject in which they were so much interested as in this.

Mr. LANE said that, believing as he did that the report was interesting and important, the result of a laborious investigation by a committee of this House—a result to which the people looked with solicitude—he felt bound to vote for printing the largest number named by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BURGESS.] It had been said by several honorable gentlemen that the newspapers would publish all that the people were interested in knowing, and therefore any extra number of copies would be a useless expense of public money. It was well known that the newspapers would publish such extracts as would suit their own views, and the result would be to confuse, not to inform, the public. Justice to the people and to the Department requires that the entire report should be exhibited. He wished that it was possible to place it in the hands of every individual, that each might examine and decide for himself. It had been said that the people would not read the report, if placed before them. The people are not so indifferent about the administration of any department of the Government; much less so as to the administration of the General Post Office, which addresses itself more immediately and more universally than any other to their feelings and interests. They will read it with care, and they can best judge of its course who see its operations and feel its benefits. Shall the important conclusions of this committee go forth in the newspapers unaccompanied by the facts which indicate the origin, the progress, and the extent, of the evils that are mentioned? Shall the responsibility of these evils be thus unjustly cast upon the persons administering the Department, instead of the true cause—the defects in the organization originally prescribed by law? The same errors have existed from the origin of the Department. The immense increase of mail routes, called for by the rapid improvement of our country, and incessantly urged by members of this House, have developed their injurious practical operation. The distinguished individual who directs that Department has merely followed in the footsteps of his predecessors in office. Anxious to administer the Department so as to extend its benefits to every part of our country, the defective legal organization has prevented him from keeping the immense business of the Department under his own eyes. It should be clearly understood and carefully remembered that these errors have been confined mainly to a subdivision, to the fiscal branch of the Department. Whenever errors have been made obvious, I understand that they have been remedied, as far as was possible, under the present laws. During the last two years, most of the errors admitting correction have ceased to exist; and to those acquainted with the business of the Department, in two of its most important divisions, it is well known that an energetic and accurate system has been applied, that, under proper legal provisions, will enable the Postmaster General to place the Department on that high ground suited to its importance. Enable the people to make these discriminations. The friends of the Postmaster General, the supporters of the administration, are those most interested in the wide circulation of this report. Shall it be said that a democratic majority, whose leading principles are the correction of abuses, the simplification of public business, and its full exhibition to the people, object to the publication of this report? He trusted not. The inquiry had been made by direction of a democratic majority of this House; the report had been made by the democratic majority of that committee: it exhibited abuses which had existed under every administration. On that report it was our duty to act. Let the report go to our constituents, that they may judge whether our conduct in reference to these abuses keeps pace with the professions by which we are pledged to reform them.

Mr. CROCKETT said it had already cost more than twenty-five thousand dollars to get this report; and of what use would it be, he asked, unless it was sent out to the people? Some time ago he had preferred charges against the Post Office Department, and then he was almost hushed at for doing it; but now he found that his charges were more than sustained by the report of the majority of the committee. The people, he said, trusted to this House, and to that factious body, as it was called, the Senate, for information. They wanted information from their own Representatives. What had been charged against the Department was more than verified by the majority report, and he hoped fifty thousand copies of both of the reports would be printed. What were fifty thousand copies? They would only give us two hundred and fifty copies each for distribution. He did not care about the accompanying documents, but moved the printing of fifty thousand copies of the reports.

Mr. H. EVERETT expressed his surprise at the estimate made by the gentleman from Tennessee, of the expense of obtaining the report. Instead of twenty-five thousand dollars, it was probably about two thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. STODDERT did not, he said, rise to object to the number of copies proposed to be printed. He was never opposed to the diffusion of light among the people. It had never, he remarked, occurred before, that a committee constituted as this was, of different political parties, and formed at a time of high party excitement, had so generally concurred in facts, and harmonized in results. He conceived that the reports contained the evidence of the facts in an intelligible form; and one of the most arduous duties of the committee was to collect from the mass of facts the kernel, and throw away the husk. Whatever number of reports might be printed, it was therefore useless to print more than the usual number of documents. In any argument on the subject, the reports, and not the documents, would be referred to for facts; for there was no discrepancy between the statements of the two reports.

Mr. BARRINGER said he would agree that it was not important that a great number of the documents should be printed; but it was certainly proper, for the purpose of sustaining the statements of the reports, to print a sufficient number of the documents to supply a number of persons in each congressional district. The number of documents which was proposed to be printed (five thousand) would afford but twenty copies to each member. In some districts, this number would allow but one copy for each five hundred voters, and in other districts it would not supply the publishers of newspapers.

Post Office Reports.

A less number than five thousand would, therefore, he thought, be totally inadequate and useless. The number suggested by the gentleman from New York (two thousand) would afford less than ten copies to each district, and, where a district was composed of several counties, would not be more than sufficient for one county. He would desire to circumscribe the number within reasonable limits; but he thought the House had better print none of the documents at all, than a less number than five thousand.

Mr. H. EVERETT rose, he said, to make a statement of the expenses of the investigation which resulted in these reports, not having been understood when he was up before. Each member of the select committee received five hundred and sixty dollars, and their aggregate pay amounted to four thousand nine hundred and twenty dollars. The whole expense of the investigation was about seven thousand dollars.

Mr. HAMER said: If there was any business which ought to be done by human beings in the dark, it was not the business of legislation. Those who undertake to prescribe rules for the action of themselves and others, ought at least to have some light upon the subjects with regard to which they propose to legislate.

It had become a very common thing to traduce the Post Office Department. It was fashionable to condemn it. There seemed to be a general inclination to bear it down. For one, he was not disposed to join in the general "hue and cry" against the Department. He concurred entirely with his honorable friend from Kentucky [Mr. JONSON] in the observations he let fall the other day. He had known the Postmaster General long, and known him well. He had the most implicit confidence in his honor and integrity, both as a public man and private citizen. Entertaining this opinion of him, he would not condemn him until he had the most unquestionable evidence of the impropriety of his conduct. He said he did not know, and therefore would not say, but there might have been subordinate officers in the Department who were not honest. He would not say, for he did not know, but these subordinates might have presented statements to the Postmaster General, which had deceived him, and upon which he might have made orders that were detrimental to the public interest. But it is time enough to condemn him when we have heard the proof. It was time enough for him to condemn him when he had heard the evidence and heard the defence, and the commentary upon that evidence. When the whole subject shall be presented, the reports printed and laid on our tables; when we have had time to read and deliberate upon them, and have heard the Department in reply, then we should be prepared to act. Whatsoever is wrong, said he, I shall be among the first to condemn. If any thing be wrong, but has circumstances connected with it which ought to be received as palliations, I shall insist upon those circumstances having due weight. But whatever is right, although alleged to be wrong, whether the charge be made by political enemies, or those who were political friends upon the surface, he would be prepared to defend to the last.

What are we about to do here? We are asked to vote for the printing of fifty thousand of these reports, without knowing one word of their contents. They have not been read. All we know of them is, that they are against the Department. Sir, I go against this system. I will not thus legislate in the dark upon any question. What have we seen in another part of this Capitol? I speak of what I learn from the newspapers; every body knows they are good authority. A report was made there by a majority and a minority of a committee. Before they could be printed and laid upon their or our tables, a bill is passed, which has come down to this House, to reorganize the whole Post Office Department. Thus passing a sentence of condemnation upon it without an examination of the reports of their committee, or hearing one word in defence. Thus declaring that the whole Department is so rotten and corrupt that reformation is impossible; and it must, therefore, be thrown into the mill and ground over anew. The passage of the bill is claimed by the party press of this city, and understood by the country, to be such a condemnation. Are we to follow this example? Is this the system to be established in this country? Sir, said he, I have the most perfect respect for the members of the committee who made these reports; but I will not legislate upon the report of any committee without hearing the other side. Have they not examined witnesses against the Department, without the persons implicated having an opportunity to cross-examine? May not many things, seemingly wrong, be satisfactorily explained by cross-examination, or by further testimony? Let us hear before we strike. Whoever heard of a great Department of the Government being reorganized, without consulting the head of that Department? If there be defects in its organization, who so competent to point them out, and suggest improvements, as the man whose experience has brought them repeatedly before him?

Does any one believe that, if we order 50,000 copies of these reports to be printed, we shall receive them during the present session? Every man here knows we shall not. Do we not know that the reports ordered to be printed by the Senate, at the last session, were travelling through the country during the whole summer? They had to be sent first to the members, and then taken up, franked, and sent off by mail again to different portions of the country; thus aiding to burden and break down the very Department which they assailed. It will be an immense expense incurred, for no real substantial benefit to the country.

We are all aware that abstracts of these reports will be circulated in the newspapers every where, for the information of the people. Now, there ought to be a sufficient number of the reports through the several districts of country to enable any one to correct errors or misrepresentations that may creep into the abstracts. That is enough: all beyond that is unnecessary. I shall therefore vote for the smallest number proposed.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, said he was in favor of the larger number proposed. He was surprised to hear the gentleman [Mr. HAMER] talk about "hearing before they should strike." What course would the gentleman have had the House take? Did it not appoint a committee of investigation, a majority of whose number were known to be friends of the administration and friends to the Post Office Department? And was it not the report of such a committee, so constituted, which it was now proposed to print? Had not the committee been six months engaged in their task? Was not that time enough to look into the state of the Department? "Hear before you strike!" What blow had been struck, or was attempted to be struck? If the gentleman insisted upon "hearing" before "striking," let the country "hear!" That was all he asked. The gentleman seemed to think that the condemnation of the Postmaster General was aimed at; but what was the tenor of the reports made to the House? Did they not agree? Was the gentleman going to dispute the facts they stated? Did he mean to say their statements were incorrect? Mr. R. considered it a peculiarly happy and auspicious circumstance that they did agree. It was too generally the case that persons of opposite parties never could agree; but here were a majority and minority who arrived at the same conclusion. The gentleman had eulogized the Postmaster General. Mr. R. did not contradict what he had said. All he wanted was to give the country the whole truth, whatever it might be. Let them see the report as a whole, and not a garbled extract. Give them all the facts, and then let them judge the Postmaster General. The gentleman was a little premature. Was any gentleman prepared to say the information in these reports was not to be relied upon? Would the gentleman undertake to impugn it? And, if it was true, the country wanted to see it. It was information in which the whole country was interested: it came home to the business and bosom of every man. And let him tell the gentleman there were not a few in all parts of the Union who would examine it with care. If the Postmaster General had done well, let him have ample justice; the facts would, in that case, be his best justification. But, besides that officer, there were connected with the Department 10,000 postmasters. Mr. R. wanted every one of these men to have a copy of these reports in his hand. If abuses had been corrected, let them see and hear, and understand the whole. Why were gentlemen so exceedingly alarmed at the expense of printing these reports? If evils existed in the Department, let them be known and corrected. Let the Department be renovated—regenerated. As to the suggestion that, if the reports should be printed, they would never be distributed, he had no fears on that subject. Gentlemen seemed to think that the documents printed for the House were never distributed, because gentlemen could not find time to direct them at their seats in the House; but they were greatly mistaken; they were distributed. But the gentlemen, he fancied, would find their constituents asking for the report, and reading it with avidity. The people wanted to know the truth. Mr. R. was astonished that, after a document had been obtained at so great a cost of time, labor, and expense, gentlemen were not willing to print it! He was surprised to hear them advocate the propriety of sending the people garbled extracts through the newspapers. He was for no such party proceedings. Let the nation have the report as a whole; let them have the views given by both sides, and then let them form their own judgment.

Post Office Reports.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, said: Mr. Speaker, I think it was well remarked that it became this House to look well to its own extravagant expenditures at the moment when they are about to impute to other Departments of the Government extravagances of an extraordinary character. Sir, I ask the gentlemen who propose to print the extra number of these documents proposed, whether they have counted the cost. Has any gentleman who has addressed the House in favor of so large a number made an estimate, satisfactory to his mind, of the amount of cost which he proposes to impose upon the country? I have made an estimate which, to my mind, is satisfactory against the printing of either number of documents proposed. I lay aside the number suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CROCKETT,] as being wholly beyond the inclination, probably, of every other member of the House. I take the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and invite the House to consider for a moment whether it be not of an extravagant character.

I understood the proposition to be to print five thousand extra copies of each report, and the several documents appended thereto. The House has already been informed, by one of the honorable members of the Post Office Committee, [Mr. BEARDSLEY,] that these reports and accompanying documents will certainly make two full-sized octavo volumes; consequently, this will make ten thousand volumes. Other gentlemen, however, have said that they will amount to three volumes; but I take the lowest estimate. Now, these ten thousand volumes will cost no less, upon an average, according to the best information I have been able to obtain, than three dollars per volume; for a smaller number, say six or seven hundred, which is the ordinary number, the cost per volume will be nearer five dollars. Take the number proposed, in all probability the price cannot be reduced to less than three dollars per volume, and here is at once a cost of $30,000. The gentleman further proposes to print twenty thousand extra copies of the two reports alone, without the documents. It has been said that even these will make a volume of from 150 to 200 pages; and if we estimate the cost at only a dollar a volume, you will have an additional charge of $20,000, at the least, making an aggregate of $50,000 for the publication of one single report!

Sir, let me ask, are gentlemen prepared for this? Is the country prepared for this? Suppose you even go to the extent proposed, what good will be produced? Five thousand copies of the entire work, divided among the members of this House, will not nett to them, after reserving the necessary copies for the Capitol, more than ten sets to each member; and of the twenty thousand reports, the nett amount of each member for his district will fall short of forty copies. Now, then, after you have expended your $50,000 in the publication of this report, and you get forty copies of the report without the documents, and ten copies with them, for each district, put the question home to the constituents of any gentleman, and ask them whether they approve of such an expenditure under the pretence of furnishing such limited means of information to their district? Whatever the motive may be, they will denounce it as an extravagant expenditure.

But, say gentlemen, the information cannot be given through the newspaper organs. Why not? Does any gentleman doubt that all the material information in each of these reports will be furnished to the people through the newspapers? What is the objection? Why, forsooth, that they will garble, (to use the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts,) that they will garble the reports, and present only such extracts as will suit their own individual feelings or purposes. But the same gentleman has also told us that the report is of such an extraordinary character that it comes with the concurrence of both branches—the majority and the minority of the committee. Why, Mr. Speaker, if the report be the result of so much unanimity, where can be the danger or apprehension that garbled statements will be made, and the people misled? The very character of the report, as represented by those in favor of the larger number, precludes the possibility of the danger suggested as an argument in favor of printing that large number.

But, again, sir; the report being in itself the result almost of unanimity in the committee, and it being agreed, on all sides, that all that is now necessary is legislation, where can be the great utility of multiplying copies of this report at such an extraordinary expense to the treasury? Let me submit this proposition to those gentlemen who are for printing so large a number, since it is acknowledged on all sides that legislation only is now necessary, whether it would not be better for this House to legislate and perform its own duty, and then distribute among the people the results of our own labors, rather than distribute among the people information as to the mode in which we have performed those duties? Let the gentlemen do this, and I will go with them heart and hand in multiplying copies to any extent. But, no; notwithstanding gentlemen are prepared to admit that there is a defect in the Post Office law; notwithstanding they are prepared to admit that legislation is what is necessary; notwithstanding all agree that legislation must be the next step upon this subject, instead of going to work and legislating, and supplying the needful for the best interest of the people, they stop short by multiplying reports upon reports, exposing the necessity of such legislation. Sir, does, this look like a commendable pursuit for the best interests of the people? It is withholding from the people that to which they are entitled.

But there is another objection to the printing of so large a number of these reports; and that is, overburdening the mails, and thereby increasing the difficulties and embarrassment of a Department you say is defective already. You are about to impose an additional tax upon it, in order to weigh it down; for it is a tax upon the Post Office Department to require it to distribute so large a number of heavy volumes throughout the country. I respectfully ask, if it be the intention of gentlemen to break down this Department, at all events, by imposing upon it additional burdens, while they, at the same time, admit it is already unable to sustain itself now? Sir, the very expense of distributing those volumes is, in itself, sufficient objection; especially as there cannot be a doubt that all the information will come to the people through the ordinary channel—the public press.

Another reason has been given in favor of the proposition, that there is an extraordinary excitement throughout the country upon this subject. That the people want information about it. Let me ask, sir, how has this excitement been produced? Does not every gentleman understand perfectly well how statements are manufactured and worked up so as to produce excitement among the people? Need I remind them of the events of the preceding year? But, sir, call the attention of this House to any one Department of the Government, and lay bare its extravagances; open the blinds and windows, and let the people look in fully and freely, and you will create an excitement. I fear not to say that I do not believe there is a single Department of this Government which, if laid bare to the people, would not produce excitement; yet gentlemen cry out upon the Post Office Department alone, and hold it up as a subject of every exaggeration, while at the same time they seek to throw upon it the additional burden and expense of distributing thousands upon thousands of ponderous documents.

Mr. Speaker, suppose the people could examine the extravagance of our own House in the matter of printing alone; think you, sir, they would not be excited? If they will turn to the sixth document published at the present session of Congress, in which the Clerk of this House exhibits the expenditures of the House, they will discover that, up to the 30th of November, last year, the expenses of the last session of this very Congress, for printing alone, were $71,725, and the printing ordered last session had not then been completed. Prior to this time, many additional thousand dollars have been expended to complete the printing ordered last session. Why, this amount is almost enough to place the Post Office Department high and dry, and beyond the reach of embarrassment. Besides, what do we propose to effect by the distribution of these reports? I will not go so far as to say that we propose to do away with the possibility of legislating in reference to the Post Office Department at the present session; but all we do propose is to lay open the enormities and abuses of that Department, and to do this we are to expend an additional sum of $50,000, and then not be able to furnish one out of five hundred to our constituents. Why, the extra expenses of the Post Office Department, about which gentlemen have been so much disposed to complain, have been, in a great measure, occasioned by the extra number of documents which this and the other House of Congress combined, have ordered to be printed and distributed throughout the country.

Your mails are laden down with your extra documents, and what is the necessary consequence? Why, that the mail contractor comes forward and complains, saying to the Department, "since I entered into my contract the weight of the mails is increased fourfold, and it is utterly impracticable for me to continue carrying them for the sum agreed upon; I must therefore have an extra allowance, or else I shall be compelled to give up my contract; and, if I do, no man can come and do it even at the extra sum." Who is to blame? Not the Postmaster General. If the necessity exists, and if Congress, or either branch of it, persists in loading down the mails with heavy, voluminous, and, in some instances, useless documents, extra allowances must be given to the mail contractors for carrying them. Thus the evil falls back upon ourselves, and if the people of this country have not already reflected sufficiently upon the subject, so as to understand it, the time, I trust, is not far distant, when they will so understand it; and, in the same proportion as you overload the mails with these extra copies of ponderous documents, will members of Congress themselves be held accountable by the people, and the Post Office Department be acquitted, even if it be overwhelmed in bankruptcy. This would be no more than justice.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will reiterate that I am opposed to the printing of any extra number of these reports beyond the number specified by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BRADLEY,] who, as one of the committee, we may suppose is conversant in the matter, and who thought 2,000 would be sufficient.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY said that he rose to correct one error into which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMITH] had fallen, viz: that one great cause of burdening of the mail, and the consequent extra allowances, was the transportation of documents published by order of that House. The gentleman was mistaken. There had been no such evidence before the committee. No such fact had been proven. He knew that there had been such a pretence, and, especially in one particular case, postillions had been sent on with forty teams; but, on investigation, it turned out that the whole rested upon a representation of the contractor himself. Mr. W. repeated that no other fact had been proven. He was unwilling that any such assertion should go abroad uncontradicted. But if gentlemen would make such assertions, about what they knew nothing, he should take the responsibility of contradicting them; and, if they would enter into the facts contained in the report, he was prepared to follow them, and should do so, if the discussion occupied the residue of the session.

Mr. MERCER said he should have been glad if the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMITH] had taken the advice which he so gratuitously gave to the House, viz: not to take up its time in debating the affairs of the Post Office. He was himself in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BARRETT.] He should like to know of what personal advantage it could possibly be supposed to be to any member of the House to have a large rather than a small number of copies of these reports distributed and sent abroad. Did gentlemen take so much pleasure in franking documents? Was it so very grateful a task to occupy hours together in directing bundles of papers? To him it was one of the most unpleasant that could be mentioned. No task could be more delicate or more painful than to make the discrimination which was unavoidable in sending printed documents among his constituents. If popularity was the object, so far from its being secured in this way, this very matter of franking documents was one of the most certain ways to impair it; for, he would venture to say that, where a member of Congress procured the good will of one man who received a document, he lost that of three others who received none. The House, therefore, could have no personal interest in desiring a large number to be printed. If it was sought at all, it was sought with a view to the public good; and the expense, whether greater or smaller, was incurred altogether for the benefit of the people. If gentlemen who were opposed to extravagant expenditure choose to complain of the gorgeous trappings which surround the Speaker's chair, a species of finery more worthy of a company of strolling players than of the dignity of that House; if they were disposed to complain of the expense of that useless hall, more fit for any thing than for the debates of such a body, he was ready to concur with them. But the people would never call it extravagance to expend money in putting into their hands interesting information in relation to the affairs of the Government. The charges and insinuations of the gentleman were altogether unfounded, and the current of public opinion was not to be directed against that body for such an application of the public money.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, rose, not to protract the debate, but to inquire of the Chair what was the exact state of the question before the House.

The SPEAKER having responded to his inquiry, and stated the several motions which had been made for different numbers of copies of the committee's report—

Mr. CROCKETT moved that 50,000 copies of both reports, with all the accompanying documents, be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. BURGESS said that he rose, not to prolong the debate, but to express his indignation at the broad insinuation made by the gentleman from Maine against that House. He would not call that insinuation by its proper name; but he would express the indignation he felt, that gentlemen who were the personal conductors of the public press, and who had a deep personal and party interest in having the newspapers the only vehicles by which the knowledge of public affairs went to the people, should undertake to be the guides and advisers of the House when it was proposed to print important documents for public distribution; more especially gentlemen who, in their statements of facts, were so very imaginative as the gentleman on the other side of the way had shown himself to be, in what he had said about loading the mails. And Mr. B. would say, for the special use and benefit of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH,] that he for one had no wish to be instructed by any such persons. From the assertions which the gentleman had made about extra allowances being made on account of documents printed and sent abroad by that House, the gentleman seemed to be in the habit of thinking for horses, rather than for the people. If the human mind lived upon truth, as its best and only wholesome aliment, then the best use to which the body of animals could possibly be put, was in furnishing instruction to the nation at large.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said that he did not wish to lengthen the debate, nor would he venture to do so, lest he might subject himself to be lectured, like the gentleman from Maine had been, upon his duties upon that floor. He must confess, however, that he had been usually in the habit of expressing his own sentiments in debate, without much regard whether they happened to suit the views of other gentlemen or not. The proposition before the House was to print 5,000 copies of these reports, with the documents. One gentleman told them that these would occupy three octavo volumes. He heard another say that they would occupy five. But, assuming the lowest number, it would require 14,800 volumes. Now, Congress had long been collecting a public library, such as comported with the dignity of the Government, and was an ornament to the Capitol in which it was deposited. It contained, as he was informed, the documentary history of nearly all the civilized nations of the world, besides a vast amount of miscellaneous information on all subjects. Yet that library contained but 22,000 volumes in all. And it was now proposed to print 14,000 volumes of these Post Office documents—a quantity of books sufficient to line the hall in which they were sitting; and this for the purpose, as he supposed, of protecting the freedom of the press in the District of Columbia. The House had been told by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. READ] that their constituents would read all these volumes. The gentleman was quite sure that his own constituents certainly would. Now, Mr. M. would hazard the assertion that that gentleman himself, though a member of the House, had never read an amount of public documents, amounting in all to three such volumes, in the whole course of his congressional career; and he greatly doubted whether there was a single member of the House who would have the patience to read these documents after they were printed. There could be no utility in adopting the resolution, unless the object was to extend additional patronage to those who were employed to do the printing of the House. Every body knew how much time was usually devoted by members of Congress to the reading of public documents, even while they remained at the seat of Government, and still more at their own homes; and he thought there could be no use in expending forty or fifty thousand dollars of the public money to patronise the printers of the House, and furnish them with a convenient job which should occupy their leisure all the summer. For what valuable purpose would they burden the mails (and the gentleman from Rhode Island might take what exception he liked to the suggestion) by loading them down with a mass of books equal to the whole library of Congress? He was perfectly willing to give every information in his power to his constituents, consistently with his views of public duty; but not believing that any good consequence could result from such an unnecessary multiplication of copies of this document, he could not consent to vote for the resolution. He hoped that not more than one thousand copies, at the utmost, would be printed. This would be sufficient to employ gentlemen, and would furnish them with quite as much as they could frank, or their constituents read.

Mr. BRIGGS, of Massachusetts, said that, if the gentleman from New York, who had just taken his seat, meant to insinuate that any such motive as extending patronage to printers had entered into the proposition he had presented to the House for the printing of an extra number of these reports and documents, he was widely mistaken. Nothing had prompted Mr. B. to move the resolution but a deep conviction that the importance of the subject to which these reports referred demanded the widest diffusion of them amongst the people; and he would give that gentleman to understand that he was not to be deterred from the course of his duty by that gentleman's, or any other gentleman's, ringing in that hall the tocsin of party. The proposition was to print truth; its object, and its only object, was to send truth to the American people. If the gentleman dared not let them see the truth, let him shrink. Mr. B. cared not who printed these papers; nor was it of any personal consequence to him how many were printed; but their contents were deeply interesting to every man in the country; and he had thought, and still continued to think, that 5,000 copies was a proper number. One word to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH,] That gentleman had entered into a cool, profound, mathematical calculation in respect to the cost of this printing, and it had brought him to the wonderful result that it was likely to cost each one of his constituents the sum of nearly four mills. Yes, it would cost four mills per head, and the gentleman started back in surprise and horror at so wasteful an expenditure. The gentleman had urged another argument: he thanked him for it, and if he could tell it to all that gentleman's constituents, they should speedily hear it.

He said that, if the people could look through the windows of any Department of this Government, and witness what was passing within, they would instantly be excited. A window had now been opened in one of these Departments, and the gentleman, acting on his own doctrine, was most anxious to shut it. The gentleman's maxim seemed to be, Shut out the light, and then you will keep the people calm. What! Let the people know how their money is expended in the Departments? How perilous! What! Would gentlemen excite the people, by letting them see the expenses of the Government? Oh! no. That was not the way to keep them quiet. Mr. B. did not doubt that the gentleman spoke in the very sincerity of his heart. And, what was more, he did not doubt the gentleman had spoken the truth. They would have just reason for excitement, when they came to understand in what way their money had been sported with.

Mr. B. was not for keeping them in darkness. He would tear away the blinds from those windows the gentleman so much dreaded. He would let the people place their eyes there, and let them look through every nook and corner, and winding avenue, and secret passage. If all was right, and all was just, where was the ground of alarm? If their money was rightly used, they would never refuse to give it. Especially would they never resist its being employed to enlighten their own eyes. The expenditure, whether great or small, was called for; it was proper; it was necessary. He was happy to hear from the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. STODOLSKY,) that both parts of the committee were agreed as to the facts of the case. Those facts were all he wanted. He had not averred that there was any corruption any where; he had brought charges against no one; but he did want that the American people should see, by the only medium by which it was possible for them to see, the true and actual state of the Department.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, rose to reply to a remark which fell from the gentleman from Maine, who has said that it is admitted on all sides that, in relation to the subject under consideration, nothing but legislation is required. He had made no such admission, nor did he believe that the abuses of the Post Office Department, so loudly complained of, are to be attributed to any defect in the existing laws organizing the Department. Under those laws the former Postmaster General had ably administered the Department, which he left in the most flourishing situation, and in a condition to yield a considerable revenue. What, he asked, is its present condition? It is in a state of bankruptcy—debts exist against it to an enormous amount, and some of the facilities it afforded have been discontinued without proper cause. Thousands of dollars have been expended by the present Postmaster General, contrary to law, and in violation of his duty. Now, if the reports and documents accompanying them should not be communicated to the people, it might be inferred that the charges against the Department are to be attributed to the want of legislation; whereas it is apparent that the gentleman now at the head of the Department, however amiable and virtuous he may be, is wholly incompetent to discharge the duties of that important office, and to that cause he mainly attributed the mal-administration of the Department. But to whatever cause the abuses complained of are to be attributed; whether to the ignorance, corruption, negligence, or want of business habits, of the Postmaster General, the effects to the nation are the same; and public sentiment will not be satisfied until the office shall be filled by a man more capable of fulfilling its duties. He said that, notwithstanding it had been a matter of notoriety for several years, that abuses existed to an alarming extent, and that the Department required reform, the present incumbent, who is evidently incompetent to the office, had been continued, and in violation of public sentiment. And, if the Department should now be reorganized, what reason can we have to believe that a change will be made in this respect? Further legislation may be expedient, but no law that can be passed will remedy all the evils of which the people have a right to complain. The incompetent incumbents of the Department should be dismissed, and their places filled by the appointment of others more capable of discharging the important duties of their situation. This course, if adopted, would be the most effectual. To effect the object, public opinion should again be called to the subject. Let the reports of the committee, with all the accompanying documents, be printed, and laid before the people. They should be transmitted, not only to all the deputy postmasters, but sent into every county in each State of the Union. No subject can now be more important or interesting to the people. It is not probable that the reports, with all the documents, will be inserted in any newspaper. The information contained in them cannot be communicated in that way. He concluded by saying that he should vote for printing the largest number proposed.

Mr. BOON said that he wished, before he voted, to say a few words to Buncombe. Gentlemen said that this was an important question, it was an exciting question, and that the people needed information. Granting all this, there was still another thing that the people would prefer to mere printing of any kind. Giving information about abuses was not remedying abuses. What his people wanted was the remedy. The gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES and Mr. REX] had told the House that they wanted this printing for the people, because the people wanted information. Now, it was pretty well known that he (Mr. B.) was a people's man, though he was not in the habit of reiterating the assertion on all occasions, lest it might subject him to the imputation of being a political demagogue. But if gentlemen seriously desired to extend this information to the people, let them print a document for every man in the Union. If they were willing to carry out their principle, he should not oppose it. But if they would not do this, then he should vote for the lowest number that had been named.

There was another feature in the resolution which he could not assent to. It was proposed to print a larger number of the reports than of the documents accompanying them. Mr. B. was against this. Why send the people a report without the documents to prove it? Would the head of the Post Office Department, a gentleman who had been the subject of so much abuse, be likely to obtain justice by such a course? He would not. Mr. B. would, therefore, vote for the lowest number. He would not withhold information from his people, but they would rather have the remedy than any thing else.

Mr. JACKSON, of Connecticut, said there was one aspect of this question which had not, he believed, been adverted to, but which struck his mind with peculiar force, and that was the great comparative importance of the Department to the nation. If we could imagine a state of things which should suspend, for a limited time, the operations of any of the Departments, was there one of them, he asked, whose interruption would be so immediately, extensively, and materially felt as that of the Post Office? All the great and diversified interests of the country were intimately connected with and dependent upon it, and while the injury or inconvenience resulting from the obstruction of any other organ of the Government would be comparatively partial and limited, they would, in the Post Office Department, occasion a universal derangement of private and public business. If, then, it was important at all that the people should receive light upon matters before their Representatives, was there any case in which that illumination could be more proper, and more desirable to them, than one which comes home to and affects so sensibly their daily concerns. Admitting, for argument sake, that there had been sometimes extravagance in the printing of documents, by order of the House, the objection could not apply to a case involving so deeply the public interests. Nor was it right to limit our use of the information contained in the reports to mere legislative action for the reorganization of the Department. If there had been malversation or corruption, the people should know it, and we had no right to withhold from them any results of the inquiry which we had publicly instituted into a Department of the Government so vitally important. Mr. J. said he was not disposed to adopt the largest number proposed, deeming it unnecessary and extravagant; but the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts being, in his view, within reasonable limits, it should have his support.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that he had listened in silence to the course of the debate thus far; nor did he now rise with the purpose of speaking for any length of time. He had ever been opposed to propositions for the printing of large numbers of public documents. He had listened with infinite delight to one document (Mr. Adams's speech on the life of Lafayette) of which the House had ordered 50,000 copies to be printed. He had felt proud, as an American citizen, of that production: yet, highly as he thought of it, he had voted for the smallest of the several numbers then proposed. Gentlemen might say that this was a small matter: but he could not think so; because a principle was involved. The distribution, print as many as they would, must be very partial, and as the expense had to be defrayed out of a general fund, it was taxing the many for the benefit of the few. Suppose thirty or forty thousand volumes should be printed, how many of their constituents would have an opportunity to read them? How many in proportion must be taxed? The documents would form huge volumes, solid, ponderous tomes, and it was proposed to print 15,000 of them, at the least. Now, how many of them would ever be read? Did gentlemen forget that the House had, at the last session, ordered the publication of all the documents touching the election of Messrs. Letcher and Moore; that was a judicial case, too, in which it became the duty of every member to weigh the evidence as a judge; and yet how many gentlemen had ever waded through all the trash then printed?

The House was now told that there was entire harmony between the reports of the majority and minority of the Post Office Committee; if so, where could be the necessity or use of printing 14 or 15,000 of these ponderous volumes? To be sure it would patronise the public printers. Mr. V. was fully aware that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Bates] professed no very great regard to economy in the public expenditures; it was no part of his system. If those expenses could be swelled by the addition of $50,000 every year, it would only help to add impetus to the looms and spindles of the gentleman's constituents. The gentleman would, on principle, go for the largest number the House would consent to print. But Mr. V. appealed to all those who went with him for economy, to arrest this wanton expenditure. It was said that the sum was small, and that the people felt great anxiety to get a sight of these documents. Why, did any gentleman pretend to believe, if these volumes were printed and distributed, that the man who was lucky enough to get one would be viewed by his neighbors as a sort of oracle, so that they would all run to his house to read it? The idea was preposterous. Whether the result of the reports was for or against the present incumbent of the Department, he did not care; that was not the question, and had nothing to do with it. The question was whether the people would be so instructed, by the printing of those 15,000 volumes, as to justify the enormous expense of the publication. Gentlemen seemed very much afraid to trust the newspapers, because they would only give extracts; but why this fear, when both committees were agreed, and told the same story? The very oration of which 50,000 copies had been printed for the House, was to be found at large in the newspapers. All the last summer the mails were groaning with loads of documents going from this Capitol all over the country, that were of no earthly use but for kindling fuel.

Mr. CROCKETT now withdrew his motion for 50,000 copies.

Mr. SLADE said that he was greatly surprised at the objections which were made to the printing of these reports, and still more, considering the quarter from which they came. What were the facts of the case? At the last session a report had been made by a committee of the Senate on the state of the Post Office Department, and no sooner had it appeared than the greatest excitement was created, both in that House and throughout the country. A proposition had consequently been introduced by the chairman of the Post Office Committee in that House, to raise a committee there also to investigate the condition of the same Department. This was understood to be a movement of the friends of the Department.

[Mr. CONYER, chairman of the Post Office Committee, here interposed and said that, in making the proposition for a select committee, to which the gentleman from Vermont alluded, he had acted by order of the committee; the measure was theirs, and he was only the organ of proposing it to the House.]

Mr. SLADE resumed. He was aware of its being the act of the committee; but a majority of the committee were the friends of the present administration, and therefore it was viewed as a measure of the friends of the administration—a plan to have the examination conducted in their own way. Mr. S. had been entirely willing that it should be so conducted; because, had it been the work of those who were understood to be opposed in political views and feelings to those who now conducted the Government, the examination might be supposed to have been conducted with a bias, and its result not therefore to be relied upon.

He therefore had been desirous that the examination should be conducted by the avowed friends of the Department. A select committee had accordingly been raised, and this committee of examiners did consist of a decided majority of gentlemen friendly to the administration and friendly to the Post Office Department. He made no objection to such a constitution of the committee; it was all strictly proper. This body of gentlemen had labored assiduously for six months, and they now rendered to the House the result of their toils. Whose result, therefore, was this? It was clearly the result which had been arrived at by the administration party themselves. Yet gentlemen belonging to that party were now with one voice opposing the publication and dissemination of the report. Did they consider in what light they were presenting themselves before the people of this country? The investigation had been made by their own avowed friends; and yet, when the report came in, from whom was the strongest objection urged against spreading it among the people? By the very men who had originated the investigation; by the warmest friends of the administration. He was astonished at such a spectacle. Was it not the natural presumption that a report from the friends of the Department would go to exonerate the Department from the charges of its adversaries? Yet it was its friends who opposed the printing! Had the report come from men on one side only, there might be less mystery in this; but here were two distinct reports, one of the friends, the other of the opponents of the administration, and both agreed in their results. Yet this result must be hidden; kept in the dark: to print it, and send it to the people, would be wasteful and extravagant!

One word as to the question of expense. He would ask the gentlemen who were so horrified as to the cost of printing these reports, what were the great outlets, the sluices, for the money of the people? Did gentlemen forget that there were five Departments of the Government, and that not one of them expended it with such boundless and reckless profusion as this Department of the Post Office? That this expenditure continued from year to year—and from generation to generation? And what was the remedy? How was this inundation to be stayed? By letting the people know and understand how their money was used. That was the true and the only remedy. And admitting, which he did not however admit, that it would take $50,000 to print these reports and documents, yet if this conduced to put a stop to this vast and wide and unceasing waste of public money, continued and increasing from year to year, would the nation be losers by the appropriation? Unless this thing was stopped, it must go on as it had done for years to come—for a hundred years to come, for aught he knew! And would it be enlightened economy to grudge a small sum to save a sum ten times or a hundred or a thousand times larger? This cry about extravagance was all idle. His constituents wanted to know the state of this Department, and he was desirous that they should know it. He was not for turning them over to garbled extracts, selected at the pleasure of party editors. They were a reading people; and when they began a book they were in the habit of going through with it. And there was no Department in all the Government in which they had so near and personal an interest as in that of the Post Office. He hoped the resolution for the largest number would be adopted.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, thought this question was one which ought to be settled abstractedly from all extraneous influence derived from considerations not legitimately connected with it. It was not a question whether the House should pamper the public printers or not; and it ought to be argued independently of all suggestions of that kind. If the publication was in itself expedient and proper, the mere fact that it happened to benefit the printers of the House was one which it did not become that House to look at. For whose benefit was it that at the last session he, as one of the members then composing the standing committee of the House on the Post Office and Post Roads, had voted in favor of appointing a select committee to investigate the concerns of the Post Office Department? For the benefit of the people. Not for the benefit of that House merely, but for the information and satisfaction of the people at large. The committee had accomplished the task assigned to it; and now who was entitled to the result of their labors? The people of the United States. Did gentlemen go on the ground that this report had been made for them? Who, he asked, were their triers; and who were the triers of the Post Office Department? It was the people. Who was it that desired evidence on this often agitated subject; who wanted the light which these reports and documents contained? It was the people. Who was to settle the question whether the Post Office Department had been administered correctly and purely, or not? It was the people. Who were the judges? Was it that House? No: it was the people. And how were they to judge, if the House withheld from them the requisite information?

Although he was not for the very highest number of copies that had been named, he was for one of the highest. He held it to be the duty of the House to throw before the people the information necessary to enable them to judge. And should he vote for the very smallest number that had been proposed, what should he be able to say, when he went home to his political opponents? Who did not know that this subject of the Post Office had long been one on which the opposition had been harping for months past? And the public curiosity was roused to understand what was the real truth of the matter. And what could he say to his constituents, if he should vote to give a copy of the documents to A, and yet deny it to B, who had an equal right to the knowledge? It would be no answer to say, "I have the information, and that is enough." The people would not believe it was enough. They wanted to see a little with their own eyes. They would not be content with looking always through the eyes of a member of Congress. This case was not like that of the Oration on Lafayette. In that case he had voted for the lowest number; and whether there were or were not cheap editions of that oration to be had in New York would not settle the question respecting these documents. That was not a matter in which the whole community were immediately and personally interested. Here were ten thousand postmasters, and half that number of mail contractors, besides fifty or one hundred thousand of the friends of these persons, all of whom felt an anxious desire to know whether the charges against the Department were well founded; and they had a right to know.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, replied to the remarks of the gentlemen from Virginia and Rhode Island, [Messrs. MASON and BURGESS.] He said they had complained that he had assumed to lecture them upon the extravagant expenditures of the House. If (said Mr. S.) I had designed to lecture any gentleman upon this subject, I certainly should not have selected either of those gentlemen. Their reputations for devotion to their system and notions of extravagance and economy are too well established to be disturbed by any thing I could say, if not by any thing that any other gentleman upon this floor could say. Is it not known to this House with what tenacity those gentlemen strive to economize in the expenditures of Government? Who ever knew either of them to vote for any measure that involved an appropriation of the public money? Do they not resist every proposition for spending the public money in the grand schemes of internal improvement that are constantly being pressed upon Congress? Was any extravagance ever fostered by them? Are they not always guarding the public treasury? Sir, I wish I could say it in sincerity. But shall I say it, sir?

The gentleman from Rhode Island complains, more particularly, that I am disposed to rely upon the newspapers of the country as channels of communication to the people. He repudiates them, and would be understood as repudiating all connected with them. Sir, it has long been a practice with a certain class of men, at certain periods in their political lives, to repudiate the authority of newspapers, and to derogate from the character of the public press. It is at the same stages of their political lives that the same class of men are ready also to repudiate all considerations of party, and to denounce party feeling of every character. But, sir, in most instances of this kind, it will be found that these are the men who have first been repudiated and denounced, for cause, by newspapers and the public press, and by some party also.

Post Office Reports.

In my former remarks I submitted to the House the data upon which I formed the conviction that the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Briggs] involved an extravagant expenditure of the public money. If any portion of these data is defective or erroneous, why has not some one of the gentlemen who advocate this expenditure pointed it out? By these data, I am persuaded that it will take from the treasury at least fifty thousand dollars to execute the work proposed. No gentleman has undertaken to controvert this estimate; or, if so, it has escaped my observation. I adhere to my first opinion, sir, that, if this proposition shall be adopted, the people of this country will pronounce it an extravagant expenditure of their money.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Whittlesey] thinks I spoke without authority when I said that the increased weight of the mails has affected the contracts of the Post Office Department. He says nothing of the kind was proved before the committee. He knows, sir, that I then made no allusion to what had been proved before his committee. I knew nothing of the information obtained by the committee on this or any other point. I based my remark upon what is known to all. The extraordinary number of ponderous documents which are published by Congress, at every session of Congress, and which are now ordered to be published on almost every day of every session, cannot but load down the mails in an extraordinary manner, and change entirely the character of the contracts existing between the Post Office Department and the mail carriers. It cannot be otherwise, sir. Gentlemen may say that the Postmaster General has no legal right, nevertheless, to vary the terms of these contracts, and to add extra compensation. I mean not to controvert this opinion at this time. But, sir, when such effects are produced, when the fact is made known to the Department, by the contractor, beyond dispute, that the mail upon a route has accumulated to five times the weight it made at the period of making the contract, and the contractor says to the Postmaster General, "I shall be made a bankrupt in the service of the Government by this great change in my relationship to the Department," it is not in the nature of an honest man, unless positively prohibited by law, to reply, "Sir, I cannot relieve you; I hold you to the contract; I know it is ruin to you, but I shall exact the pound of flesh." Such oppression would be unjust and cruel. I repeat, it is not in the nature of an honest man to practise it.

Sir, that such effects are produced upon the mails is also known from the published statements of the Postmaster General. He has said that the loading of the mails with extraordinary packages has been one of the grievances of contractors; and it cannot but have involved the Department in additional expenditures. But, sir, in addition to this, I have it now from one of the Post Office Committee, that there was some proof before that committee of complaints from contractors, and that the Postmaster General had been influenced by them. As I before stated, I know nothing of what was proved there, otherwise than as I have had it from a member of the committee. The matter, therefore, lies now between the gentleman from Ohio and my informant. It is, perhaps, unimportant, since it must be apparent to all that the immense number of extra and voluminous documents, which go forth from members of Congress, does greatly affect the character of the mail contracts.

I have a word to add upon the utility of publishing documents so voluminous as those now proposed, and in such numbers. Will they be read? I put it home to gentlemen, now present, whether they themselves will read through such masses of detail? Do gentlemen pretend to read all the documents and reports which are ordered to be printed by this House? I accord to the members of Congress a full share of industry. But I am persuaded, from observation, that not ten members of this House will pretend to say that they read any thing like the number of documents which are daily ordered by the House to the press. And if they will not go through the labor of so much detail, will others desire to do so, at so great cost to the country?

But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Briggs] says he is grateful for the remark which I made, that abuses will be found to exist in all the Departments of Government, and that if the windows of either were thrown open to the public gaze, an excitement might be produced among the people like that to which he is now so much disposed to administer. Sir, I believe what I said, and repeat it. Has not greater economy and a correction of the abuses of Government been earnestly enjoined upon the gentleman from Massachusetts, as a member of this House, in every annual message of the national Executive, since the commencement of the present administration? The gentleman entirely mistakes, or, if not, he entirely perverts my remarks, when he applies them to abuses attributable to the present administration. I referred, sir, to abuses which existed far behind the commencement of the present administration, and which the present administration has labored, and still is laboring, to correct. The people of this country understood the existence of them when they brought the present administration into power, and, in changing the administration, it was a primary motive with the people to arrest and correct the accumulation of extravagant expenditures then in progress.

But, sir, so deep-rooted and extended had the evils of extravagance and unfaithful officers become at that period, a long time has been required to accomplish the desired reform. Six years of the new administration has not been equal to it; and I fear that eight years will not ferret out and correct much that exists, and that is calculated to excite the people, could it be laid bare to their view. Sir, the work of reform has gone on, and nobly too, under the present national administration; but, sir, it is not finished, and the people are not yet satisfied. It is not in the Post Office Department, upon which gentlemen would now concentrate the whole weight of popular excitement, that all the enormities of Government extravagance exist. Let any contract of Government be pointed out, and nearly double the amount will be found to be paid under it for services that a private individual would pay for like services, if necessary to his own business. The extravagance of Government is proverbial. But it is not proverbial that this extravagance has originated under this administration; on the contrary, it has been stayed wherever and as far forth as it has been practicable.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Johnson] says the present administration has refused to turn out unfaithful and incompetent officers. Sir, I am happy to agree with the gentleman in one view of his remark. If there is one fault of this administration more prominent than all the rest, it is to be found in this particular. I agree fully with the gentleman, that the administration has been backward in turning unfaithful and useless officers from the places of Government. It has omitted to remove, in many of the instances where it might have removed, men whose only aim has been to fill their own pockets at the expense of the people, and at the same time to abuse the Government that feeds them. I believe there are men of this description still in the offices of Government, who are not worth to the public service the salt which they consume.

Sir, I say, let the work of reform go on; let the Postmaster General remove the unfaithful and undeserving from the offices they hold under him, and let public expectation in this particular be realized. But, sir, where has he attempted to do this without exciting the fervid execrations of those who are associated with the very same gentleman now opposed to me upon the proposition before the House? Neither the Postmaster General, nor the administration, in any department of the Government, have been permitted to remove any man from office, no matter whether from an important or an unimportant office, without exciting the lamentations of individuals from one end of the Union to the other; and the loud and continued execrations of the same gentlemen who advocate this extraordinary expenditure of the public money. I repeat, sir, let the Postmaster General and administration do justice to themselves, and consummate the work of reform in the public offices, which the people themselves demand.

FEB. 14, 1835.]

Post Office Reports.

Mr. Speaker, I have but a single remark to add. If either of the two gentlemen from Massachusetts, or of the two from Rhode Island, or the gentleman from Virginia, or Louisiana, will point out wherein my estimate of the proposed expenditure, which I put at $50,000, is wrong, I will become a convert to his proposition, unless it shall be still clearly extravagant. Unless this shall be done, I cannot but entertain the opinion that the people of this country will justly regard such disposition of their money as extravagant and unjustifiable.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY said the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMITH] had supposed the expense of transporting the mail had been increased by the distribution of the public documents printed by the order of Congress. He did not know the source of the gentleman's information. There was an allowance of 10,000 dollars on the route from Philadelphia to Pittsburg, granted on the representation of the contractor himself, that the weight of the mail had so increased as to require that an extra allowance in justice be made. There had been no testimony taken, to his knowledge, that this increase was attributable to the distribution of the public documents, and it was not probable that such was the fact; for the increase was said to have been on the route from Philadelphia to Pittsburg, on which but a small proportion of the public documents would be transported. The Postmaster General reported this allowance to the Senate, at the last session; but he did not pretend that the public documents added to the weight of the mail, but that the weight was increased from Philadelphia. He reported, the passengers were generally excluded from the mail-coach every day in the week, when the contractors did not pretend they were thus excluded more than half the time; and the testimony before the committee was, that the passengers were not generally excluded on any other day than Monday, and then only from January to May. During that period the mails did increase on that route in a manner wholly unaccountable, except that they were sent upon it, when a different direction should have been given to them at Philadelphia.

He was unwilling the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH], as to the extra allowances for the increased weight of the mail in the instance referred to, should go abroad to the country without a denial of their correctness, as an erroneous impression would be made by them. There was an allowance for postillions in ascending the mountains, which was not particularly investigated. He renewed the hope he had expressed before, that a general discussion of the reports would not take place on a motion to print.

Mr. BEARDSLEY, of New York, said he wished to make one remark in consequence of what had fallen from the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WHITTLESEY]. The latter gentleman and himself should not, he was sure, differ as to matters of fact. The proof that the increased cost of transportation was from an increased amount of Government documents, did certainly fail in the case alluded to. The extra allowance of $10,000 was on the route from Philadelphia to Pittsburg; and it rested on the evidence of the carrier of the mail alone. There was no other evidence before the committee, and the evidence subsequently obtained did not go to show that the increase was at all owing to public documents. There was another case of extra allowance on the route from Baltimore to Wheeling. This, also, had been made on the evidence of the contractor alone. The allowance had been made on several different grounds, one of which was the increased weight of the mails; but it was not said that this had been occasioned by public documents. There was some evidence of increased weight on both these routes; but he was bound to say that the committee considered it as immaterial in respect to the allowances which had been made. And they had, in their report, taken the express ground that the Postmaster General was not authorized to allow a single cent to any contractor on any such ground. Mr. B. had paid little attention to such evidence as was adduced; because, if the weight could have been proved to have been increased by five tons, it would not authorize any allowance by the Postmaster General. He had no such power.

The gentleman from Louisiana, before him, [Mr. JOHNSON], had said that the abuses in the Post Office Department were chargeable solely on the present head of the administration of that Department. But it was no more than justice to that officer, and it was due to him, to the committee, and to the public, that, although the committee did conclude that he had transcended his power, the declaration of the gentleman from Louisiana should not go abroad without explanation. The papers which had been exhibited to the committee had shown that nearly every abuse, and nearly every irregularity which had been now discovered to exist in the Department, had prevailed also, to a certain extent, under preceding administrations of its affairs. They had nearly all prevailed under that immediately preceding. Mr. B. wished to be understood. He did not assert that these abuses had prevailed to the same extent; but decided irregularities of the same kind had existed previously; and the course then commenced had been followed by the present incumbent. It was, Mr. B. admitted, decidedly irregular, and it had certainly led to a very considerable expenditure of the public money; but not to so large an extent as had been supposed. The practice of amalgamated bids, of extra allowances, and of permitting contractors to contract for many routes in a mass, without going into separate contracts for each route, had all prevailed, to some extent, under the former administration of the Post Office Department. He did not say to the same extent; but they had been nearly as general then as now. Whether there had existed the same confiding faith in the representations of contractors as had prevailed under the present head of the Department, he would not say; but the root and origin of all the present irregularities were to be found there: the difference was only in degree. Mr. B. did not mean to impute the slightest want of personal integrity, either to the former or the present Postmaster General; he spoke only of the illegality of their acts. So far as principle was concerned, he knew of no difference in the practice of the two. That more money had been illegally applied under the present administration was probably true, and the evil might probably have been aggravated of late years.

Mr. LYTLE said that he objected to the course that the debate had taken. If he understood the question properly, it had reference merely to the number of copies which should be printed of this report; and yet it had taken a wide, and, in his judgment, an unwarrantable range. Gentlemen had been discussing the merits of the report, before that report was fairly before them. He should like to see it on the tables, and have time to read it, before he passed judgment on its contents, or expressed an opinion on the subject-matter to which it had reference.

Upon the question, then, of printing an unusual number of extra copies, Mr. L. said he considered any debate unnecessary, if the declarations of the honorable gentleman from Louisiana were to be taken for granted, who, without any report before him, had undertaken to pass sentence of death on the Department and its head; if they were really already convicted, he thought the time of the House would be misspent in deliberating on the question now before them, viz: the printing of the testimony by which the guilt or innocence of the accused should be decided. Gentlemen assure us that the people are to be enlightened on this subject, and through the medium of this report, and yet they tell us, in the same breath, that the people understand the whole matter, and that Major Barry must be dismissed, and the Department reorganized. That the "whole country believes in his guilt," and the mismanagement of his Department. Why, sir, what stuff is this. The people already enlightened! The culprit already condemned! and yet the House called on to pay the enormous expense of printing fifty thousand extra copies, to show, I presume, that it was fairly done. Why, sir, for one, I enter my solemn protest against the whole procedure. This is, indeed, a new and most unrighteous mode of action in such cases—passing sentence of death upon a man and his whole Department by your speeches, and then printing fifty thousand extra copies of a report, by which it is hoped something may be gleaned out of which these charitable decrees or predictions may be justified.

Why, sir, (said Mr. L.) the ordinary mode in this, and in every Christian country, is to try first, and convict afterwards, if the testimony exacts or warrants it; but the rule is now to be reversed for the first time in this country. Sir, I undertake to say you are now called on to criminate, by speeches and the circulation of reports in unusual and extraordinary numbers, an individual, before the very testimony is examined by his triers, who are, by this motion, to be made the organs of its publication and distribution. Why, Mr. Speaker, the humblest culprit arraigned at the judicial bar of our country, for crimes the most foul and atrocious, is indulged with the time and opportunity for a fair hearing, and a full and complete defence, an ample examination of all the testimony against him, before the sentence of condemnation is passed upon him. And is a high officer of this Government to be debarred the privilege allowed the common malefactor? Say what you will, sir, the present proceedings against this Department have tended necessarily to produce the results have named. Whether by accident or design, he is to be the victim. Friend and foe seem ready for the sacrifice, and he gets it from them all, right and left. Why, sir, not wait for the printing and examination of the two reports of the Senate, which, before they were printed or read, (I mean by the Senators,) produced a bill from that body, a bill which has been sent down to us, for the reorganization of that Department? I stand here as a sworn juror between the country and the accused; and, for one, I will not act, by the God that made me, except on ample proof. Let us have it. Not only this report, but the two reports from the Senate. Why, sir, should we prejudice this case? Why act before the proof is before us? Why attempt to forestall or prejudice the public mind? Why anticipate a decision which may never be made by this body, when they have the time and means to investigate for themselves?

These reports may be antagonistic to each other; and yet, sir, you are called on to anticipate your future judgment, deliberately formed, by testimony you have not heard, and a system of conduct which may lead to the most unjust and vindictive crimination of those who may be (as I believe them) completely innocent. Tell me not that the head of this Department is not to be directly and immediately affected by this precipitate and ill-advised action of the House. I know better, sir. You cannot alienate his personal and political identity in this determination. The object is, his removal, his political demolition. It shall not happen, sir, with my consent, without a full and fair trial. No, sir, I want all the documents—I demand all the proofs—show me official dereliction, and I will vote for its radical removal. Show me corruption, peculation, defalcation, or negligence, and, with all my heart, I will join in the application to remove it; but I must first see and know it, before I attempt a remedy. There is one thing I must here add—that now, for the first time, the Postmaster General has been personally the subject of accusation. During the whole of the last session (elsewhere, as in this body,) he has escaped unscathed. His character has been held sacred. I avow openly, and with pride, my warm attachment to the head of this Department. I have known him long, and love, and esteem, and revere, his many estimable and exalted properties; and it was a matter of no ordinary compliment, that, through all the bitterness of party feeling, during the last session of Congress as well as the present, when the hail storms of party malevolence and persecution beat about his Department, and himself as its representative, that his person was held sacred; that no harm approached him; that the full tribute to his individual merits was exacted by a knowledge of his worth, from the bitterest of his opponents; and I now dare and defy any man, on or off this floor, to impeach the personal or political integrity of William T. Barry.

Notwithstanding (continued Mr. L.) the long services, unquestioned ability and worth of my honorable colleague, [Mr. WHITTLESSEY,] than to whom no one more readily than myself is willing to accord the merit of usefulness, and indefatigable zeal, honesty and energy of action as a representative of my State upon this floor; one who has justly earned its confidence and high regard, and made me ready, always ready, to acknowledge his ability, and claim him with pride and pleasure as a colleague, however widely we may differ in some things—to-day he has surprised me, by attempting to disprove the statements of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH,] by showing, in his way, that there was no proof of the fact before the House that the burdens of the Department were increased by the increase of extra printing during the last session of Congress; and, therefore, that the statements are fallacious! Why, sir, it requires no proof, said Mr. L.; it is a matter that addresses itself at once to the common sense and understanding of every man upon this floor. Can there be an enormous increase of documents without the indispensable increase of cost for their circulation by the mail? It is a matter about which there can be no dispute. Add to the tonnage, and you must pay for the increased carriage. Multiply documents, and you must provide means for their transportation. And thus it has been, sir, among other means that the Department has reached the point of difficulty complained of.

The trouble exists mainly, in my opinion, in the increased burdens imposed on the Department by the legislation of Congress, one way or another, and its willingness and anxiety to meet the demands thus made on it. Sir, I appeal in a spirit of frankness to this body, if they have not, by their system of legislation, contributed mainly to produce the state of things of which they now complain against the Post Office Department. By the application of what class of people have new mail routes been established; post offices created; contracts made; and extra allowances granted? My answer is, by members of Congress. And I trust the catalogue will be forthcoming before long, exhibiting a list of all who have thus kindly added to the distress of the Department they are now so ready to condemn and execrate.

Post Office Reports.

Sir, by the proposition now before you, we are called on to aggravate the evil which the document complains of, that we send abroad. You start a diseased herald to report the malady of which the very messenger is the subject—one of a family of fifty thousand.

I am opposed to any new panic, therefore I shall vote against the printing, now and hereafter, of a single extra sheet of any thing; especially where the design is to anticipate the action of the House, and forestall public judgment. Such printing as is indispensable to the purposes of legislation I am prepared to vote for, but no more. I have ever been opposed to this extravagant propensity of the House. Let any gentleman on this floor turn to the mass of well-bound printed trash of the last session, and say if the load of such matter under which his shelves now groan, of panic speeches, memorials, reports, resolutions, and even names, will not compel him honestly to admit that there is to be found the true secret of at least one difficulty under which the Department has had to labor; but there are others which in due time shall be noticed. Let the House, I say, however, pause first itself, before it arraigns any other department of the Government. Sir, the extra printing of this House would cover all the extra allowances (occasioned chiefly by the action of Congress) of the Post Office Department for the last two years. I hazard the opinion. Look at the abuses, too, of the franking privilege. One main object avowed in defence of this proposition is to supply the districts of certain gentlemen; yes, sir, to make Uncle Sam pay for the privilege of getting ourselves re-elected, by franking home any quantity of documents. My day is over, sir, in that way, but I assure gentlemen that I never knew much good to come of it: you can't frank to every elector in the Union; one is as much entitled as another; and, so far as my experience goes, you make more enemies than friends by franking at all; for I never sent one document to a constituent that I did not receive, on an average, at least one letter from another, complaining that he had been neglected; so that but little good is done in that way.

But, sir, in conclusion, I desire nothing but what is fair and just in the decision of the House upon this matter. Let us have an opportunity before we condemn pure, and upright, and hitherto honorable men; let us compare with the increased business of this Department, under the present head, the expenses, the defalcations, the practices, the uses and abuses of those who preceded him. I wish, sir, and hope, that all these matters have come within the observance of the committee, and that, as they are greatly regulated by precedent and contrast, we may expect to find less guilt than has been anticipated or hoped for, and an equal amount of integrity, fidelity, and official usefulness, as will compare with any precedent administration of the Department. I have occupied the House longer than I wished or expected, and conclude by hoping that they will at least reduce the number proposed of extra copies.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New Hampshire, inquired of the Chair, what would be the effect of the previous question.

The SPEAKER replied that, if the previous question were ordered, the main question would be on the printing, and that the several motions for different numbers of copies would be presented in order, commencing with the largest number.

Mr. HUBBARD thereupon moved the previous question.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY requested the gentleman from New Hampshire to waive his motion for a moment, for a few words in explanation.

Mr. HUBBARD replied that he could not do so, unless the gentleman from Ohio would promise to renew it as soon as his explanation was made.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, having given this pledge, proceeded to observe that he was unwilling to prolong the debate, but he felt himself called upon to dissent from the gentleman from New York [Mr. BRADSLAY] as to the origin of the abuses in the Post Office Department, by which such wasteful expenditures of the public money had taken place.

If the gentleman had confined his remarks to amalgamated or combined bids, and had merely stated they were received by the Department under its former administration, there would have been no ground for a disagreement between them. There were, formerly, several instances of amalgamated or combined bids; but he knew of no testimony tending to show that they were resorted to to favor a contractor. Extra allowances had also been granted under the former administration, but they were within the restrictions of the law, taking the contract as a data. There had been no abuse of this power by the former administration, that had been investigated by the committee, within his recollection or knowledge.

Mr. W. then, according to promise, renewed the motion for the previous question.

Mr. CONNOR requesting him to withdraw it, Mr. W. referred him to Mr. HUBBARD, to whom he was pledged.

Mr. HUBBARD assenting, on condition that Mr. CONNOR would renew the motion,

Mr. WHITTLESEY withdrew his call for the previous question.

Mr. CONNOR expressed his deep regret at the course the debate had taken. He had feared such a result, when it commenced, and had, in consequence, restrained himself when last up, although prepared to say much more than he had said. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITTLESEY] was right in saying there was no evidence before the committee of allowances being made for an increased weight of the mail occasioned by documents sent from this House, on the route between Philadelphia and Pittsburg, although no one here could doubt but that the great number printed and sent out must greatly increase its weight; the gentleman seems to have selected that case for his own use; he should, sir, have gone further, and given the route from Baltimore to Wheeling. The committee differ in opinion with the Postmaster General as to the power to make an extra allowance for the increased weight of the mail, after a contract had been concluded. But did the gentleman forget that there had been presented to that officer many petitions, among them, five, if not seven, signed by members of Congress, asking that an additional allowance be made the contractors, both for expediting and increased weight of the mail, and his own name was to be found among them? Mr. C. was far from wishing to justify that Department, or any other in the Government, in any thing that was wrong; but let its course have been what it might, the practices which now prevail in it might all be traced, not only to the administration immediately preceding the present, but to former administrations preceding that; this was true with respect to gross bids, the admission of which was, in his opinion, objectionable; and the same practices prevailed as to improved bids. The House would find, among the documents reported by the committee, large amounts, in other administrations, had been paid for improvements, over the bid made for the service as advertised, from nine to eleven thousand dollars; from five and six thousand to ten and fifteen thousand dollars; with very many others that he did not then recollect, the principle of which was the same with those now complained of. The latter was nothing more than an extension of the same principle and practices. Whether it had been abused was a question for the House to decide. The committee had openly expressed their opinion. Mr. C. would have desired to have seen the reports printed, and laid on the tables of members, before any opinion should have been expressed. The minority report he had not seen until it was presented to the House, the day before, and did not know what it contained. Mr. C. was sorry that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. JOHNSON] had not waited for the printing of the reports, and examined for himself, before forming and expressing an opinion; he would then have had an opportunity of examining for himself the numerous documents accompanying the reports. Whatever might be charged against Major Barry, Mr. C. believed him to be an honest and upright man; and so the world would pronounce him. He may have erred, and his mode and manner of doing business may not have been the best; but he believed his intentions were good. He regretted the necessity for offering these remarks, and he owed the House an apology for detaining them at this late hour. The testimony which had been laid before the committee, and would accompany the report, traced back the practices of the Department, in some instances, as far as 1805. He need say nothing further, as the House would shortly have the whole before them. Mr. C., as he had promised to do, renewed the motion for the previous question.

The call was seconded by the House: Ayes 140, noes not counted.

The previous question was then put in the usual form, viz: "Shall the main question now be put?" and being carried without division, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPEIGHT now moved for a division of the question, so that it should be taken first upon the number of copies with documents appended, and then on the number of copies without documents.

Mr. BRIGGS now modified his motion so as to propose that 3,000 copies of the reports of both the majority and minority of the Post Office Committee should be printed, having appended thereto the documents referred to in the reports, and 20,000 copies of the reports without the documents.

The question being first put on the former branch of his motion, was decided, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Quincy Adams, Heman Allen, Chilton Allan, W. Allen, Archer, Ashley, Banks, Barnitz, Barringer, Bates, Baylies, Bean, Beatty, Bell, Blair, Boon, Bouldin, Briggs, Brown, Bunch, Burges, Burns, Bynum, Cage, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carmichael, Casey, Chambers, Chaney, Claiborne, William Clark, Clay, Clayton, Clowney, Connor, Corwin, Coulter, Crane, Crockett, Darlington, Davis, Day, Deberry, Denny, Dickson, Dickerson, Dunlap, Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Ewing, Ferris, Fillmore, Fowler, Philo C. So the first part of the motion, to print 3,000 copies of the reports and documents together, was agreed to.

The question being then put on printing the copies without documents, it was also carried: Yeas 101, nays 93.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 16.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. EVANS presented the petition of a large number of citizens of Waterville and Vassalborough, in the State of Maine, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and stated, in brief terms, his acquiescence in the general sentiments and objects of the memorial, and his hope that, at no distant day, the attention of Congress would be given to the subject; and that, so far as he could tread on firm, constitutional ground, he should go promptly and unhesitatingly. The subject was not free from difficulties, but he trusted they would all be overcome by the wisdom, perseverance, patriotism, and philanthropy, which Congress might bring to its consideration. As other similar memorials had been already referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, he moved the same reference of this, in the hope that the committee would, at some early period, present a report.

Mr. PHILLIPS said he was about to present a memorial in favor of the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. It was signed by 1,249 male citizens, who are all represented to be legal voters, and also by 2,643 ladies, of the county of Essex, in the State of Massachusetts. These memorialists, said Mr. P., are many of them known to me to be of the most respectable character and standing. They respectfully and earnestly entreat the attention of Congress to the object to which their memorial is confined. The sentiments which they utter are just, humane, and patriotic: the motives by which they are evidently actuated are commendable; and the object which they seek may be accomplished, and can only be accomplished, by the action of Congress. Upon these grounds their memorial is entitled to consideration; and I owe it to them and to the House to declare that, while I am opposed, from my own conviction of what is constitutional, just, and expedient, to any interference on the part of the general Government, or of the free States, with the exclusive rights, interests, and duties, of the slave-holding States, I am equally convinced of the constitutionality, expediency, and justice, of a suitable provision by the general Government for the abolition of slavery within the District of Columbia.

Breakwater at Portland—Slavery in the District of Columbia.

[H. OF R.]

So far as slavery exists within any of the States, it is for them, upon their own responsibility, to determine when, and in what manner, it shall cease to exist there; but so far as it exists here, and is exhibited before our eyes in its worst forms of degradation and cruelty, the right and duty belong to Congress alone of restraining or abolishing it. Towards the abolition of slavery within the States, I am only desirous that the general Government, at a proper time, should contribute to the extent of its ability such aid as may be acceptable, and can be judiciously applied; but in respect to the object which this memorial discloses, I cannot doubt that there are existing evils which require a legislative remedy at our hands, in such form as our wisdom may devise. I cannot doubt that a period must arrive when the continuance of slavery within this District will be regarded, in its obvious aspects, as disgraceful to the nation, contrary to public opinion, and subversive alike of the rights of slaves and the interests of free citizens. That period, in my humble judgment, will have arrived as soon as the facts and arguments contained in such memorials as this shall obtain a dispassionate, candid, and deliberate investigation.

Mr. P. said that he would desire a reference of this memorial to a select committee; but as such a reference had been already formally refused in a similar case, he would content himself for the present with asking that it should be laid upon the table.

BREAKWATER AT PORTLAND.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, presented a copy of the proceedings of a public meeting, holden in the city of Portland on the 10th instant, for the purpose of taking into consideration the expediency of one or more breakwaters in the harbor of that city. Mr. S. remarked that the meeting is represented as having been composed of the merchants, ship owners and masters, at that port; and their resolutions declare the necessity of an expenditure for the protection of their harbor and property. I perceive, said he, that the mayor of the city, who is a distinguished merchant, presided at the meeting. The subject, sir, is one of vital importance to the prosperity of Portland, and in fact to the commercial interests of the State of Maine. The work has been strongly recommended as of great utility, after a careful survey, by an engineer of the Government. An appropriation for it has also been reported by a committee of this House, during the present session of Congress. Under this state of the matter, it will be unnecessary to refer the proceedings now presented to a committee; but I ask that they may be printed for the information of the House.

The printing was ordered accordingly.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. DICKSON presented the memorial of sundry citizens of Rochester, in the State of New York, praying Congress to take the proper measures for abolishing slavery within the District of Columbia; which he moved be laid on the table and printed, together with the names attached to the same.

Mr. BOON asked for a division of the motion.

The question was first put on printing the memorial without the signatures, and agreed to.

After the decision was pronounced by the Chair, some doubt was expressed by Mr. WISE whether a majority had voted in the affirmative, and it was suggested that the question was not understood by the House.

The SPEAKER rose again to propound the question. Mr. McKENNAN objected, on the ground that the decision had already been announced.

Mr. WISE said he did not vote on the question, and he desired to be informed by the Chair whether it was competent for him to move a reconsideration of the vote upon printing the memorial.

The SPEAKER said it was.

Mr. WISE then moved a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. HIESTER asked that the memorial be read; which was done.

Mr. DICKSON said he would not enter into the merits of the question, but, as a motion to reconsider had been made, he would only remark that the memorial was signed by the mayor and many of the most respectable citizens of Rochester, belonging to both of the two great parties which now agitated the country.

Mr. CHINN said that he hoped the motion to reconsider would prevail. He saw nothing which distinguished this memorial from any other upon the subject. Although it was signed, as the gentleman from New York had stated to the House, by the mayor of Rochester and other distinguished persons, he could not perceive that this fact entitled it to a consideration different from that which was given to others. It presents no new argument; it states no fact but what was contained in others; and the grievances which it recites are common to all which have been offered here. It was unnecessary for him to assert that these grievances were in the main unfounded. If this memorial was printed, why not print all which had been offered? There was no difference between them; if there was, it was not such as to entitle this to unusual consideration. He did not wish to discuss this question; he did not know that he ever would discuss it. The whole mischief, perhaps, consisted in discussion. This had been, and still was, his opinion; and he had always acted in conformity with it. He hoped the motion would prevail, and that the same disposition would be made of this as of the many others which had been presented.

Mr. BOULDIN said that he had not supposed he would vote for the printing of this memorial until he heard it read. But, after having heard it read, he should vote for printing it; not because he approved of the presenting of it, or of the object of it; nor that he dissented from the general propositions about liberty and slavery in it; but because he wished his constituents to know what feelings were entertained by their Northern brethren (some of them) of slavery and slaveholders, and the means of abolishing slavery.

He said he was unwilling to draw any comparisons between the country he had the honor in part to represent, and any other portion of the Union; but every remark about slavery, slaveholders, and slave markets, made in that memorial, in relation to this District, applied equally to the habits, customs, and legal rights, of the people of all the South. He wished them to see what those opinions and feelings were; and therefore, and for that only, he should vote for printing the memorial.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, hoped that the motion to reconsider would prevail, and that the memorial would be laid on the table. He repudiated the interference of the Northern with the rights and property of the people of the Southern States. Whenever the North should succeed in procuring legislation by Congress, in regard to these rights and this species of property, that moment the Union would be dissolved.

Mr. BOON, said as he had asked for a division of the question, and belonging to a non-slave-holding State, it was perhaps proper that he should say a word or two. There was no person more opposed to slavery than himself; but, while he was opposed to the principle, he was also opposed to interfering with those rights to property which were guaranteed to the citizens of particular States and districts by the constitution of the United States. It would be recollected that this question, when the subject of the admission of Missouri into the Union was before the House, had come very near dividing the Union. He thought the same course which had been adopted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] in presenting a similar memorial this morning, which was, to move that it be laid on the table, was the proper one, and that this memorial should be disposed of in a similar manner.

Slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. FILLMORE said, as it was understood that the Committee on the District of Columbia would not act on this subject at the present session, it was certainly due to the petitioners that the motion which had been made by his colleague [Mr. DICKSON] should prevail. It was not unreasonable that the memorial should be printed and preserved among the documents of the House. He disavowed, most unequivocally, now and for ever, any desire on his part to interfere with the rights, or what was termed the property, of the citizens of other States. While he did this, he conceived that, as a citizen of the State of New York, and a member of this House, he was interested in the claim to property in man within the District of Columbia. He referred to the effect which was produced in the North by the advertisements in the papers of this city connected with the purchase and transportation of slaves. The people of that section of the country believed slavery to be improper, and that it should not be tolerated. This was a great national question. There was nothing in the memorial which should prevent its being printed and placed on the files of the House for future reference. Whenever petitions should be presented here from the slave-holding States, of a different tenor, and which might advocate the establishment or continuance of slave markets in this District and city, if they could satisfy the people of other sections that this was proper, he would treat their petitions with respect. He was willing that each party should be fully heard, and that each should have the privilege of spreading their views before the people generally.

Mr. McKINLEY regretted that this discussion had sprung up. He thought it manifested more zeal than prudence. He inquired if the printing was intended to enlighten the House or the country? It was admitted on all hands that no action was to take place upon this subject at this session. That being the case, what object would be attained by printing this memorial? He considered it one of the most impudent memorials which had ever been read in this House. It was a firebrand from one of the Northern States, which had been thrown into this House, and he was, for one, opposed to giving it any publicity. He denied that this House had the right to lay their hands upon his property, let him live where he might. There was no disrespect intended to the memorialists by refusing to print their memorial. It had been received by the House, and that, he contended, was sufficient. Nothing more ought to be expected. He cared not whether it had come from a mayor of a city or the President of the United States, he should oppose the motion to print.

Mr. PARKER was at a loss, he said, to perceive how the mere reading and printing of the memorial could produce unpleasant feelings in that House or in the nation at large; nor was it, in his opinion, calculated to throw a firebrand into the slave-holding States. It appeared to him to be more like a respectful address to the House, calling upon them to exercise the undoubted privileges conferred upon it by the constitution, of legislating for the District of Columbia, in removing what the petitioners considered a great and existing grievance; and, if it was intended or wished to prevent any debate, it could be easily obviated by withdrawing the question of reconsideration. What was the state of the subject; what had been done heretofore; and how did the matter then stand? A portion of the people of this country, considering the evil a national one, as one that ought not to be tolerated by a free people, respectfully ask that House to take measures to redress the evils. Petitions of this nature have been referred to the committee intrusted with the management of the affairs of the District, not only the present session, but the last and several preceding sessions. Now, the prayer of the petition was either right or wrong, and their reasons either forcible and conclusive, or otherwise. Let, then, the Committee on the District of Columbia make a report, and tell us what they think ought to be done, and give us their reasons, so that the House might judge of the question. Mr. P. was not prejudiced one way or the other; but he thought an answer to the prayer of the petition should be given, for it was neither unlawful nor unrighteous.

The argument of his honorable friend from Alabama, [Mr. McKINLEY,] that Congress had no right to interfere, Mr. P. could not assent to so readily. Let that gentleman, who was fully competent to give his reasons, state them on this subject. For himself, in accordance with the wishes and opinions of his constituents, and the persons presenting this memorial, he should feel it his bounden duty to vote to put their petition upon the files of the House, and he should continue to urge it with all the zeal of which he was capable, at the same time with all due consideration to the feelings, prejudices, interests, and rights, of others, and which they were entitled to require at his hands. This he should do, until the Committee on the District of Columbia, or some select committee of the House, answered the question, and told us, at the same time giving their reasons, whether Congress had a right to legislate on this subject or not, and until the House had concurred in that decision.

Mr. DICKSON then withdrew that part of the motion proposing to print the names of the subscribers to the memorial.

Mr. CLAY said he was even more opposed to the printing of the memorial itself than he was to printing the names appended to it, which he regarded as a matter of little consequence compared with the other. He was decidedly opposed to the publication of such a document. In spite of all the fair professions heard there upon the subject, as to any non-interference with the rights, interests, and property, of the Southern States, or any other property of this kind, gentlemen must be forgetful of the domestic policy and every thing else concerning the peace and tranquillity of those States, when they ask for the printing and publication of a document like the one under consideration. Are these gentlemen ignorant that the printing and publishing of documents of this kind, in almost all the Southern States, are prohibited under high and heavy penalties? And would they compel, or at least sanction, the publication of documents by Congress, for doing which, if a Southern tribunal could lay their hands upon a printer doing the same on his individual responsibility, he would be treated and punished as a culprit? Do they call this non-interference with the rights of property, where slavery prevailed? Gentlemen might disclaim any intention of interfering with this subject; but when he heard such disclaimers as those made by the gentleman from New York, covered by so thin a veil as he had employed, Mr. C. could not yield his assent to them. The gentleman told us that this was a subject he had no intention of interfering with, while at the same time he called it a great national question, and, consequently, one that ought to be agitated in that House. Was it not a subject against which Southern people should decidedly protest? And was it not one calculated to excite the most direful calamities in that portion of the Union whence Mr. C. and many of his friends came?

Mr. C. had no hesitation in giving an unqualified con-tradition to the supposition that it was the wish of the intelligent and enlightened citizens of the Northern and Middle States to agitate this question. It was confined to a few fanatics, urged and guided by the Garrisons, the Tappans, and others, their wire-workers, who had recently attracted public attention, and whose object was well known. He did not, he could not, bring himself to believe that it was the wish of the great mass of the population of the New England or Middle States to bring on this matter. Were we to be told, because a handful of fanatics, who were ready to light the torch of dissension and civil discord through the country were moving on this subject, that it was a matter connected with the national prosperity, or that it was a matter of right to that description of individuals, to discuss and agitate the subject in that House. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FARRER] called upon the Committee for the District of Columbia to report on the subject, in order that it might be discussed and investigated. Why, that was the very course of proceeding calculated to produce the evils contemplated—evils of such a character as no good citizen, in any part of this wide-spread and extensive Union, ought for a moment to desire. Mr. C. would inquire, how came it that this was a matter of such concern to those individuals? Did it interfere with their domestic policy, their domestic rights, their liberty, their property, or their security, in any point of view? He was at a loss to perceive how it could. Why was it, then, that those persons sought to interfere with the domestic policy of others? It could not be denied that this was a matter of domestic right and policy; and on what grounds, then, could they find themselves warranted or justified in interfering to give direction to that policy? It was a matter that concerned not them, either individually or as a community. Until the Committee for the District of Columbia, or some other committee, should report, the gentleman from New Jersey tells us he should hold himself ready and willing to receive and print all memorials on the subject. But had the people of the District called upon Congress to legislate on the subject? They had not. And why should Congress be called upon by others to give a new direction to the domestic policy of others, without consent first obtained? That doctrine was contrary to any expressed wish of theirs. These petitioners might, with equal propriety, memorialize the Legislature of Virginia, or the Legislature of any other State, and call upon them, in the name of national honor, to reverse their policy, and abolish the laws authorizing the holding of property of this kind.

Mr. C., in conclusion, said, for his own part, after the admission, which seemed to have been made on all hands, that this was a matter belonging to the people holding this peculiar species of property, and after the disclaimer that had been made of non-interference, and in the absence of any petition from the inhabitants of the District of Columbia, and without any call on the part of any of the States where property of this kind existed, he did think that these gentlemen ought not to press this subject, in any form whatever, upon the consideration of the House.

Mr. C. P. WHITE moved to lay the motion to reconsider, and the memorial itself, on the table.

On a question from Mr. WISE, some conversation arose on the point whether, if the motion to lay on the table prevailed, the motion to print, which had been announced by the Chair as adopted, would be considered and recorded as adopted. Mr. WISE, Mr. J. Q. ADAMS, and Mr. BRIGGS, participated therein.

The CHAIR said it was a matter not entirely belonging to him, but as the question had been put to him, he should say that the Clerk of the House could not order the memorial to be printed, inasmuch as there would be, if the motion to lay on the table prevailed, a motion pending to reconsider the vote to print the memorial. The motion to lay on the table prevailing would not finally dispose of the matter, because the House might call it up, on doing which the question would recur on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. DICKSON asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. GHOLSON appealed to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHITE,] to withdraw his motion; for the people of the South were very anxious to know the feeling of the House upon the subject, and he hoped to see it expressed by a direct vote.

Mr. C. P. WHITE said, though he was at all times very glad to accommodate the gentleman, yet, in this particular, he must be excused.

The conversation on the point of order, and the Speaker's decision, was resumed; and after a few minutes spent thereon,

Mr. C. P. WHITE said, to meet the views of the gentleman from Virginia, he withdrew the motion to lay the subject on the table, and moved the previous question.

The second to the previous question and the main question were both agreed to, without a division.

The question then occurred on reconsidering the motion to print the memorial, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered, and it was decided as follows: Yeas 125, nays 81.

So the House determined to reconsider their vote.

Mr. WISE said: Although I have my feelings, my prejudices, my passions, and my fixed principles and determination, as a Southern man, on this subject, yet I hope I can discuss it without excitement. I rise not, sir, to throw, as some others have thrown, a firebrand amongst us. I rise simply to state to my constituents, and the country at large, the true state of feeling, and of the case as it exists here, in the North and in the South.

I trust I am well assured that the Representatives on this floor from the North do not wish or design to interfere with our rights. That they merely feel bound in their representative duty to present these memorials, so dangerous in their tendency, and incendiary in their character, from respect to a few, a very few only, of their constituents, comparatively, and that they do not act from their own impulses.

Sir, on this delicate and vitally important subject, the moderate, considerate, and patriotic men of the South, as well as of the North, have enemies to contend with. In the North we have a few misguided fanatics, whose zeal prompts them to rush blindly into the most absurd extremes; and in the South, I am sorry to say it, there are not wanting those who seize upon every pretext to inflame the public mind on the subject of slavery. In this delicate situation, what should be the course of the friends of our country and our institutions? Why, sir, the friends of good order, of the constitution, and of the existence of this Republic, in this House or out of it, in the North or in the South, must use their influence to moderate and quench these spirits of both extremes of fanaticism and of disorganization. When memorials of the character of this now asked to be printed are presented, it is respectful enough, I should think, to the memorialists, to receive them; if printed, they will be circulated throughout the country, to fan the flames of the zealots on one side, and to serve as food for the disorganizers on the other. We, who would be safe and secure in the blessings we now enjoy, will, therefore, smother these memorials on their first presentation. I am willing, sir, to treat all memorials, no matter how extravagant or preposterous, or of what character, with respect, provided they are from a respectable body of citizens, decorous, and not dangerous in their tendencies. But, sir, I cannot tolerate, much less give consequence and eclat to memorials and petitions which strike at the very foundations of the social compact and our civil institutions. I will not hear them; I desire not to see them; and would reject them at once. With what sort of respect, I put it to the gentleman from the western part of New York, [Mr. FILLMORE,] could he treat an incendiary who should respectfully ask him to permit him to apply a torch to his dwelling? Would he regard him as a sober-minded neighbor or madman, as a fiend or friend? Sir, I was sorry to hear some of the remarks of the gentleman from New York. He says that the people of the North are continually shocked by advertisements of slave-dealers in the papers of this District. I am sorry, sir, that their nerves are so delicate, when their fathers did more than any other people of the colonies to establish slavery amongst us. And I appeal to Southern gentlemen for the truth of the remarkable fact that the emigrants from the North to the South, some from the gentleman's own district, perhaps, are as ready to become masters as any who are hereditary masters. To strengthen their nerves and change their whole principles and opinions on the subject, they have but to change their climes, their homes. And if they choose to remain at home, they may cease to take these odious papers. If slavery were abolished in the District, I know not what would restrain the press still from publishing advertisements. And if the papers here cease to publish for runaways and purchasers of slaves, still the gentleman would have to cease taking the papers of the South, or to silence them too. Sir, slavery is interwoven with our very political existence, is guaranteed by our constitution, and its consequences must be borne with by our Northern brethren, as resulting from our system of Government; and they cannot attack the institutions of slavery without attacking the institutions of the country, our safety and welfare. The gentleman says he will ever respect the property of the States, but he claims to legislate away the property of this District. Sir, a slave is as much property here as in Virginia: property by the law and the constitution. And, in addition to the remark of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. McKIMLEY,] that you will not surely take private property without just compensation—and that you cannot compensate without taking in part of the taxes of the South to pay for slaves, I will repeat the idea that, although you have exclusive jurisdiction over this "ten miles square," yet it is common ground, for the good of the whole, and for the use of the whole people of every State in the Union. And I would ask of the gentleman, if he can come upon this ground with his carriage and horses, why cannot I come with my slaves, to remain here, to live here, as long as I please? Sir, I say it not in passion, but calmly and dispassionately, that Congress has no right to abolish slavery even here, against the consent of the slave-holders, who are not represented; and I warn gentlemen, that the South—I speak for all as strongly as one man can speak for many, for millions—that the South will fight to the hilt against the abolition of slavery in this District, unless the inhabitants owning slaves themselves petition for it, as they would against any interference with the right of slave property in Virginia.

The gentleman calls this a great "national question." I protest, sir, against its being so considered. The nation has nothing to do with slave property. It is simply a delicate question of private, individual right, wholly and solely under the control of the States where slavery exists. It is a reserved State right, with which the general Government has no right of interference even, and from intermeddling with which the free States and their inhabitants should scrupulously abstain.

The pseudo-philanthropists of the North do but defeat their own objects, when they rudely attempt to touch or handle a subject which does not immediately concern them; and true Christians and philanthropists will always find their principles, and the cause of humanity, best subserved by being the friends of slave-holders, instead of being the friends of slaves, and by co-operating with intelligent, humane, enlightened, and patriotic slave-owners of the South, by ways and means which the lights of the age have already shown. If violence or intrusion upon our rights be persisted in and pursued, gentlemen will find Union men and Nullifiers of the South all united on the subject—ready, ripe for revolution, if the worst must come to the worst!

I hope, sir, that this House will not shock the South more by the printing of this memorial, than the constituents of the gentleman from New York were ever shocked by slave advertisements; and that it, and all others like it, will now and for all time to come be smothered and suppressed.

Mr. BOULDIN said he should not have risen again but for a remark made by his friend and colleague, [Mr. WISE.] His colleague had said that he was not for sending a firebrand in the South; but for this part of his colleague's remarks, he would not have risen to say another word. Mr. B. said, far be it from him to cast, or be the means of casting, a firebrand in the South, or the North, or any where. But he had said he would vote to print, merely that the South might know what was going on. He would put it to his colleague, if presenting such memorials as this was not, as his colleague had said, like putting a torch to a man's house; and if a proposition not to print was not like putting a torch to his colleague's house privately, and, on detection, asking him to keep it a secret.

Mr. WISE explained, and said he had no allusion to him, and that he was among the last men he would charge with throwing a firebrand.

Mr. BOULDIN said he was sure of that; but did not know that every one would be equally so.

Mr. ARCHER then rose and asked leave to make a suggestion to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. BOULDIN said he would answer to that suggestion of his colleague immediately. He wished only to say a word or two.

Mr. B. said, far be it from him, and very far had it been from him, to throw any firebrands, or make any offensive comparisons between his and any other part of the Union. But the memorial did. It alluded to habits, and customs, and legal rights, common to this District and to the States of the South, in the most disparaging terms. Mr. B. had refused, and did then refuse, to make any comparison of the principles, habits, or laws, of the South, and North, and East.

He said the South had their infirmities, their weaknesses, and their misfortunes, and perhaps the one alluded to was the greatest misfortune to which the people of the South were liable. But had gentlemen no misfortunes, no infirmities, in the body politic amongst them? Suppose he were to go into their country, and inquire into every thing, and see what they had and could not well get rid off. But he would not. He had no idea of being reduced to the necessity of answering and defending every infirmity and misfortune incident to our nature, or cower under the charge. Let them that were without fault cast the first stone.

He would, before sitting down, say one thing. He had seen, in the testimony taken before the House of Commons in England, proof that a man and his wife had literally starved for want of the work to which they were brought up, in making negro cotton. He knew that many negroes had died from exposure to weather, for the want of that negro cotton. Clad in a flimsy fabric, that will turn neither wind nor water, substituted by Northern and Eastern people, who present these memorials, or from whose region they are presented, which substitute sold, under protecting duties, for the profit of perhaps four pence half-penny in the yard. So the poor Englishman is starved, and the poor slave perishes in the cold, for this profit. It appears, then, that after all their piteous ditties, sung and said, their philanthropy does not amount to 6½ cents a yard in the negro's clothing. Having said thus much, and after hearing his colleague, and lest it should be thought by any one that he wished to throw a firebrand any where, he would, at the suggestion of his friend and colleague, [Mr. ARCHER,] with a view to get clear of the whole matter, and lay it on the table, yield to him the floor to make that motion.

Mr. ARCHER said he considered it almost as indiscreet in gentlemen from the South or slave-holding States to discuss this question, as it was for the Representatives from the North to introduce it. He would add nothing to this remark, but moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

The question was then taken on laying the motion on the table, by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 139, noes 63.

WRITINGS OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. WISE, from the committee on the subject, reported the following joint resolution:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase of Russell, Odiorne & Co. one thousand copies of the writings of General George Washington, now being edited by Jared Sparks, provided that the said works shall not cost more than three dollars per volume. And the Secretary of State shall cause to be distributed a copy of the same to each member of the present Congress, to each Governor of the States, for the use of the State libraries, to each university and college of the United States, and to the public libraries in foreign countries, whose Governments have made presents of valuable books to the library of Congress, and that the purchase money of the same be, and is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated by law.

The resolution was read twice, and Mr. WISE moved to commit it to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Maine, said he hoped the House would dispose of the resolution now. Every gentleman must be aware of the difficulty of knowing when a resolution of this description will be taken up, in the haste of proceedings at the close of a session. It is impossible for those opposed to keep watch of its progress, and it may pass from its not being observed, when it would not under other circumstances. Sir, I am opposed to it. It must be known to the House that, under two resolutions of this House passed at the last session of the present Congress, more than $41,000 have been expended for books for the members of this House. This appears from the published account rendered by the Clerk of the House. This, sir, ought to suffice for one Congress. I regret to say that I voted at the last session for one of the resolutions to which I now allude, while it was passing a preliminary stage. But, sir, if there is one vote of all the votes I have ever given, that I desire to blot out more than all the rest, it is that vote. That the books now offered are valuable, I do not doubt. That they are desirable, is also true. I would, sir, that every individual in the nation had a copy of them. But I do not think we are justified in voting these books for our private libraries, nor even to recompense those who have generously contributed to the public library of Congress. They do not relate to the legislation of the country. They appertain to the general history of the nation. Those who desire them should obtain them at their individual expense. I know not, said Mr. S., the source whence this resolution has come; for, until now, I never heard of it. But, sir, I will assure the mover of it that I am opposed to it, not upon the ground that the books are not valuable, nor upon the ground that they are not desirable and useful as history, but solely upon the ground that we ought not here, as the Representatives of the people, to vote ourselves books of this description, to be paid for out of the public treasury.

He concluded by moving to lay the resolution on the table, but withdrew the motion on a pledge for its renewal by

Mr. WISE, who further explained, adverted to the heavy expense of the publishers, and the patronage which had been extended to other works having weaker claims. The resolution went to limit the price. Three volumes had been already published, and it was expected the work would extend to twelve volumes. He hoped the House would not consent to the motion he was now pledged to make. He thereupon renewed the motion to lay the resolution on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays upon it. By permission, he replied, in answer to a query whether these writings were not those the MSS. of which had been already purchased by Congress, that they were, though the whole was not to be published. The yeas and nays were then taken, and stood: Yeas 141, nays 48. So the resolution was laid upon the table.

STATUE OF JEFFERSON.

Mr. JARVIS reported a resolution, directing the bronze statue of Jefferson to be removed from the rotundo, and kept in some safe place until Congress should take order for its disposal.

Mr. MERCER moved to amend, by striking out all after the removal.

After some desultory conversation, Mr. CHINN moved to lay the resolution on the table; but the motion was negatived: Yeas 68, noes 85.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, inquired whether the House had accepted the statue. He understood that the House had accepted, and the Senate refused. Under these circumstances, he thought the owner (Lieutenant Levy) ought to be allowed to take back the statue.

Mr. MERCER explained his reason for moving the amendment to be that he was unwilling the House should accept a present from any but a distinguished source; as it was a high honor for the House to confer, to receive a present on behalf of the nation from any one. He would vote to-morrow for ordering a suitable statue of Mr. Jefferson to be executed.

Mr. ADAMS thought the motion in its present form was not respectful to the donor of the statue; especially after the House had voted to accept it. He should prefer that directions should be added for the returning the statue to the owner.

The discussion was cut off by a motion of Mr. POLK that the House pass to the orders of the day; which prevailed.

WASHINGTON AND BALTIMORE RAILROAD.

On motion of Mr. CHINN, the House took up the bill authorizing the Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company to construct a railroad within the District.

Mr. PARKER moved several amendments to the bill, the principal feature of which was to relieve the company from the restriction which confined them to the streets, and the requiring of the road to pass through the city to the company's basin near Georgetown.

Mr. P. explained and defended his amendment in a speech of much earnestness; to which Mr. CHINN briefly replied, stating that the bill, as reported, had the concurrence both of the company and of the corporation of Washington.

Mr. McKIM, to end the discussion, moved the previous question.

Mr. PARKER moved an adjournment, but it was negatived.

The previous question was then seconded: Ayes 91, noes 32; and being put and carried, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

A short time was then spent on a bill for certain improvements in Florida; but there being scarce a quorum left in the House, the farther consideration of the bill was postponed, and

The House thereupon adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17.

STATUE OF JEFFERSON.

The joint resolution for the removal of the bronze statue of Jefferson out of the rotundo was taken up, as the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. McKINLEY moved to postpone the resolution till to-morrow, and thereupon he asked the yeas and nays; which were refused.

The motion was agreed to: 78 to 63.

COMPENSATION TO R. P. LETCHER.

Mr. McKINLEY asked if it was now in order to take up the resolution in relation to the election of printer.

The SPEAKER stated that the business in order was the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections; which was read.

Mr. McKINLEY moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was rejected: 74 to 81.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution, reported from the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That Robert P. Letcher, having been returned as the rightful member of the House of Representatives of the United States from the fifth congressional district of Kentucky, is entitled to compensation as a member of the last and present session."

The question being on the adoption of the amendment offered by Mr. HARDIN, including within the proposition Thomas P. Moore,

Mr. VANDERPOEL said, as he was a member of the Committee of Elections last year, and was still connected with that committee, he would take the opportunity of saying a word about the resolution and amendment under consideration. It would be recollected that the committee had reported that Mr. Moore was duly elected, but had also reported that both gentlemen ought to be paid. The House decided that the question, as to who was the elected member, was a matter of so much doubt that it could not satisfactorily decide it, and accordingly referred it to the people. This tribunal had decided in favor of Mr Letcher, and the committee could not therefore reasonably, at least so far as it regarded Mr. Letcher, recede from the ground they had taken last session. If the House was then under obligation to pay either party, that obligation was not discharged by any thing that has since transpired. To be sure, Mr. Letcher had said, at the conclusion of the speech which he had made at the bar of the House, that, without having his seat, he would not receive his pay, but this did not absolve the House from its liability, if it ever existed.

Mr. V. said he would vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] which proposed to pay Mr. Moore, but, should that be rejected, he would still vote to pay Mr. Letcher. The committee had proposed to pay both, because they conceived Mr. Moore to be the certificated member, and because both gentlemen had been detained here under the order of the House. The claim of Mr. Letcher was certainly not weakened by a decision in his favor, by the tribunal (the people) to which the case was referred. Still he would, for the reasons before stated, and in accordance with what the committee had recommended last year, vote to pay both. This was a very peculiar case, and would not, probably, very soon occur again. He would prefer having the cases or claims of each gentleman brought before the House in the shape of distinct propositions, that one might not embarrass the other; but as the amendment was proposed, he would vote for it; and repeated that, if rejected, he would vote for the original resolution.

Mr. LETCHER, in order, he said, that he might place himself rectus in curia, as to this matter, explained that what he said last session was, that he would not take the pay unless he was entitled to the seat. He did not say that he would not accept the pay if he was entitled to the seat.

Mr. J. Y. MASON said it was a constitutional privilege to contest the claim for a seat in this House, on proper grounds; but it had never occurred that two individuals received pay at the same time. He had no doubt that the travelling expenses of the claimants ought to be paid in every case. He read the resolution of the last session which, he said, referred it to the people to determine who was the rightful member. The people had determined the question in favor of Mr. Letcher.

Mr. BEARDSLEY was willing, he said, to vote in favor of giving mileage to both of the gentlemen, and he would go no further as to either. The people had not determined that either of the claimants were ever elected; and neither of them, he thought, had any claim to a per diem compensation. As to the present member, the House had determined that they were incapable of determining who was elected. The question was sent back, not for the people to say which had been elected; for that was not the question submitted; but it was left to the electors to determine who they would choose, and they chose Mr. Letcher in preference to Mr. Moore. We were now asked to pay these gentlemen per diem for attending here to contest the seat. He considered it extravagant to pay two members, when the House had determined that neither of them was elected. There was good reason for paying the mileage, but further than that he would not go. If one obtained the per diem allowance, however, the other ought also to have it. He should vote for the amendment and against the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Georgia, said this case was very different from any which had ever before been presented. It was customary for the House, in case of a contested election, to pay the sitting member up to the time when the adverse claim was established, and to pay the successful claimant also from the commencement of the session up to that time. In this case, then, two members were paid. The gentleman from New York was mistaken as to the determination of the House at the last session. They did not determine that neither of the claimants was elected, but that it was impossible to determine which was elected.

Mr. LANE said that contesting a seat in this House was a voluntary act of the claimants, who were not brought here by order of the House. The House in this case could not come to a satisfactory conclusion which was chosen, and referred it to the people to determine who was entitled to the seat. The people had decided, and he would take that as a proof who is and was elected. He would therefore vote only for the pay of one.

Mr. EVANS was opposed, he said, to the amendment which proposed to pay the unsuccessful candidate, unless there was a precedent for it. If there was a precedent, he would vote for the amendment, though he considered it as a very bad precedent. One of the claimants (Mr. Moore) exhibited a certificate of election, which was decided to be insufficient. The other claimant offered to prove that he had received a majority of votes, and that, but for the censurable conduct of an officer, he would have been returned, in the regular manner, as elected. Now, he (Mr. E.) held to the principle, that what ought to have been done was done. To pay Mr. Moore would be to establish a principle that persons coming here to contest any thing shall be paid, if they are unsuccessful.

Mr. CLAYTON said it was a good maxim in law, that what ought to be done is done. When the claimants presented themselves at the last session, if the House had declared one of them to be entitled to the seat, that one would, of course, receive his regular pay. But both of the claimants agreed not to take the seat, and to leave the question to be adjudicated by the House. The House kept them here all the session, and, finally, left the question to the people. The House certainly would not say that the pay which the sitting member from Kentucky would have received, should now go into the public treasury. Mr. Letcher would have been entitled to the pay if he had taken the seat; and no one could say that the Government was entitled to that money. Mr. Moore he considered justly entitled to mileage.

Mr. BURGESS said that, when there was ground of contest, elections ought to be contested at the expense of the nation. It would have the tendency to purify elections to enable men to come here and contest them when they were at all questionable.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON said he could make no difference between the parties. They received nearly an equal number of votes, and neither of them could have deserted his post, and his friends, and declined the contest before the House. He was in favor of paying both, and should vote for the original proposition and for the amendment.

Mr. CLAY said the House had spent several weeks in discussing this subject last year, and seemed now disposed to renew the discussion. Confiding in the disposition of the House to do ample justice to the claim of Mr. Moore whenever it was brought before the House, he moved the previous question.

The House refused to second the motion for the previous question, by a vote of 67 to 92.

Mr. POLK moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day; which was agreed to: 93 to 64.

HEIRS OF COUNT DE GRASSE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives, for their consideration, a petition to the Congress of the United States, from Adelaide Grasse de Grochamps, one of the surviving daughters of the Count de Grasse, together with the letters which accompanied it. Translations of these are also sent.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, February 16, 1835.

Mr. WATMOUGH moved to postpone all the previous orders of the day, for the purpose of taking up the bill to regulate the pay of the navy.

Mr. POLK demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 110, nays 103.

So the motion prevailed.

NAVY PAY BILL.

The House then took up the bill to regulate the pay of the navy of the United States.

The question pending was on the following amendment, offered by Mr. POPE:

"That the bill, with its amendments, be submitted to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to amend the same by striking out from the thirty-second to the thirty-ninth line, inclusive, and inserting in lieu thereof—

"When commanding a squadron on foreign service, three thousand five hundred dollars.

"When commanding a single ship, or in any other service, three thousand dollars.

"When on leave, or waiting orders, two thousand dollars." And by striking out the remainder of the bill from the commencement of the one hundred and ninety-fifth line, beginning with the word "including."

Mr. POPE said, as the House had consented to take up the bill, he hoped they would dispose of it without discussion, and the motion would be agreed to.

After some conversation as to the mode of proceeding, Mr. FILLMORE called for a division of the question, on commitment and instructions.

Mr. BEAUMONT then said, as this bill provided for an increase of the salaries of officers, and was not intended to benefit the sailors, he moved to lay the motion to recommit on the table.

The question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative: Yeas 75, nays 132.

Mr. POPE modified his motion to instruct, so as to leave the allowance of ten cents a mile for travel, and to allow the captains in command $4,000 when on foreign service.

Mr. GILLET was anxious, he said, to add a declaratory clause to the end of the bill, to prevent any extra allowances. But he was willing to allow ten cents a mile for travel. If the House would go into committee without instructions, they would be able to amend the bill, so as to render it more generally acceptable.

Mr. S. JONES suggested that the clause might be added to the instructions moved by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HARDIN thought it better, he said, to go into committee without instructions, and to let the amendments be there moved, one by one.

Mr. BURGESS was in favor of going into committee without instructions.

The motion to recommit the bill with instructions was divided, and first put on recommitment; which was agreed to.

The House then, on motion of Mr. WATMOUGH, went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. BURGESS in the chair.

Mr. POPE moved to amend the bill, so as to fix the pay of captains, when commanding squadrons on foreign service, at $4,000; commanding a single ship, $3,000; and when off duty, $2,000.

Mr. WISE moved to amend this amendment, by making the first sum $4,000, the second $3,500, and the third $2,500.

On this amendment a very desultory debate arose, in which it was contended by Mr. WISE that the amendment of Mr. POPE, instead of raising, would actually reduce the pay of all captains in the navy.

Mr. POPE, on the other hand, insisting that the amendment he had offered met the wishes of nine hundred and sixty out of one thousand officers of the navy.

After repeated ineffectual attempts to get a quorum to vote, tellers were demanded, and being appointed, the vote stood: Ayes 79, noes 46. So the amendment of Mr. WISE to the amendment of Mr. POPE was adopted.

Mr. POPE then moved further to amend the bill by striking out all extra allowances to officers, save ten cents a mile for travelling expenses when under orders.

Mr. GILLET moved to amend this amendment, so as to insert prohibitory clauses against not only all extra allowances, but all rations also; so as to confine the pay of the officers to a salary alone.

Mr. GILLET said, in submitting the amendments which he had the honor to offer, he begged leave to state that his object was to perfect the bill, as far as it was possible to do so. He was the more anxious to do so, as he clearly foresaw that the bill would pass. His amendment was to strike out these words:

"One ration per day only shall be allowed to all officers when attached to vessels for sea service.

"The compensation hereinbefore specified shall be in full for pay and subsistence, and for all allowances in lieu of cabin furniture to commanders of vessels and squadrons, and for all allowances to officers attached to navy yards, or employed on any shore duty, except for detention on surveys of the coasts and yards, or vessels, or courts-martial, or boards of examination, for which an additional allowance of two dollars per day shall be made; for house rent or chamber money, for which two dollars per week shall be allowed, where quarters or public accommodations be not provided, and for travel under orders, for which ten cents per mile shall be allowed. And all acts, or parts of acts, inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deduct from the pay hereafter to become due of the commission and warrant officers of the navy of the United States three per centum of the amount thereof, and to pay the same to the Secretary of the Navy and the Navy Commissioners for the time being, who are hereby appointed a board of commissioners, by the name and style of "Commissioners of the Navy Widows' and Orphans' fund;" which, together with any other moneys to which the fund may become legally entitled, shall constitute a fund to be invested by said board, and the proceeds of it divided and disbursed in such manner as may be hereafter prescribed by Congress."

And insert the following:

"That no allowance shall hereafter be made to any officer employed in the naval service of the United States, for drawing bills, for receiving or disbursing money, or transacting any business for the Government of the United States, nor shall he be allowed servants, or pay for servants, or clothing or rations for them, or pay for the same; nor shall any allowance be made to him for rent of quarters, or to pay rent for furniture, or for lights or fuel, or for travelling expenses or transporting baggage; nor shall any such officer be allowed to transport, or aid in transporting, for pay, any specie or property for any person. It is hereby expressly declared that the yearly allowance provided in this act is all the pay, compensation, and allowance, that shall be received, under any circumstances whatever, by any such officer."

It would at once be perceived that he had several objects in view. He desired, firstly, to dispense with the ration which was provided. The retaining it would be adding to the salary of each officer, when attached to a vessel, $91 25 per annum. When all the officers of the navy should be attached to vessels, this would create an expense, beyond the large salaries now proposed, of about one hundred thousand dollars a year; and, when averaged among the whole, would increase their pay, beyond the proposed salaries, about ten per cent. There was no good reason for this indirect increase. It partook of the character of the "allowances" of which he should presently speak. The only reason he had heard assigned for the continuance of this ration was, that sometimes, at sea, it would so happen that the officers would need the usual sea stores of the ship. In practice, however, it was well known these rations were seldom received in kind, but in cash. There could be no practical difficulty in dispensing with the ration. The officer might receive it from the ship's stores, and have it charged to him as so much applicable to his pay; and he could not perceive why it could not be as easily charged to him as so much wages paid as so much rations. The labor would all be the same. He thought the salaries high enough without this addition. The increase of the expense of the navy was quite as great, without it, as would be satisfactory to the country.

Mr. G. said, in ordinary times, he should have expected to see one large division in this House voting with him, in his effort to prevent so great an increase in salaries of the officers of the general Government. He alluded to those who, at the last session, had expressed the opinion that money had very much increased in value, by the act of the Executive, and those who had voted to diminish the salaries of numerous public officers twenty-five per cent., when the pay of those officers did not average as much as the present pay of naval officers. He believed the chairman of the select committee, [Mr. WARMOUGH,] who was urging this bill, had been, on the occasion alluded to, particularly favorable to the effort to diminish the pay of most of the civil list. The proposition was then to reduce the pay of the Vice President and the heads of Departments below what it is now proposed to give captains in the navy. Even the postmasters in the country, although their whole yearly compensation might not amount to twenty dollars, were to have had one fourth of that sum taken away, because money was then, and was to continue to be, at least that much more valuable than it was a year before. He thought the chairman, and those who had acted with him at the time referred to, stood in a singular position to advocate an increase of salaries, already higher and more adequate to service rendered than those he had attempted to reduce one fourth. And the effort to annex to the high salaries provided in this bill an emolument of $91 25 per annum to each officer, came with a peculiar ill grace from that quarter. He confidently expected that those who professed to be opposed to the increase of the expenses of the general Government, who had been so free in their censure of its past expenses, and expressed such apprehensions for the future, would go with him, at least so far as to cut off this indirect increase. Gentlemen well knew that, if Congress passed laws requiring expenditures, the Executive must execute those laws. He must carry their law into effect; and if there was any fault in the expenses of the general Government, it was chargeable to Congress, who pass laws requiring those expenses. Congress controlled this subject, and if there was ground for censure, it was with that branch of the public service. Until it was shown that the President expends money without the authority of law, he ought to escape censure; and gentlemen should be slow in their criticisms in this matter upon the law-making power. He hoped he should not call in vain upon the House to go with him in his efforts to prevent this enormous and unnecessary increase in the public expenditures.

Mr. G. said the House would perceive in the other part of his amendment, in which he proposed to strike out the provision giving other compensation in certain cases, that he aimed a blow at what is here well understood by the term extra allowances. It was by virtue of these, that officers, occasionally at least, had had very valuable additions made to their regular pay. Mr. G. said that, when he had the honor first to propose this amendment, it did not appear to meet with much approbation; and particularly from the chairman of the select committee, [Mr. WARMOUGH,] who said it would render the bill "incongruous." He believed the honorable member had changed his opinion, or at least would yield his opposition to that part of his amendment. Mr. G. hoped, before he had done with the subject, to bring the mind of the House to the conclusion that the clause giving these extra allowances ought to be stricken out, and the words which he had proposed inserted, which prohibited their being made under any circumstances whatever. From what appeared to be the wish of many of his friends, and the will of the House, and to prevent the defeat of his amendment, he should consent to strike out so much of it as prohibited naval officers from transporting specie for pay. He would, however, state that his own convictions were clear that this prohibition was a necessary one, to cut up by the root a practice which was becoming general, and which was, in his opinion, ruinous in its consequences. Rumor had told of immense fortunes made by naval officers in this business. He much feared that this practice would lead to that of going needlessly from place to place, merely to carry specie for the per centage to be received by the officer in command. It might be easy to find a pretext to justify the going from place to place, when the real object was to carry specie. He believed the continuance of this practice in the navy would destroy its energy and usefulness, and reduce our ships of war to a level with merchantmen, and our gallant officers to that of freighters. He should have no objection to its being carried free of expense, as that could not lead to abuse.

The clause in the bill as it now stands, although it pretends to cut off all allowances, does not do so in fact. It says: "The compensation hereinbefore specified shall be in full for pay and subsistence, and for allowances, in lieu of cabin furniture, to commanders of vessels and squadrons." This is all that relates to commanders of vessels and squadrons. It will be perceived that it cuts off only a single allowance, while it purports to cut off all. The allowances to all other officers purport to be cut off, but it will be seen, on close examination, that there is a long list of exceptions. The Government pays an officer for all his time; and he could see no reason why he should be allowed two dollars per day, when "detained on surveys of the coasts and yards, or vessels, or courts-martial, or boards of examination." This service could not be more hazardous or laborious than the ordinary naval service. The tendency of this extra per diem allowance would be to protract the completion of the business on which he might be engaged.

The section provided house rent, or chamber money, at the rate of two dollars per week. The substance of this provision is this: to give to the officer, in addition to the large salary proposed, to say nothing of the rations, one hundred and four dollars per annum. In practice, he understood it to be usual to hire a room at a hotel or boarding-house, and have board furnished at that place, paying a given sum for both, and taking a receipt for rent of rooms, sufficiently large to cover the allowance. He had been told that this allowance had often been made when even these forms had been omitted. Under this bill it might be fairly allowed as a part of the salary. Let us cut off this extra also.

He had concluded to modify his amendment so as to give pay for travel under orders. When he inserted the provision to prevent this allowance, he apprehended that it might lead to abuse. It might so happen that an officer would be ordered to travel, when the journey was solely to accommodate the officer. He had been told that such things had happened, but he could not vouch for the accuracy of his information. On the other hand, a Secretary who would not scruple to make orders to afford favorites an opportunity to travel at the expense of the Government, would hardly be restrained from gratifying a worse feeling by ordering officers, whom he wished to drive out of the service, from point to point, if they had no travel allowance, when the public service did not require it. The chances of abuse were equal. There remained this reason for the allowance: the public service often required an officer to proceed from one part of the Union to another; say from Portsmouth to New Orleans. The expense of this journey would be very considerable, and could not be borne by the officers of the lower grade, without consuming nearly all the pay allowed for a year. To prevent the hardships which would fall upon this class, if no travel fee were allowed, he had concluded to modify his amendment so as to allow them ten cents per mile for travel under orders.

Mr. G. said he desired not only to strike out these objectionable items, but he wished the prohibitory part of his amendment adopted. That not only prohibited the allowances referred to, but it went further; it prohibited a practice which had formerly prevailed in allowing commissions to commanders of ships or squadrons. The time had been when, under the navy regulations, two and a half per cent. had been allowed for the trifling labor of drawing bills. To the commodore of a squadron this would amount to a large sum. At one period, he had understood that a gross sum of $2,000 per annum had been allowed for this service. He also desired to prohibit the paying a per centage (often allowed) for receiving and disbursing public money; and also that of conferring a distinct agency under which additional pay is received. Whether it had ever occurred or not, he could not say, except upon the authority of current report; but it was now possible, and not prohibited by law, to confer upon the commander of a ship, or other officer on board, an agency distinct from his official duty, and pay him such sum as the service might allow. In this way the secret service fund might be expended upon naval officers abroad, while they were in receipt of full salaries under their commissions. This he wished to prevent. When the Government pays its public servants for their whole time, there could be no sufficient reason for paying them again for distinct portions of it, and they should be content with that, or leave the service.

Mr. G. remarked that it had been said that these officers could not live without the allowances provided in this bill. If this is so, he would ask, how do they live now, when it is said they get such inconsiderable pay? The salary alone, provided in this bill, is much greater than the officers represent their whole pay to be at the present time. He believed these salaries were quite ample, and some of them were too large. Mr. G. said officers were created to transact the public business, and not for the personal benefit of the office-holders. Such compensation should be provided as would command competent persons, who would discharge the trust committed to them with fidelity. Officers of the navy and army stood upon a different footing from all others, save the judiciary; they were officers for life, if not discharged for improper conduct. Hence, that pay which would meet their reasonable and necessary current expenses was the true compensation, as they would never be without a competent income.

It might here be stated that the present compensation had commanded valor, skill, and fidelity. Would any one pretend that it had not? All admitted it had. It was also pretty generally understood that a portion of these officers had made themselves rich. Hence it might well be contended that no increase of the present pay was necessary. Certainly there can be no ground for an increase beyond the salaries proposed. He fully concurred with those who had expressed the opinion that more than was necessary to meet, with due economy, their necessary current expenses would lead to extravagance, inattention to duty, and injure the service.

But, suppose the salaries are insufficient, is it best to increase them, or make allowances? In his mind there was no doubt that the salary should be so fixed as to give all the pay intended. This would prevent the possibility of abuse in pay, and would also avoid, what was now too common, difficulties between those claiming extra allowances and the accounting officers of the Department. Now, officers were often put to inconvenience in coming to Washington to explain and settle their accounts; and we are not without precedents of their going away dissatisfied. We had even had appeals to Congress from the decisions of the Department. We had had a signal instance this session. These would continue as long as the system of allowances was permitted to exist. It was also often important to officers to know the amount they could receive, and to have no part of their income involved in doubt. The people also desired to know the amount paid to each officer; they wished to understand whether the pay allowed to their public servants was such as would meet their approbation. Under the allowance system, they would never know what was received by any officer. It was also important that there should be certainty in the pay of all persons engaged in the public service, so that specific and certain appropriations might be made to meet the exigencies of the service. But what he deemed most important of all was, to place it beyond the power of the Executive or the Department to make any possible draft upon the treasury beyond a certain and known salary. Not that he so much feared abuse, as the suspicion of it. Now, honorable gentlemen rise in their places, and allege that the expenses of the Government are increased, and charge it to the fault of the Executive, and often point to the fact that some of the compensation of public servants depends upon Executive discretion. He wished to put this matter beyond controversy. He would allow nothing of the kind, except from the most cogent necessity, to depend upon the will of any man. He would make the whole a matter of law, and that law would be before the people. If they approved it, their sanction would be freely given; if not, they would as freely condemn. Suspicion might be easily excited against the most upright and correct who exercise such discretionary power. This House will then do an act of favor—nay, an act of justice—to those who administer the laws, to give them as little discretion as possible. Give them none where it is possible to avoid it. Then all will refer to the law as settling the proper rule of action, and be governed by it. Then, if complaint is to be made, it will be in petitioning to Congress to amend and alter the law, and not to the executor of the law for an exercise of his discretion. For these reasons he was decidedly of opinion that it would be far preferable, if greater compensation were necessary, to give it at once in the shape of a salary, than to attempt it in this indirect manner. He trusted, however, that he had sufficiently shown that the salaries proposed were at least high enough without this addition. By this bill they were higher than in any other portion of the public service; and much smaller pay had commanded the best naval officers in the world, and he had no doubt would continue to do so. He then protested against this attempt indirectly to increase pay already sufficiently large.

Mr. G. said he understood that the second section of the bill was to be stricken out by common consent, and therefore he would make no remarks upon it. He said there was one other amendment he desired to make. He wished to strike out these words: "Officers temporarily performing duties belonging to those of a higher grade, shall receive the compensation allowed to such higher grade while actually so employed." This section was liable to lead to abuse. There was no check upon those who should administer the law to prevent their assigning those of a lower grade to perform the duties of a higher one for the express purpose of increasing their pay. If it were possible under the law for him to do so, he would doubtless be pressed to do it. When he should yield for once, he would be overwhelmed with applications of the kind, and they might not always be resisted. His object was to prevent the possibility of these things; and he therefore hoped the friends of the bill would assent to the amendment. It would prove equally beneficial to the service and to the Department. He expected the bill would pass; but, unless its friends permitted it to be amended, and made such as he thought it ought to be, he could not vote for it. And he confidently expected that those who were opposed to executive patronage, and discretionary executive power; those who were for lowering salaries; and those who objected to the amount of the expenses of the Government, would be found voting with him. If they were not, he should indulge the hope that, at least, expenses incurred under the laws of Congress would not occasion their future animadversion; that they would allow the Executive to execute the enacted laws, let the expense be what it might, without incurring their censure. This was due to candor, to truth, to the people, and to that man "who has filled the measure of his country's glory," and those who might succeed him in the executive chair.

The CHAIR pronounced the amendment not to be in order, as it left no part of Mr. Pore's amendment to which it could attach.

Mr. GILLET thereupon withdrew his amendment; and the question being put on Mr. Pore's, it was carried: Ayes 85, noes 39.

Mr. JARVIS moved an amendment, striking out the provision for the pay of the surgeon general, on the ground that no such office existed, and an appropriation bill was not the place to create it.

Mr. WATMOUGH opposed the amendment, and it was withdrawn; when

Mr. MANN, of New York, renewed it; and the question being put, it was carried: Ayes 95, noes not counted.

Mr. GILLET now renewed his amendment, inserting prohibitory clauses against all extra allowances or rations, and confining the pay to a salary and travelling expenses, at ten cents a mile, when under orders.

The question was negative: Ayes 61, noes 69.

Mr. JACKSON, of Massachusetts, moved to amend the bill, so as to allow officers on furlough only half pay, instead of two thirds, and briefly stated his reasons.

And it was carried.

Mr. GILLET moved to strike out the provision that officers temporarily performing the duty of a higher grade should be allowed the pay of that higher grade.

Mr. G. thought it very likely to lead to favoritism and discontent.

Mr. WHITE opposed and Mr. MANN, of New York, advocated this amendment—the latter gentleman with much warmth—inveighing against the provision as a parallel with brevet pay in the army, and being nothing better than a firebrand to the peace and harmony of the navy.

Mr. BURGESS defended the provision proposed to be stricken out as founded in obvious justice: he had too great reliance on the honor and magnanimity of the officers to believe the provision could be abused.

Mr. JONES replied and supported, and Mr. CLAY opposed the amendment; which was rejected: Ayes 34, noes 82.

No quorum having voted, the question was again taken, when the ayes were 8, and the noes 97. There still being no quorum, Navy Pay Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. FOSTER stated that members were pertinaciously keeping their seats, voting neither on one side nor the other; he hoped their names would be taken down and entered on the journal. Such a practice must stop all action in this body.

The CHAIRMAN counted, and reported that 151 members were present.

The question being put once more, the amendment was rejected without a count.

Mr. JARVIS moved several amendments, which went to give commandants over ten years' service 1,500 dollars—waiting orders, 1,200 dollars. It was not agreed to.

Mr. J. moved a further amendment, reducing the pay of passed midshipmen so as to give them, when on duty, 600 dollars, and when waiting orders, 500 dollars. It was rejected.

The committee then rose and reported the bill, as amended.

In the House the amendments were read consecutively; when

Mr. JONES moved to amend the bill so as to reduce the pay of captains from 3,500 dollars to 3,000 dollars, and from 2,500 dollars to 2,000 dollars, and asked the yeas and nays; but the House refused to order them; and the amendment was rejected—

And the several amendments reported from the committee were concurred in.

Mr. GILLET renewed the amendment prohibiting extra allowances, &c., as above stated, when the House was in committee, and supported it by a speech, in which he deprecated the continuance of the difficulties already frequently recurring from the allowance of extra pay. He wished to put an end to all difficulty, by confining the officers to specific salaries. He insisted that, unless an express provision should be inserted, the allowances would still be made, and the ships of the navy would be employed to transport specie or goods of private individuals. He was decidedly opposed to the allowance of rations. He concluded by asking the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. McKIM opposed the amendment. How was the specie from South America to be brought home, in case of war or danger? To cut off all allowance would be apt to operate as a prohibition. He thought one half per cent. ought to be allowed: it was allowed in the British navy, and its abolition would be mischievous.

Mr. BURGESS followed on the same side, and warmly opposed the amendments, as reflecting on the character of our naval officers, and narrowing their privileges in an unworthy manner.

Mr. HARDIN was in favor of so much of the amendment as prohibited an allowance for drawing bills, and he went into a history of that allowance, from its origin. He was, however, in favor of an allowance for the transportation of specie.

Mr. ADAMS strongly advocated the allowance of a commission on the transportation of specie, as just, expedient, and, indeed, indispensable. The money must come in armed ships or not at all; and if our vessels refused it, it would come home by British vessels.

Mr. MANN suggested to Mr. GILLET to strike out that item of his prohibitory clauses which referred to the transportation of specie; and Mr. G. accepted it as a modification.

Mr. M. then went on to inveigh, with warmth, against the allowance of rations and other items of extra compensation.

Mr. WATMOUGH moved to amend Mr. GILLET's amendment, by inserting a prohibitory clause much resembling his, but omitting that part relating to specie. But it was rejected.

Mr. PARKER was in favor of the allowance of rations, as often indispensably necessary, and wanted to have a division between striking out and inserting; but it was declared out of order.

Mr. JONES moved to amend the amendment, by reinserting the prohibition of an allowance for transporting specie; it placed the citizens of the Union at the mercy of the officers in time of war. Let the articles of war require them to transport gratis.

Mr. McKIM referred to his long experience in the freighting of specie; and dwelt upon the justice and policy of the allowance. It was always cheerfully paid.

Mr. JONES rejoined, and warmly protested against the allowance, as a disgrace to the country. He asked the yeas and nays, but the House refused them, and Mr. JONES's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GILLET's amendment was amended, on motion of Mr. FILLMORE, so as to leave out of the amendment the prohibition of the allowance of rations.

Mr. WHITE further moved to amend it by striking out the prohibition of allowance to any "person employed" for drawing bills; which was agreed to.

Mr. LOYALL moved a prohibition to any officer to take his wife, or other female member of his family, to sea, on board a public ship.

Mr. L. briefly supported the amendment, and adverted to the case of the Enterprise, where our flag was insulted with impunity, by a Spanish cruiser, on account of the presence of females on board.

Mr. STEELE explained the circumstances in relation to the Enterprise, and defended the reputation of Captain Tripp, who commanded that vessel. His remarks were imperfectly heard.

Mr. ADAMS opposed the amendment, as containing a reflection on the character of our navy, and on the entire female sex. In time of war no officer would wish to have his family on board, and in peace the regulations of the navy, and the control of the Department, would always be sufficient to provide for cases that might arise.

Mr. WISE hoped the amendment would be withdrawn, as not pertaining to such a bill as this; but the presence of ladies was one of the greatest encumbrances and inconveniences in the world on board a ship; their accommodations, luxuries, provisions for milk, for music, &c., incommoded the sailors, straitened them for room, and rendered the ship unhealthy. It occasioned, too, false musters. In some instances, eighteen or twenty Italian musicians had been taken on board, and reported as able-bodied seamen. But the prohibition ought to be embodied in a different bill.

Mr. LOYALL explained. He did ample justice to Captain Tripp's reputation, and protested against any intention to reflect on the female sex. He insisted that the practice he wished to prohibit was a most pernicious evil, and this was the time to prevent it.

Mr. BURD supported the amendment. He adverted to the case of the brave tar, who was not permitted to carry his wife to sea; and why should the officers? The most chivalrous of our officers had been without either wife or children. What business had a lady on board a ship? Or why should the poor sailor be prohibited from the comforts of his commander? He hoped the amendment would be adopted.

The question being put, the amendment of Mr. LOYALL was rejected: Ayes 60, noes 106.

The yeas and nays were dispensed with, and Mr. GILLET's amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Repeated motions for an adjournment failed.

Mr. GILLET renewed his motion, made in committee, to prevent officers temporarily performing the duties of those of a higher grade from being allowed the pay of such higher grade while so engaged.

Mr. JARVIS also renewed his amendment reducing the pay of lieutenants, but it was rejected without a count.

The question being at length put on the engrossment of the bill,

Mr. MARDIS demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and, being taken, stood as follows:

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 18.

VERMONT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. H. EVERETT presented certain resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont, and moved that they be printed.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS called for the reading of the resolutions. They were read accordingly, as follows:

"STATE OF VERMONT:

To the General Assembly, now sitting:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom were referred those parts of the Governor's message relating to the finances of the Bank of the United States, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

That suitable protection to domestic industry and enterprise, and the furtherance of internal improvement of a national character, are essential to the defence and independence of the country, the prosperity of its agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial pursuits, and the advancement of its general interest and welfare:

That a national bank, with powers properly limited and restricted, is essential, if not indispensable, as a fiscal agent, as well as necessary to sustain and preserve a sound and uniform currency, and give the requisite facilities to trade, commerce, and manufactures:

That an equitable distribution, among the several States, of the moneys arising from the sale of the public lands, for the purpose of education and internal improvement, comports alike with sound policy and the principles of justice:

That the maintenance of the just powers of each Department of the Government, as confined and defined by the constitution, is essential to the preservation of public liberty and the perpetuity of our free institutions; and that the Executive of the United States, in his late removal of the public moneys from the place of custody established by law, exercised a power not given to him by the constitution or laws, but in derogation of both; and, in his late protest to the Senate of the United States, has asserted doctrines, and claimed for himself powers, at variance with the letter and spirit of the constitution, subversive of the legitimate authority of the other branches of the Government, and dangerous to the liberties of the people.

Your committee, therefore, beg leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Governor and Council concurring therein,) That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be requested, by their influence and votes, to sustain the principles and policy herein asserted, and especially to maintain inviolate the authority of the legislative department of the Government, and resist all encroachments upon its constitutional powers.

IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY, November 6, 1834.

Read and adopted.

E. D. BARBER, Clerk."

After they were read,

The question was put on the motion to print the resolutions, and fifty-eight only rising in the affirmative,

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays on the question; which were ordered.

Mr. SLADE said these resolutions were adopted by the Legislature of a State; and, as such, he claimed, as a Representative from that State, that they should be received with so much respect by this body as to be printed. If the sentiments embodied in the resolutions had been presented in the form of a memorial from individual citizens, they would be entitled to be printed. The resolutions, it was true, contained some things in relation to the bank and the removal of the deposits, which were not of immediate interest; but the subject of the public lands, upon which the Legislature had expressed their views, was of immediate and general interest. A bill was now before this House to reduce and graduate the price of the public lands, and it was expected, at one time, that the subject would be acted on at this session. The question was so plain that it was unnecessary to argue it.

Mr. CAGE did not accord, he said, with the principles of the resolutions, but he thought it would be going too far for the House to say that they would not suffer any thing to be printed and submitted to the House and nation, which did not coincide with their views. He hoped that gentlemen who were opposed to the views expressed in the resolutions would withdraw their objections to the printing, as a matter of respect to the State from which they came.

Mr. TURRILL said he should always be willing to pay proper respect to the Legislature of a State; but, while he did that, he would also retain some little respect for this body. It was well known that, at the last session, he opposed the printing of the panic memorials which were then poured into the House, and which, he said, by creating a panic, were the cause of much individual ruin and distress. The House then decided that the course of the Executive in removing the deposits was correct; and, one year after this decision, the Legislature of Vermont undertakes to say that the course of the President was wrong, and to censure the conduct of this House. Under such circumstances, he was not disposed to show any favor to this proceeding.

Mr. H. EVERETT was surprised, he said, at the remarks of the gentleman from New York. He would ask, if a State Legislature had not a right to express their dissent from the course taken by this House, or by the Government of the United States? And whether it was proper for the House to refuse to print any resolutions which were not in accordance with their sentiments? The House was not asked to assent to the doctrines of the resolutions, but merely to order them to be printed, as a mark of respect, which was due to whatever came from a sovereign State.

Mr. CLAY said he hoped the opposition to the motion would be withdrawn. Though the paper was not addressed to the House, but to the State representation in this and in the other House, yet it was proper, and it had been the uniform practice, to print such communications. After having heard the resolutions read, he must say that he dissented from every principle contained in them; but he would not refuse to print them on that account.

Mr. BYNUM was sorry, he said, that any opposition had been made to the motion. No member in the House was more opposed than he was to every principle and opinion stated in the paper; but if he was ten times more opposed to them, he would not oppose the motion to print. It was true that, in another body, reports and memorials from State Legislatures had been refused to be printed; but God forbid, he said, that this House should follow the example, and exhibit itself in the same factions light.

Mr. SLADE said, if this was a question on the reception of the paper, the discussion might be more proper. But the resolutions were received and laid on the table, and the question was now on the motion to print. He would beg to know, then, what there was in the terms of the resolutions which would render it improper to print them? Were they expressed in disrespectful language? This would not be pretended. The Legislature of a State had a right to be heard, by memorial or remonstrance, as well as individuals. It must also be recollected that these resolutions were adopted last October, and that this was the first opportunity which the Legislature of Vermont have had to express their opinion in regard to these interesting questions.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said it was because these resolutions were disrespectful to the House, that he was opposed to the motion to print them. He would vote to print any thing coming from a State Legislature, provided it was expressed in proper language. But this paper was a violent denunciation of what had been done by the House, telling us that our judgment was incorrect. He denied, he said, the right of the Legislature of Vermont to pass judgment on us, and call upon us to record that judgment. He then read an extract from the resolutions, declaring that the President, in removing the deposits from the Bank of the United States, had acted in derogation of the constitution. But the House, said Mr. B., had decided that the President did not transcend his legal and constitutional authority. That being the judgment of the House, if they were willing to record resolutions censuring that judgment, they would do it; but he was opposed to the proposition.

Mr. FOSTER would not, he said, have said one word on this subject, but for the expression which had fallen from the honorable gentleman from New York who had just taken his seat. If the gentleman would turn to the journals of the House, and show us the vote approving of the removal of the deposits, he might justify the assertion he had made. The fact was, that the House was called upon, over and over again, to express an opinion on the propriety of removing the deposits, and they always refused to do it. They evaded that question. He was astonished, then, that the gentleman should hazard such an assertion. The Committee of Ways and Means, at the last session, understood too well the temper of this House to propose a direct question on the propriety of the removal of the deposits. Now, for the gentleman to get up and tell the House that the House had seconded the judgment of the President, and approved of the removal of the deposits, was to him astonishing. But suppose, sir, that the House did come to such a conclusion, can we say that a State has not a right to express its dissent from that conclusion? Were we not every day called upon to reverse the judgment of Congress? Fifty times a year State Legislatures came to us disapproving of the judgment of Congress, and calling for its reversal.

Mr. SUTHERLAND inquired whether the Legislature of Vermont had requested the presentation of these resolutions to the House.

The question being answered by reading a part of the paper,

Mr. PATTON said the objection of the House to print this paper might become a precedent, and, in his opinion, it would be a precedent the House ought decidedly to condemn. He appealed to the House to say whether there was a single instance in the history of this country, at least from 1798 down to the present time, in which either House of Congress had refused to receive and treat with due respect the views of any State on questions of public policy. He regarded the opposition now made to a motion to print this paper as one of a most portentous character. It was well known that he dissented from each and all of these resolutions. But how could he say that the Legislature of Vermont should not come here with opinions obligatory on her Senators, and recommendatory to her Representatives, and have those opinions made known to the public, that they might have their moral effect upon both? They had a claim to be treated with respect when they set forth grievances, or complained of any act of Congress. He trusted that this first attempt to obstruct the States in their approach to this body would be promptly and decidedly put down by the House. As to another subject which had been brought into the discussion, he would remark that he did not understand, as the gentleman from Georgia did, that the question referred to by him had ever been distinctly presented to the House, and that the House had evaded it. No proposition, according to his understanding, had been brought forward to enable the House to express their judgment on the subject. But he agreed that it was, in relation to this motion, a matter of no consequence what was the opinion of the House. The question was one which had agitated this whole country, and which, by both parties, was admitted to be one of vital importance; and the Legislature of Vermont had an undoubted right to remonstrate against an interpretation of the constitution which they deemed to be erroneous.

Mr. BURGESS had never expected, he said, to see and hear what he had seen and heard to-day. Here, among freemen, he could never have expected to witness an effort to put to silence the voice of a whole State. The principle was one which was advocated during the Revolution by a small portion of the people who were termed loyalists, and was opposed by another and larger portion, who bore a much more glorious name. The principles of the whigs were sustained, and the right of petition and remonstrance was secured by our constitution.

Baltimore and Washington Railroad.

Mr. CROCKETT here moved that the orders of the day be taken up; and the motion was agreed to.

{BALTIMORE AND WASHINGTON RAILROAD.

The bill supplementary to the act for the construction of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad to the city of Washington, was read the third time.

Mr. PARKER entered at length into his objections against the passage of this bill, quoting the acts passed by Congress and the Legislature of Maryland, chiefly on the ground that it gave the company privileges too great and extensive.

Mr. CHINN said the objections of the gentleman were extraordinary; for he understood him, the other day, to object to the bill because the Committee on the District of Columbia had refused to grant the company sufficient privileges; and he now opposed it because the privileges were too large.

Mr. PARKER explained. He wished the benefits of the bill to be extended to every part of the District.

Mr. JACKSON said he thought the course of the honorable gentleman from New Jersey extraordinary, and his proposed amendment very unreasonable. He speaks of the law of Maryland, passed in 1830, authorizing the construction of the Baltimore and Washington railroad to the boundary line between that State and the District of Columbia, and the subsequent law of the United States authorizing its construction within the limits of this District, as a compact; and because the State has, by the law of 1832, given to this company a different charter, making their enterprise more hazardous, by reserving to itself a part of the income of this road, the honorable gentleman seems to suppose it proper to impose upon them the immense additional expense of continuing this road to Georgetown, when it is perfectly obvious that no corresponding advantage can be realized from this expenditure to the company, or any body else. It is true that the Legislature of Maryland did pass a law authorizing the location of this road within the limits of that State; and Congress another, authorizing its continuance within this District. Neither of these laws partook, in the slightest degree, of the character of a compact. Nor had Congress any right to exact conditions, involving sacrifices to the company, for the benefit of the nation or the District; because neither contributed any thing for the accomplishment of this immense and hazardous enterprise. All that Congress did by the law of 1831, and all that is now asked to be done, is to permit the company to come and confer a benefit, and a very valuable one too, upon both the nation and the District, without any expense or sacrifice to either. These laws only permitted, they did not obligate, the company to construct this road; and when it was ascertained that it could not be accomplished without aid either from the State or the United States, and that neither were disposed to grant it, the project being abandoned, the laws which gave the permission became null and void.

In 1832 a new act of the Legislature of Maryland was passed. Upon the conditions of that law, the Legislature were induced to pledge the State for one third of the money necessary for the construction of the road, but would sanction the subscription by the State for this stock upon no better terms. The company accepted this law upon these terms. This was a compact. The State of Maryland has fulfilled its part of this compact by advancing half a million of dollars, which has already been expended in the prosecution of this enterprise, and the company are rapidly progressing in the completion of their part of this compact, so that we may now expect this great and valuable improvement to be in complete operation in the course of the ensuing summer, provided the company have the permission of Congress to construct the road in accordance with its present location and termination within this District. This question is now fairly and properly before the House, not embarrassed in the slightest degree by any former acts of State or United States legislation. If the nation or the District are to be injured by the passage of this act, it ought not to be passed. If either or both are benefited, it would be folly to refuse the benefit because it is not greater, or because it cannot be equally beneficial to all parts of the District. How is the fact? Passengers now suffer a very uncomfortable detention of six or eight hours between Baltimore and Washington. When this road is completed, this detention will be reduced to two or two and a half hours, in a situation not less easy and pleasant than at their own firesides. Now, three dollars is the lowest fare. The company, by their charter, are prohibited from charging more than two and a half dollars, and there is a strong probability that the fare will be reduced to two dollars, perhaps to one dollar fifty cents. Whether these terms are considered high or low, they are the best the company could offer with safety to themselves, and inasmuch as they are a very great improvement upon any facility which the nation or the District have ever enjoyed, or ever can enjoy without the aid of a railroad, it is wise to encourage the enterprise, at least so far as to accept the benefits it offers. At the same time, it may be well to remember that neither the company nor the State of Maryland are at all dependent upon the action of Congress for the success of their enterprise. Congress may refuse them permission to cross the line of the District with their railroad, and compel them to deliver their passengers over to stage coaches or omnibuses for the remainder of the journey, at an expense of three dollars instead of two and a half, and with the addition of nearly an hour of time occupied. And evil may, and certainly will, be inflicted upon all the passengers, and upon the whole District of Columbia, by such an illiberal course, but it would not produce the loss of a dollar to the company or the State of Maryland. The company is entitled by its charter to two dollars and fifty cents for each passenger, delivered anywhere within the limits of Washington, and nothing but stage coach competition can compel them to do it for less. Such a competition could never be sustained against the comfortable and rapid movement of the railroad cars, even if the fare were not diminished at all, or the locomotives permitted to approach within three miles of the Capitol. Had Congress, in behalf of the nation and the District, contributed and aided, by its resources, in the accomplishment of this great improvement, as Maryland had done, and as he (Mr. J.) believed it would have been both wise and economical for the United States to have done, the right to have dictated and legislated for the preservation of the interests of the District and the nation might have been secured, as Maryland has done in relation to her interests.

Mr. J. asked the further attention of the House one moment, while he examined the proposition of the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, for compelling this company to extend their road to Georgetown. This proposition evidently rests upon the assumption that the object of constructing this road is to benefit the District of Columbia. From this position he very naturally and very easily steps to another; that is, that this benefit should be equally distributed over the whole District; that the road should be carried to Georgetown; and the gentleman says he would extend it to Alexandria, if he could. Now, it is perfectly obvious that the benefit of this District makes no part of the motive for the great hazard and expenditure of this company. The company make no profession of this kind. Their object is to accommodate travel and transportation. This is the only proper and legitimate object of any road, and wherever this object is made to yield to any other, the interests of the community who are to use it, or the property of the constructors, or both, are to a greater or less extent sacrificed.

Navy Pay Bill.

The company say, and say truly, that the whole District will be benefited. It is, however, only an incidental contingent benefit arising from this great enterprise, for which the citizens have no just claim, and which the company cannot avoid bestowing upon them if they would, and of course are not under the slightest obligation to increase or equalize. Under such circumstances, can the honorable gentleman deem it reasonable to compel this company to incur the expense of constructing more than two miles of railroad, only to benefit Georgetown and the western part of this city? The average cost of this road is expected to be fifty thousand dollars per mile. Judging from the cost of the right of way over the uncultivated, and much of it uncultivable, land on which this road has already been graded, and how far it exceeds any sum which can be considered a just measure for the value of land and damages, taking into view the fact that it must cross a street at every square, much of it cutting, some of it deep cutting, and consequently many bridges to construct, and it is obvious that the actual cost to the company cannot reasonably be estimated at less than two hundred thousand dollars. And what is the motive for which all this expense is to be incurred? Perhaps one in twenty, certainly not more than that proportion, of all the passengers between Baltimore and Washington, will come from or go to Georgetown. When it is remembered that the company are forbidden the use of steam within the limits of the city, it is obvious that these Georgetown passengers must be removed with their baggage to the horse car, and be taken to Georgetown by horse power, with almost no difference to them in either comfort, time, or expense, as compared with a conveyance in the coaches constantly passing and repassing between the two cities.

If imposing such an expense upon this company for such an object, and under such circumstances, was not extraordinary and unreasonable, he knew of no proposition in relation to any subject that was so.

One word, said Mr. J., in regard to "taxing passengers" by the State of Maryland, and he would trouble the House no further. Sometimes a measure, in itself perfectly right and proper, is made to assume a very disgusting aspect by the name that is given it, and he perceived the gentleman knew how to avail himself of this facility; he says they are to be taxed fifty cents each. The greatest sum that can be received by the company for passengers is two dollars and fifty cents each, and it may be reduced to one dollar and twenty-five cents. By their compact the company is to pay to the State one fifth of the amount received for passengers, be that more or less. It may be fifty cents each, and cannot be less than twenty-five. It is readily conceded that, if this sum was required of the company without an equivalent, it would be a tax. What are the facts? The estimated cost of this railroad is a million and a half of dollars. Half a million has already been paid by the State to the company for the accomplishment of this enterprise, and the reservation she has made to herself has been thought but a reasonable compensation for the hazard incurred.

Whether it shall prove to be too large or too small, whether the State is to gain or lose by this transaction, time alone can determine. Had the State of Maryland done, in this case, just what the State of New Jersey did in regard to the Camden and Amboy railroad—that is, had it, while affording no assistance either in hand or in prospect, demanded of the company, and compelled them to pay into the State treasury, a very large sum of money, before it would permit them to commence the construction of the road at their own expense and risk exclusively, there would have been a propriety of charging the State of Maryland, as the gentleman from New Jersey has done, with imposing a tax upon passengers; but, in the present instance, there is not a shadow of a reason for it. The State of Maryland may lose much by this transaction. It is possible, too, that it may gain much; but if the latter should prove to be the fact, from whom do they gain it? From the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and from that company only. If Maryland has exacted too much from this enterprising company for the very valuable aid rendered, and without which the road could not have been completed, and would not have been begun, can the honorable gentleman imagine that a reason why Congress should impose another and much greater burden upon them? The truth is, the interest of the nation and the District requires the facilities which this road must afford; and it is altogether injudicious for Congress to throw any obstruction in the way of its speedy completion. Let the company terminate it where they judge best. Nothing is more certain than that it will be continued to other parts of the city and District, as soon as there shall be a reasonable probability that the benefits of such branches will justify the expense incurred in their construction; and there is no reason in requiring or expecting any of them, until there is such a probability.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

NAVY PAY BILL.

The bill to regulate the pay of the officers of the navy of the United States was then taken up.

The bill was read a third time, and the question recurring on its final passage—

Several members rose, but

Mr. CROCKETT obtained the floor, and said: Mr. Speaker, as this bill has consumed no less than three weeks in discussion, and as I had a bill made the order of the day, the day after this bill, viz: the 16th December, and as I see a disposition to speak more on the subject, as speaking has become so fashionable here, I am therefore bound to move the previous question.

Mr. HARDIN hoped his friend from Tennessee would withdraw the motion.

Mr. CROCKETT. I cannot do it, sir.

Mr. JARVIS moved a call of the House.

Ordered: Yeas 125.

The call was proceeded with, and 210 members being found present,

Mr. BOCKEE moved to suspend all further proceedings on the call. Agreed to.

The motion for the previous question was not seconded: Ayes 82, noes 90.

Mr. HARDIN then obtained the floor, and said he wished to submit a few remarks to the House on the bill under consideration, which was one of greater magnitude than was generally supposed. In February, 1834, a select committee of the House had reported a bill to equalize the pay of the officers of the army and navy; the bill was referred back to the select committee, who reported an amendatory bill, which amendatory bill was considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the 26th June, 1834, and not further acted upon at that session of Congress. Mr. H. called upon the Clerk to say if he was not correct in this statement.

[The SPEAKER said that was not material, and was not then a question of order.]

Mr. HARDIN did not desire to be understood as making it a question of order, because, although he had had the honor of a seat in parliamentary bodies for nearly twenty-four years, he never once had the honor of presiding over any deliberative body, either as Speaker, or as deputy Speaker, or as Speaker's Chairman, for he was never accustomed to wait round the Speaker's chair, and of course he was ignorant of all the forms of order. He had only referred to the proceeding on the bill for the purpose of showing the anxiety of the House to get the question, by having ordered an amendment to be engrossed instead of the original bill. He regretted that the subject had been so earnestly pressed upon the consideration of the House.

One argument had been urged in favor of legislating upon this subject, which, in his opinion, was altogether unsustainable. It was remarked that we were out of debt, at peace with all the world; that our finances were in a flourishing condition; and that now was the time to increase the pay of the officers of the navy. In answer to this, he would only remark that we had to legislate for the future; that however we might increase the pay, that increase would remain hereafter for ages to come. In regulating the pay of the army, the navy, and the civil list, we should bear in mind that we ought to regulate it with a view to its permanent continuance, not for the sunshine of peace and prosperity, but also with a view to the fiscal embarrassments incident to war; for no nation could expect to go on for more than twenty years without experiencing the vicissitudes of war. He was opposed, generally, to all propositions for the increase of pay for any officers of the Government, and invariably voted against them; because, when a man once got into office, there was a kind of understanding between the officers and the Government that the salary should not be diminished, and he was therefore opposed to an increase of them. He would ask, why was this bill, then, pressed with such earnestness?

Where was the necessity for it? We were told by gentlemen upon the floor of the House, and we heard it in our private rooms, over and over again, from officers of the navy, that those officers could not live upon their present pay. If that were true, Mr. H. was ready to admit an increase should be made; but if it could be proved to be enough, it ought to stand as it was. We should bear in mind that our navy was yet in infancy, and it might be increased, and probably would become twice as large as at present, and that therefore we ought to limit our present expenditure of the army and navy both within what might be considered our capacity and means.

What was the present pay of the navy? The aggregate amount, as certified by the Naval Department, was $770,000, using round numbers. The officers of the navy were but few in number, perhaps not more than from seven hundred to a thousand, including the whole provided in this bill. How many of them were now, in a time of profound peace, when the necessity for the increase of pay had all at once sprung up; employed? He had made some calculation from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, and, with an honorable member from Ohio, had compared the number in commission with those out of commission or on the stocks, and he had ascertained that there were not more than one sixth part employed from year to year, one with another. With the exception of those employed at the navy yards, who, God knows, were well enough provided for, better than any other officers of the Government, there were not more than one fifth employed on the ocean. Where were the residue? Generally at their houses, or taking their pleasure. Now, he would ask, when only about one fourth or one fifth of these officers were employed on the ocean, and the balance at home, where was the imperious necessity for the increase of their pay at this particular time? They now received, as he had said, about $770,000, not including the appropriations under the ordinary bill. Now, what was the increase proposed by this bill? As the bill was reported last February twelvemonth, it increased the pay of the navy $116,000, and the pay of the officers of the army $70,000, in round numbers, for he would not detain the House with fractions. On referring the bill back again to a select committee, they knocked the army off altogether, and reported a substitute for the original bill, increasing the pay of the navy $84,500, making a total increase of $200,500. The bill was then referred to a Committee of the Whole House, where it underwent a variety of modifications, and, before it came to the amendment passed yesterday, Mr. H. sent the bill to the Navy Department, and by that means ascertained that the increase amounted to the sum he had stated, $200,500. After that calculation had been made, one of his colleagues [Mr. FORBES] moved an amendment, proposing to increase the pay of passed midshipmen. A gentleman from Maine made a calculation as to how much that amendment would add to the bill, and he made it appear to be $32,000. Mr. H's calculation, founded upon the returns of the Navy Department, brought it to $31,000; and, if these were correct, the whole increase would be $266,000.

The modification of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE], adopted yesterday, in relation to the pay of captains of the navy, diminished that sum about $15,000. There were thirty-seven captains, about two thirds of them had their pay lessened about $500 each, and about one third of them $250 each, making, according to Mr. H's estimate, about $15,000, leaving the actual increase by the bill, as it passed the committee yesterday, $251,000—and all this in a time of profound peace; and, if even our navy should be filled up, he had no doubt the increase would amount to no less than $500,000 a year. He was perfectly confident that he was not inaccurate to the amount of fifty dollars, in any one calculation. If the estimates of the Navy Department were correct, then by the first bill there would be an increase of $116,000, and by the second bill of $84,500 additional.

If the calculations of the Navy Department were not inaccurate, Mr. H. was satisfied that the whole increase would be $251,000. Gentlemen might say this bill was in lieu of all commutation, and that the $770,000 included every thing except the item of mileage, which could not be calculated with any probable certainty. As this bill was an actual increase upon the present pay of the navy, taking it altogether, of about $257,000, better than one fourth, and not quite a fifth, the whole would hereafter amount to about $1,026,000 a year; and when the mileage of ten cents a mile was added, they might fairly estimate that our naval officers, in times of profound peace, would cost the Government $11,000,000 annually. He had made inquiries as to the cost of the whole civil government, including the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, of the several States of Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and North and South Carolina, (eleven States,) and found that the whole machinery of the government of those States put together fell short, by at least $100,000, of what was proposed, in a time of profound peace, for the officers of the navy of the United States. Surely there was something in this. How much was it on the old Jeffersonian plan? That a mere bandful of men, in times of profound peace, when not more than one fifth of them were engaged, should cost the Government of the United States $100,000 more than the whole civil Governments together of eleven States of the Union! Surely, surely, we must have fallen on fine days of retrenchment and reform, indeed! In the year 1828, it was promulgated to the world what wondrous things would be done upon the subject of retrenchment and reform! How have these promises been fulfilled? Office after office had been created; emolument after emolument had been added and increased, and now, to sum up all, an increase of pay of officers of the navy to more than a fourth, and little less than a third, was to be made. He called upon those gentlemen associated with him, who were attached to the political party that governed the nation, and who would be held responsible to the country, to look at the reports issued from the House—to look at the circular letters, the speeches published, and those also made on the stump, and they would find themselves held responsible for all this. For twenty years Mr. H. had been contending to bring this Government back to its original expenditure, and he should continue to do so as long as he had the honor of a seat upon that floor. He had not confined his denunciations of these extravagant expenditures to the stump; he had made them in that House, and he should do it again, and upon every opportunity, when the occasion presented itself. The country would hold the party attached to the present administration responsible for their profligacy of the public money.

But we have been told that we have been ungrateful to the navy; in the language of one gentleman, "the right arm of the nation." Let us make a comparison of their pay with that of the army. A lieutenant commanding in the navy got above $1,100 a year; a lieutenant in the army, taking every thing into calculation, got $820, and a second lieutenant $762, &c. Mr. H. here went into a statement of the salaries paid to the officers of different grades in both branches, in order to sustain his proposition that the naval received more in proportion to the number of men he commanded than the military officer. A lieutenant in the navy, he maintained, got as much as a major in the army, and a captain in the navy got higher pay than a brigadier general, besides the former got ten cents a mile for his travelling expenses. If the latter got more than he had stated, he made it up by left-handed charges, by transportation of baggage, quarters, &c.; but this would show that abuses had crept in, and if so, Mr. H., for one, was prepared to go into the correction of them.

[Mr. WISE explained that a lieutenant in the navy acted as a colonel in the army, and a captain as a general, for they were liable to be called upon to command more ships than one.]

Mr. HADIN resumed. In general, a full complement of a first rate ship did not exceed 733 men; in the English ships about 750. The French had taken up a foolish idea; he ought not to say foolish, but they had adopted the policy that the more men the better, and their large ships now usually took up a thousand men. But if you took all vessels in the United States naval service, of different sizes, from a seventy-four down to the smallest, they would not average more, at the outside, than five hundred men each—nay, in general they would not reach four hundred. When a captain went out with his ship, with a complement of four hundred men, he usually took with him a lieutenant to about every seventy men. That was the average Commodore Porter took in his expedition to the Pacific; that was the average of the old Constitution in the last war.

Mr. H. entered further into this statement, to show that a lieutenant and midshipman did not command more men, upon an average, than a first and second lieutenant in the army. Upon the subject of gratitude, also, he would call one fact to the recollection of gentlemen, that, if a man died an officer in the naval service, his widow was pensioned from five years to five years. He knew widows of meritorious officers in the army who were starving. One in his own neighborhood, whose husband, an officer in the army, fought at Raisin, Niagara, and at New Orleans, was now without a cent in the world; and he had brought on a letter from her to General Jackson, stating that she was reduced to want and beggary, and the General promised to do all he could for her. He knew a similar instance of a major in the army, who died at New Orleans, whose widow and children were also reduced to want and beggary. Hence it was that he said the navy got more than the army. He wished to God there was a law providing for the widows of all those who lost their lives in the service of their country. But he would again call the attention of the House to the contrast between the pay of the two services. Mr. H. then read an estimate of the different sums paid to the officers and crews of various ships engaged during the late war.

Mr. H. then referred to the addresses of Commodore Porter, Lord Nelson, &c., to show that prize money was the greatest incentive for sailors to fight well, relating an ancient anecdote to that effect, of a soldier who, having lost his budget, as he called his wealth, on an assault, was the first to mount the breach, and recovered by the plunder of the town more than he had lost. On another occasion, being called on by his commander to do the same, he requested some other man to take his place who had lost his budget, for he possessed one. A gentleman referred to a captain, yesterday, who had been twenty-nine years in the service, but who was not worth $700. Mr. H. said there were some men whom you could not make rich. But he would refer to the numerous captains in this city, living in the finest palaces—no, he must not say palaces—in the most splendid mansions, built by the public money they had obtained. Ask a commander how much he had made, and he would reply, why, in the last war, probably about $100,000. It was said

"Their march is on the mountain wave,
Their home is on the deep."

Their march here was too often from their mansions to the Capitol, and their home was—— He observed several gentlemen in the gallery.

Mr. H. referred to the officers of the army who were then toiling in the West, and who were not represented there by committees, &c.; and complained of the proposal for the army having been rejected by the select committee, and the navy alone taken up and acted on, [Mr. WATKINSON explained,] contrary to the just expectations of all.

In regard to a lavish expenditure of the public money, the history of the last three hundred years furnished us with one fact, that it was the natural tendency of all Governments to increase their expenses from year to year. Such was the case with the Governments of Europe; and he was afraid the Government of the United States would exhibit the same melancholy picture; that its expenses will be so increased that, at last, they will become too oppressive and onerous for the people to bear; and, according to the language of the other House, reform or revolution must be the end of it. It was the lavish waste of the public money that brought Charles I of England, and Louis XVI of France, to the block, and it is one of the main causes of all the revolutions of empires that have ever happened. Gentlemen say that the navy was a popular branch of the public service. He agreed. But ought that House to legislate for fashionable attachment? He knew there was a continual struggle to get expenditures on the seaboard. He had no wish to impeach the integrity of gentlemen who were so zealous on the subject of fortifications and other works on the seaboard; but they could not help being acted on by their feelings. In the language of Sir Robert Walpole, prime minister of England, he said they came up, year after year, to be shorn like sheep. We, said Mr. H., come from the interior every year to be shorn for your fortifications on the seaboard; but I, for one, am not exactly like the sheep; for although I might be willing to be shorn, I will make a noise about it. Mr. H. concluded by saying that he had a great many more observations which he wished to have offered on the present occasion, but he was unwilling to intrude too far upon the indulgence afforded to him by the House, for which he offered his acknowledgments; and he should probably take some other opportunity of giving his sentiments more at length to the public.

Mr. WISE said: Mr. Speaker, I have already expressed my views on the merits of this bill, and have now only to make a few observations in reply to what I consider, with perfect respect to the gentleman, the ad captandum remarks of the honorable member from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN.] One would be led to suppose, sir, that the gentleman, from his uniform and earnest opposition to all money bills, was fighting at his late period of life for the fame of an economist and reformer. When the Alexandria canal bill was up, there was the gentleman from Kentucky; when Hull's claim was before us, there was the gentleman from Kentucky; when Meade's claim was presented, there was the gentleman from Kentucky; and now that the navy bill is on its passage, there is still the gentleman from Kentucky. Such indiscriminate opposition to every description of claim we might suppose to proceed more from habit than from calculation. But, sir, when the Louisville and Portland canal bill came up, there was not the gentleman from Kentucky. And at the very moment the gentleman was so manfully opposing this reasonable increase of navy pay, we found him entertaining us with the most delightful eloquence upon the sufferings and services of the army, and perfectly content with the army pay; when on a former occasion I have shown, and now assert, that the pay of the army is more than double that of the navy. The army, sir, is to the gentleman what the Louisville canal is; it is stationed in part in the West, and clears the path of the settlers on the frontiers. It is not regarded with the same contracted view as the navy is regarded by some, as solely for the seaboard, and, therefore, its services and its pay are fully appreciated by the gentleman. Why does the gentleman not bleat a little when wool is plastered on him as well as when it is shorn off? The gentleman, sir, is no more shorn, nor is the West, by increasing the pay of the navy than by increasing the pay of the army. If there is one branch of the public service in which the whole country is more equally interested than in another, it is that of the navy.

Sir, I have watched the course of the gentleman from Kentucky in no little or mean spirit, but to see what weight should be attached to his opposition to measures like this, and what impression it should make. And I must say, sir, that I have never caught him opposing measures of appropriation for his own part of the country. Another consideration which detracts from the weight of his opposition in this instance is, that, like the old experienced lawyer, he forgot himself, and thought he was talking to a jury of ignorant men. He made a one-sided argument, and must have forgot himself, when he expected to drive the friends of this bill who are friendly to the administration from its support, by appealing to them to guard the administration from his own censure for extravagant expenditures of the public money. True, sir, that all expenditures, except for themselves, are denounced by some gentlemen; and the gentleman himself acknowledges that he will abuse the administration for appropriations which are passed by opposition votes; but I put it to the House if this bill is not sustained by gentlemen of all parties, and if it is fair to treat this bill as a party measure in any sense? It is a mere question of dollars and cents, of adequacy or inadequacy of the compensation of public officers who have less to do with party politics, and are less affected by its corruption, than any others in our service.

True, sir, the gentleman held the conversation with me referred to by him, but he said not a word on this floor against that bill. Whenever there is "a budget" for his own region of country, none fights harder than the gentleman; but when, like the hero of his anecdote, any other budget is to be fought for, no entreaty, or appeal of patriotism or justice, it seems, can enlist his services for the campaign, or even prevent or pacify his opposition.

I hope, sir, the House will take a liberal and enlarged view, and reflect that all are equally interested in this bill. I will conclude by answering the remarks of the gentleman as to the great wealth and the "splendid palaces" of the officers of our navy. I assert, without the fear of contradiction, that not a single officer has laid up a competency from his pay. And it cannot be supposed that all are spendthrifts. If any are rich, they have derived their wealth, in every case, from inheritance or marriage. I doubt whether any have provided a dollar from their present pay. It is wholly inadequate for a gentleman in a service the honor and respectability of which require liberal and expensive living and outfits. The navy is the last service, above all others, in which to acquire fortunes, with the most liberal emoluments. The navy pension fund is not created out of the treasury. If the army chooses, it can provide from its own pay or plunder a similar pittance for its widows and orphans; or the Government can so provide for it, if its pay is not already rich enough to leave more than pittance for those it leaves behind. Nor does prize money come from the pockets of the people. It is wrested from your foes, and, in the language of a lieutenant whose letter I have once read, "it is hardly fought for and dearly won." It is true, sir, that we have paid: admit it, as the gentleman says, we have paid some $1,200,000 for vessels and property destroyed by our gallant navy; but how much has the one half of inferior prizes brought into your treasury, and how many millions of your enemies' property and shipping have been destroyed by your navy without one cent of compensation? And if a Decatur and his crews, who are dead and gone, have been paid hundreds of thousands for their exploits, what is that to your officers who are now starving on poor pay? A gratuity is one thing, pay is another. The one depends on your bounty and liberality, the other on your justice and sound policy. When the one has been given, we should never more hear of it; when the other is to be fixed and established by law, it should be permanent, and on a just scale, proportioned to service and responsibility. But, sir, this bill has been sufficiently discussed.

Mr. LYTLE said: Mr. Speaker, Before this bill goes to a vote on its final passage, I feel constrained to say that I must differ with some of my colleagues with whom I have generally acted, and perhaps with a majority of the delegation from the West. The objections just made to it by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] furnish an additional inducement for me briefly to make some explanations of my views at this time upon the bill before you.

I know well, sir, that, whenever that gentleman chooses to devote the powerful, active energies of his mind to the investigation of any subject, he can always present that subject in a clear and plausible, if not a conclusive, manner before this body. The only objection I have to his style and manner of effecting his object is, that his long and successful practice at the bar has had a tendency to make him forget that he is not here in full practice before a jury; and that, having taken sides, he makes his argument, in correspondence with his professional habits, altogether a one-sided one. He has omitted nothing in the presentment of his views, from the organization of the navy to the present time, which was calculated to prejudice the passage of the bill. But I did hope, sir, that, when he undertook to naval and army expenditures, his sense of justice would enlighten the House by a comparison between the have kept pace with his zealous spirit of inquiry, and that he would have made the contrast perfect. But, alas, sir, it was followed out on the one side by facts in opposition to the navy, and on the other by assertions in relation to the pay, the duties, and expenses, of the army, in reference to which my honorable friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] who, by the way, has given to the subject, with a view to this very matter, great attention, entertains a wide and total difference of opinion, both as to facts and conclusions.

But, sir, said Mr. L., I object to such comparisons—they are altogether erroneous. They are calculated to create invidious feelings between the members of those two branches of the service; to awaken jealousies, and produce embarrassments which should never exist amongst members of the same family. Sir, the cause is a common cause. Both are contending for the same great interests, and both should be well paid. If the army is indifferently provided for, let us know it, and apply there also the needful remedy; but as we are now regulating merely the pay of the naval officers, why start objections which may result in envy and the generation of bad blood between the members of these two classes of our public service. It is a just tribute to the officers of the army to say that, in reference to this bill, I have heard but one expression in relation to it; all have hoped for and encouraged its passage with a spirit of magnanimity and chivalry; they have always told me it was right, and wished it success. Sir, they are sworn brethren in arms, fighting under the same banner, and governed by the same interests and feelings. Let not discord come among them, by any act of ours calculated to awaken causeless jealousies, where all is now harmonious and friendly. The matter, Mr. Speaker, is reduced to this point: it is too late in the session essentially to change the features of this bill; immediate action is required, and we must either take this as we find it, or leave the navy in a weak and deplorable condition. I am free to say, sir, if you are not disposed to make it respectable and sound, abolish it at once; burn down your fleets, and block up your harbors; destroy your fortifications; act on the defensive altogether, at the expense of not only the trade and commerce of the country, but so much of its liberty as may be considered dependent on a naval armament—on the marine power of the Government. If, however, it is the desire of the House to place our navy on a rank and power that shall correspond with any and all others that she may come in contact with; that our "stars and stripes" may float proudly and triumphantly wherever a breeze may waft or a wave may bear it; that the products of our rich and happy country may be safely carried into every port where any other ship may ride; that the seamen in our service may be enabled by their pay to exhibit, in their intercourse with those they meet, the aspiring, generous, and proud character of the Government they represent. Pass this bill, and furnish the means by which it shall be done. Already, upon the most slender means and diminished resources, have they sustained the national honor and the national character, at the expense of personal comfort and independence. If you are to have a navy at all, then, let it be such a one as you will not be ashamed of. By your pay bill, show that you do not mean that men shall fight your battles, protect your exiled citizens, cultivate by reciprocal hospitalities with foreign Powers that most desirable feeling of amity and respect which it is so eminently our duty and policy as a nation to maintain, without the indispensable patronage of the Government they belong to. Sir, this is nothing more than naked justice, and, so far myself from being horror-stricken at the provisions of this bill, I would be glad to have it improved by the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JONES,] some time back, in reference to the additional grades in the service, thereby perfecting the navy of our Union, and making it, in all respects, equal with all others. Sir, these opinions may surprise some of my friends with whom I have acted, but they are the same that I have always cherished, and hold myself ready to defend—but not on the grounds assumed by my honorable friend from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN.] He christens it a party measure, and holds, after an eloquent description of the reform and retrenchment measures promised by this administration, that he will hold as responsible for this most extravagant proposition, the administration and its friends. Sir, how is this? when, in the same breath, he tells us that one third of the administration party is opposed to the bill, and that the two thirds are made up by the opposition members of the House? The two averments are admirably reconciled to each other. Sir, so far as I have seen or heard any thing in this discussion, it is totally exempt from all spirit of party. I go for the improvement of this great arm of the national Government, upon principles of national policy and right. Party feeling and party interest never entered into my brain. When reflecting or acting on it, party feeling is dead, as it should be, in reference to it, except so far as it may concern the common interest of our common country.

The gentleman from Kentucky did not seem to expect support from the Western country for this bill. Sir, I admit with him that an opposition might justly and fairly have been anticipated from our quarter. The close, and partial, and exclusive policy of those on the seaboard to our Western interests, was well calculated to make us return the compliment on this and on all other such occasions. But I have ever regarded the navy of our country as a subject of the deepest and most thrilling national interest. I have sunk, and have always been willing to sink, my feeling of local or sectional interest, in a question that involved the common welfare, glory, and perpetuity of the country. Born and nurtured in the back woods; a Buckeye in feeling and thought, in education, habits, and action, I trust, as a Representative on this floor, I shall never forget the obligations thus imposed upon me by that station of common, national, indivisible interest. Thus, sir, I regard the bill which proposes to protect and sustain the navy of our Union. I have never seen the ocean, never inhaled a breeze from the salt water. I have never but once trod the deck of a man-of-war, and have yet to see a ship of the first class under sail. But I hope and believe, sir, if I know myself, that there is that within me, which, if I were on the extremest boundary of our Western frontiers, would never, never make me forget that I was an American citizen—would never subdue the feelings of proud exultation which I still remember of having felt in early boyhood, when hearing of the result of our well-fought battles of our gallant tars upon the high seas—nor make me pause upon a proposition to amend the unjust policy of the Government towards them; for the gallantry they have displayed, the privations they are still enduring, and the demands which they now have, and are entitled to make, on the justice of their country. Again, sir, we are told of the pensions already received by the widows of deceased naval officers; and my friend before me has instanced one in his own neighborhood. I am glad it is so, and that she is comfortable, and I wish to God that I could say as much of the widows of the living officers of our navy. I know one, sir, whose residence is not out of sight of the Capitol, who may now indeed be within the sound of my voice, whose gallant husband is on a two or three years' cruise in the Pacific, and whose salary amounts to the miserable pittance of $1,100; the one half of which he has divided with a lovely and growing family, consisting of his wife and some five or six children; and out of this sum he must interchange civilities, as commandant of the station, with the officers of all other Governments he may happen to find there.

Sir, if you mean to have a navy that will answer the just purposes and expectations of the Government, you must expect to pay for it; but yet we are furnished with the history of the enormous sums paid to different crews, or received by them in the shape of prize money. Well, sir, it is earned only in time of war, and well earned then, Mr. Speaker—earned as much for the country as for the sailor who enjoys it; for it is a reciprocal benefit to the country, and whoever the country may employ to take it. By crippling the resources of the enemy, you add to the country's strength, no matter into whose pockets the plunder goes, or if one farthing should never reach the coffers of your treasury. But my worthy friend has had his sensibilities excited, also, by the appearance of navy officers in the city, and has told you that, instead of their "march" being "on the mountain wave, and their home upon the deep," their "march is now from the tavern to the Capitol, and their home in our gallery." He seems offended at the appointment of a committee to come on here to explain to the members of this House and its committee, matters which could never have been furnished elsewhere. Why, sir, is there any thing unjust or presumptuous in this? Their every thing is at stake; the rules and principles by which they are to be governed, perhaps for the balance of their lives; their whole future destiny dependent on the decision of the House this day, sir, upon the fate of this bill, and they debarred the common privileges of American freemen, of expressing their opinions, or giving their advice, when it is really indispensable to correct action, and denied a seat in the gallery, to ascertain the result!

I am unable to perceive or appreciate the enormity of this offence. The officers of the army do, also, come here, and they have the right to come; and I think the honorable gentlemen will find two army to one naval officer at this time in the city; and so great was this grievance, as complained of by the Secretary of War, from the too frequent visitations of his troops here last winter, that he had to issue a proclamation to keep them off during the session of Congress, as every gentleman here must remember. The order was revoked, and with at least as much propriety as it was made; but we all know the fact.

The officers of the navy, then, have done no more than other people; they have looked a little after their own interests; they found them in jeopardy, and came, for the last time, to their rescue. Sir, I deny that the navy is the "spoiled child of the Government." She is the abused, neglected, cast off member of the family. It is time her injuries should be redressed, her services rewarded; no better time could have happened than the present. Even the vote upon the present bill, sir, may be regarded as big with the fate of the dearest interests of the country. Sir, it may, it will, have an important bearing, as it should, upon our foreign relations: it will show that the people are awakened to a sense of the difficulties that are approaching, and to a correct appreciation of the same. No man can look at the papers from the East this morning, and not be satisfied that a war cloud is now lowering upon us; it is plainly visible, sir, at least in the horizon; if I mistake not, it will soon be upon us, and if I had, or could have, my way, so far from being staggered by the provisions of this bill, I would add the full amount claimed by this Government from the French as an extra appropriation for repairing the navy, and completing the fortifications of the country, and, by hard knocks, make the French pay the whole expense for the trouble of collecting our just debts in that way.

It will come to that at last; and when we send off our gallant seamen to undertake the work, let those who are now anxiously watching the results of our deliberations, start with light hearts and fuller pockets, leaving a better prospect of comforts and happiness behind them, and entering with increased ardor and renewed spirit into the service of a country liberal enough to reward and honor them; at least, sir, the bill shall have my hearty and most ardent support.

Mr. CHILTON now put an end to the debate, by moving the previous question.

The CHAIR inquired whether the motion was seconded.

Mr. HARD moved a call of the House.

On this motion Mr. HARDIN demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and resulted as follows: Yeas 101, nays 103.

So the House determined against the call.

The SPEAKER now again inquired whether there was a second to the previous question.

On which question the yeas were 116, the nays 24.

So the call for the previous question was seconded.

The previous question was thereupon put and carried; and the question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. CHILTON demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, stood as follows.

YEAS—Messrs. John Quincy Adams, Heman Allen, Anthony, Archer, Ashley, Banks, Barber, Barnitz, Bates, Baylies, Beale, Bell, Binney, Boon, Briggs, Brown, Bull, Burd, Burges, Cage, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carmichael, Chambers, William Clark, Clay, Clayton, Coffee, Cramer, Crane, Crockett, Darlington, Deberry, Denny, Dickson, Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Ewing, Ferris, Fillmore, Foster, Fulton, Gamble, Garland, Gholson, Gorham, Grennell, Hannegan, Hazeltine, Heath, Henderson, Howell, Huntington, W. So the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

DEPOSIT BANKS.

The House then took up the unfinished business, and resumed the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote adopting Mr. BINNEY's amendment to the deposit bank bill.

Mr. POLK commenced to speak in support of the reconsideration, and very shortly yielded the floor to

Mr. BINNEY, who explained, at the request of Mr. POLK, what he understood as the sense of his amendment, viz: that, in reckoning the proportion of one fifth of the circulation and deposits, public and private, which the deposit banks are required, by his amendment, at all times to retain in their vaults, the notes of specie-paying banks were not to be included.

Mr. POLK then resumed; but, after a few minutes, yielded to a motion made by Mr. MANN, of New York, for an adjournment; which motion prevailing,

The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 19.

THE MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. HAWES, from the select committee on the West Point Academy, reported a bill to modify the system of military instruction at West Point, and for prescribing the qualifications of applicants for official appointments in the army of the United States.

[The first section of this bill proposes to repeal all acts now in force authorizing the enlistment or appointment of cadets in the Military Academy of the United States at West Point, and that all such cadets now in service shall be disbanded and dismissed from and after the 30th of June next.

The second section provides that the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President of the United States, shall, as soon as may be after the 30th of June next, organize "a military school of application and practice at West Point, for the improvement of the officers of the army of the United States in the application and practice, for military purposes, of the several branches of elementary and theoretic sciences involved in the art of war;" an officer to be appointed as superintendent, possessing competent theoretical and practical qualification, &c.

The third section provides that, for the purposes of the practical instruction contemplated by the second section of this bill, the officers of the army of the United States shall repair to West Point in rotation, and remain there, &c., all under such rules as may be prescribed by the Executive.

The fourth section provides the salary of the superintendent, ($2,500,) and of instructors of the first grade, ($1,700,) and of the second grade, ($1,200,) if a second grade be deemed advisable.

The fifth gives charge of the school, and property of the United States connected therewith, to the superintendent.

The sixth section requires report to Congress at the next session, and annually thereafter, of all proceedings under this act.

The seventh section requires examination of all persons who are applicants for appointments in the army, and requires that, when found qualified under the rules and regulations prescribed, they shall enter upon a course of instruction at West Point, &c.

The eighth section provides for filling vacancies there after occurring in the corps of engineers from those who shall have passed through a course of instruction as above prescribed.

The ninth section subjects the superintendent, &c., to removal, without, however, subjecting him thereby to loss of rank or command to which his commission in the army would entitle him.]

The bill having been read the first time,

Mr. HAWES moved that the bill be read a second time by its title, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and that the bill and accompanying report be printed.

Mr. DICKERSON called for the reading of the bill in extenso.

The bill having been read,

Mr. DICKERSON said he considered it his duty, at this stage of the bill, to attempt to arrest its further progress; to object to its second reading, and to the printing of the report, and also to object to the reception of the bill and report as the report of the committee. As to the duty and privileges of committees, so far as he was conversant with them, he understood that it was the privilege of any member of the committee to be present at the meetings of the committee, and to give his views in regard to the subject-matter of their consideration. If he was correct in this supposition, he apprehended that any report made without this opportunity for discussion of the subject, by any member of the committee, could not be considered as the report of the committee.

[Mr. HAWES wished to ask the gentleman, he said, whether he intended to insinuate that any meeting of the committee was held, at which every member of the committee had not notice to attend.]

Mr. DICKERSON resumed. He would answer the gentleman's question, and, at the same time, he would state that his situation in regard to the committee was of the most friendly character. He had stated, as a general proposition, that it was the privilege of every member of a committee to be summoned to attend its meetings, and, if this opportunity of attendance was not afforded to each member, then the committee was not competent to make a report. He did not contend that every member of a committee must be present, but that all must have an opportunity to be present, and to consult and advise together on the subject before them. If the majority of a committee met and deprived the minority of the right of consultation and discussion, then the report of the majority could not be received as the report of the committee. It was not necessary to a report that all should concur in the report, but that all should have an opportunity to consult in regard to it. In order to make the application of this principle of parliamentary law, he would now state the facts in regard to this report. In doing this, he hoped it would not be supposed that he was influenced by any personal considerations, but by the consideration that the question was of a momentous character, and that its decision would be affected by the supposition that this report came in the regular way from a committee of the House. This committee was organized early in the session, and soon after the members of it were regularly summoned to attend a meeting. A sub-committee of five was, at the first meeting, appointed to investigate certain facts, with the examination of which the committee was charged. His impression was, at the time, that it was made the duty of the sub-committee to investigate and report to the committee facts, and not opinions; and this for the reason that an investigation would be more easily made by a small number than by a large one. The circumstance which satisfied him of the correctness of this impression was that, in the resolution appointing the sub-committee, it was first proposed to authorize them to report "facts and opinions," but, at his own motion, the word "opinions" was stricken out. The sub-committee were not authorized, as he understood it, to report in full upon the subject. About ten or twelve days ago the committee were summoned to a meeting, at which nineteen of the twenty-four were in attendance. He expected there to receive from the sub-committee a report of facts; but, instead of that, the sub-committee made a report in full on the subject, the reading of which occupied two hours. This occupied the time of the committee till a late hour, when a motion was made to adopt the report.

Mr. GAMBLE rose to a point of order. He asked whether it was in order to arraign the proceedings of a committee?

The CHAIR stated that it was in order, in opposing the motion to commit and print the bill and report, to show that the report was made irregularly, and that he understood to be the object of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. MERCER rose, he said, to suggest to the gentleman from New Jersey that, if there had been any irregularity in the manner of making the report, his proper course was to move to recommit it.

Mr. DICKERSON continued. He did not, he said, arraign the motives of the committee. But, as this report and bill proposed to do away with the Military Academy as it now existed, they would, he thought, do great injury if they were suffered to go to the world as a report of the committee of the House. He felt it to be a duty which he owed to the community, to arrest the proceedings.

Mr. BRIGGS here called for the reading of the resolution under which the committee was appointed, and it was read, as follows:

"Resolved, That a select committee, consisting of one member from each State, be appointed, with power to inquire into the expediency of amending the laws relating to the Military Academy at West Point, in the State of New York, or whether it would not comport with the public interests to abolish said institution."

Mr. DICKERSON continued. The vote on the adoption of the report of the sub-committee as the report of the whole committee was taken after the reading of the report, which occupied two hours. The minority had no opportunity to discuss it, and advise in respect to it; and, therefore, he insisted that it was placed on the same grounds as if a portion of the committee only had been summoned to attend the meeting. To place before the country, as a report from the committee of the House, a proposition to abolish an institution so important as this was, he considered highly improper. He therefore moved to recommit the bill and report to the committee from which they were reported.

Mr. HAWES rose and remarked that this, to his mind, was a very singular proceeding, and, after the explanations he should give, he believed it would appear so to the House. It appeared singular that this Military Academy was thought to be of so sacred a character that a committee of twenty-four members, appointed by order of the House, were not at liberty to make a report upon it. Was not, he asked, this institution under the control of the national Government? If so, what was the objection to the report? But the gentleman had the boldness to contend that this able report, coming from a committee of the House—he had had no hand in drawing the report—should not be suffered to go before the people of the United States. The committee of twenty-four, upon the Academy at West Point, was appointed early in the session, under a resolution submitted by himself. A few days after, he summoned the committee to meet at a certain place and time, and he had no doubt that each member received the summons. A majority of the committee met, and took the subject into consideration. They passed a resolution appointing a sub-committee of five members, whose duty it was made to collect the facts and report to the committee on the subject.

The sub-committee could not bring the facts before the committee without the necessary explanations to render them intelligible. After pursuing the investigation laboriously and diligently, they at length were ready to report. He then summoned the committee to attend at the Capitol at 11 o'clock, and he appealed to each member of it to say whether he did not receive a notice. The committee met, but, for want of time, they did not conclude their business, and they were again summoned to meet in the evening, at his room, at Brown's hotel. Every member of the committee had also notice of this meeting. The report was then read. A motion was made to read the bill, but it was waived in consequence of the suggestion that the concluding part of the report stated the substance of the bill. A proposition was then made, by the gentleman from Alabama, that the report of the sub-committee should be adopted as the report of the committee, and submitted to the House. Some discussion followed, in which almost every member present made speeches, except the chairman. After the discussion, the question was taken on the motion, and it was agreed to by a vote of ten to eight; one member having left the room. The proposition, adopting the report as the report of the committee, was then adopted.

Every member of the committee was summoned to be present, and the chairman had no authority to enforce their attendance. Nineteen members met, one of whom having retired, the report was adopted, and ordered to be submitted to the House, by a vote of 10 to 8. It was then proposed that the minority should be allowed time to prepare a counter report, and, accordingly, another day was appointed for the submission of the report to the House. Mr. HAWES had, he said, acted in the whole transaction, under the authority of the committee. He went on to state that the minority of the committee applied to him, as chairman of the committee, to furnish them with the report and documents, to enable them to review the argument. His answer was, that he would furnish them with all the documents on which the report was founded, but not with the report itself.

Several members here addressed the Chair, but Mr. POLK moved that the House proceed to the consideration of the orders of the day; which was agreed to.

DEPOSIT BANKS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate the public deposits of the United States in certain local banks; the question being on the motion to reconsider the vote of the House adopting the following amendment moved by Mr. BIXNEY:

Strike from the fourth section of the bill, as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, the following clause:

"2dly. To keep in its vaults, or the vaults of other banks, an amount of specie equal to one fourth the amount of its notes and bills in circulation, and the balance of its accounts with other banks, payable on demand."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"To keep in its vaults an amount of specie, which, together with the balance of all its accounts with specie-paying banks, shall be equal to one fifth of the amount of its notes and bills in circulation, and its public and private deposits."

At the end of the fourth article of the second section, insert two additional articles, as follows:

"5thly. To do and perform the duty of pension agent without any allowance or compensation, except for the actual cost of books and stationary.

"6thly. To pay interest, quarterly, into the treasury, at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, on the average balance of the public moneys on deposit, over and above a sum which shall be equal to five per centum of its capital actually paid in; provided that no interest be payable when the said average quarterly balance does not exceed fifty thousand dollars."

Mr. POLK, who was entitled to the floor, proceeded to say that, under existing circumstances, he should confine what he had to say within as brief a space as possible, and proceed to show the inexpediency of adopting the amendment in question. He remarked that he had the other day demonstrated, to some extent, that if the construction of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] were to be placed upon the amendment, it would utterly destroy and break up the whole system of employing local banks as fiscal agents of the Government in every part of the country, except in the larger cities. In the cities, the banks were enabled to make daily settlements, and strike daily balances; but the country banks had no such opportunity. He would put a strong case. The Choctaw lands were in market, and the deposit bank at Natchez had necessarily, at occasional times, a large amount of the public money, and the receivers being compelled to receive, not specie but notes of the Bank of the United States, how would the deposit bank be able to answer the call required by the above amendment? In September, last year, the amount of public deposits in that bank was a half million or more; and in January of the present year it was nearly $900,000. Some of this was in notes payable in Philadelphia, some in Boston, New York, and other cities, and of all the branches perhaps in the Union, for it was required to receive them; and what did the amendment propose? Why, that they should not count any thing as specie that was not metallic. It would be compelled instantly to transmit to Boston, Savannah, New York, and other places, the notes payable there; and receive their balances back at Natchez. This would take months in transmitting, besides running a great risk in the double transportation. Nor was this all; during the time the deposit bank was lying out of all this money, she must procure specie, at whatever cost, so as to keep up the requisite proportion, although the deposits were made in notes of the Bank of the United States. In other words, you would be requiring the deposit bank to receive the paper of the Bank of the United States, and not specie; while, at the same time, you would require that bank to answer for the same notes in specie, losing the interest upon and use of the money, by the time consumed in procuring the balances and returns from the Bank of the United States. He affirmed, that at no period since the Bank of the United States came into operation, could the bank, or any one of its branches, have stood up under such a restriction as that proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; nor was a provision of such a character ever required before.

He had procured the several official returns of the branches of the Bank of the United States, which all showed that they could not have existed under such a restriction. Take one, the branch at Mobile. On the 1st of April, 1833, before the public deposits were removed from the Bank of the United States, it had, of public and private deposits, notes in circulation, &c., over and above what was owing to the bank, $2,631,000. Now, according to the amendment proposed, this branch bank should have had $526,200, being one fifth: so far from it, that it had only $136,000 in specie and the notes of specie-paying banks. The branch bank at Natchez, at the same period, had, of public and private deposits and notes in circulation, $1,531,000; while of specie, and notes of specie-paying banks, it had only $76,000 to meet these liabilities—about a twentieth, instead of a fifth. The result of carrying out the principle of the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be destructive of the whole system of local depositories. Mr. P. would call upon all those gentlemen who desired this system to be carried out, to examine this point thoroughly, and they would see that, if this amendment was adopted, it would be impracticable, and would tend to drive them out of the public service, and throw the public treasury into the hands of receivers, or to compel the re-establishment of a national bank; a contingency which would inevitably follow. The provision was altogether a novel one, and had never been imposed upon the Bank of the United States or its branches. It added no greater security for the public moneys; it was no additional guarantee; and the provisions of the bill offered sufficient security. Mr. P. here referred to several of them, such as the limited powers with which the Secretary of the Treasury was clothed, &c.

There was another view of the matter. The Bank of the United States was not compelled to take the notes of every other bank unless she chose to do so, while the deposit bank was compelled to take hers, and to keep a proportionate amount of specie for it also. By the amendment, they would be compelled to increase their specie, as money might be paid in, and to hold it from circulation, however necessary it might be.

Mr. P. said, without intending any disrespect to the honorable member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROWN,] and without supposing any such intention could have been entertained by that gentleman, yet the conviction forced itself upon Mr. P.'s mind that the source of the amendment had been prepared by that portion of the intelligent men in this country who were most desirous, he would not say from improper motives, for the establishment of a national bank. The effect of all the amendments, if finally adopted by the House, would be to embarrass those new fiscal agents of the Government, and to bring them, at least, into disrepute. No plan could have been devised more effectually than these amendments. Why should these deposit banks be required to do what had never been done by the Bank of the United States or by any other bank? He alluded now particularly to the requisition that a monthly publication of the affairs of each deposit bank throughout the country should be made in; three newspapers in the city of Washington, so that their condition might be exposed to the Bank of the United States and to other banks, whilst the condition of the Bank of the United States and all the other banks would be concealed. By doing this the Bank of the United States would be enabled to select its victim, and, by means of its extensive exchanges and in other ways, concentrate its immense power to crush one of those fiscal agents, and thus, by producing a temporary interruption to business, embarrass the whole country. We were at no loss to know what would be the effect of public clamor. The experience of the past year, especially from the temporary suspension of two or three banks in this District, proved what might be done. Mr. P. had no doubt there were those who would have rejoiced to see every institution of the kind in the country stop specie payments, reckless of the ruin that might be brought about thereby. You would first require a certain proportion of specie to be kept in each bank upon the amount of its deposits, at the same time paying in those deposits, not in specie, but in paper of other banks. Not content with this, they must publish in the newspapers a monthly exposé of all their affairs! Where was the necessity for this? Under the bill returns were to be made to the Treasury, and every guarantee had been thrown around that was considered forcible and practicable at the same time.

H. or R.]

Deposit Banks.

What was the next provision? The first was that of requiring a certain amount of specie in proportion to the liabilities. The second was that of throwing open the condition of each bank. And the third was, that the deposit banks should pay interest on the public money in their hands. Mr. P. would ask, had interest ever been required of any depository from the foundation of this Government up to the present time? It was scarcely necessary to go into this branch of the argument. The subject was also amply discussed at the last session of Congress. What duties had these fiscal agents to perform? They would have to perform the duties of pension agent, without any allowance or compensation, except for the actual cost of books and stationery. They had to furnish the Government with facilities in collecting, receiving, and disbursing the public money, and in this way alone he would venture to affirm there would be a great saving to the Government. Besides, how could interest be charged for the use of money, the amount of which was liable to such fluctuation as the public deposits? Mr. P. felt no hesitation, then, in saying that, if you imposed such hard terms upon these banks, you would be driven to select those of a second rate character, instead of the best, the most solvent, and the most efficient. He hoped and trusted that the plan for the employment of these banks would not be so crippled with regulations as to make it altogether impracticable.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania thought the system must fail. Permit him (Mr. P.) to say that, if the bill should have been thrown around it the provisions proposed by that gentleman, in his judgment those institutions would be so trammelled and fettered as to render it very difficult, perhaps wholly impracticable, for many of them to succeed. They would then have to resort either to the scheme of the gentleman from Virginia or the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or be thrown back again upon a national bank. The gentleman from Pennsylvania distinctly averred that the system could not succeed, unless it should be converted into a national bank; he also avowed his hostility to this bill in any and every form or shape in which it could be presented, and he informed the House at the outset that he intended to vote against it. The gentleman also further told the House that, if it passed the bill, the responsibility would be upon them; if they rejected it, the responsibility would be elsewhere. The gentleman had predicted that the whole system must fail, and that the scheme was altogether impracticable. Now, Mr. P. submitted to the gentleman whether it was fair to that part of the House who differed in opinion with himself, and who thought it a practicable scheme, to embarrass that scheme with these amendments, and strive to render it wholly inoperative? To put the proposed provisions into this bill would, indeed, have this effect.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania further said that the success of the State banks as fiscal agents of the Government, for the last six months, was mainly to be attributed to the forbearance exercised by the Bank of the United States during the spring of 1834, and the effect of the panic. Forbearance of the Bank of the United States! Mr. P. then knew not what forbearance was; but he did know that, during the whole of last session, nothing was seen or heard but one general stream of invective from the party sustaining the bank, and that institution could not extend its accommodations, because, on account of the removal of the deposits, they were compelled to make provisions to pay off their own liabilities. So far from forbearing, we were again and again assured that the bank had been rendered powerless, and could not relieve the country; but as soon as Congress adjourned, we saw a correspondence between the bank and a committee of merchants of New York, in which the bank said that, as Congress had adjourned without doing its duty, it would then generously extend its loans. Was the panic got up by the friends of the State banks, or by their opponents? By the friends or enemies of the bank? The whole country would give but one response to this question.

Mr. P. wished to set the gentleman from Pennsylvania right as to another fact. The gentleman had said that the effect of the panic had been to diminish the importation of foreign articles of commerce; but he must have overlooked the returns from the Treasury Department. If he would turn to them, he will see that, so far from our transportation trade having decreased, it had increased to an amount of fourteen millions over any other year.

[Mr. BINNEY explained. He had referred to the increase of importations in specie, and a diminution of other articles.]

Mr. POLK said, still the Treasury returns showed a great increase. The argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the panic had produced an influx of specie into the country, was fallacious. It was true that more specie was imported during the year 1834; but then the amount of imports of goods, or general fabrics, had not diminished; and this fact was borne out by official statements. The country, then, has been prosperous; but she is indebted for that prosperity neither to the bank nor to the panic, but to the new impulses springing out of the employment of State banks as fiscal agents of the Government, to which the bank and its friends had been the most inveterate enemies, and did all in their power to sweep them from the face of the earth. They have stood up against the power of that institution, and the effects of the panic also, and have been, so far, successful. The gentleman said that the parallel case of those banks, as formerly existing, viz: between 1789 and 1816, during which they were constantly employed as fiscal agents, did not hold good; because, said he, there was then as much specie in the country as now; and, moreover, that the calamity of their inability came at last. But the gentleman's argument did not hold good; for the country was then only just liberated from an expensive war. The cause of their failure ought to be ascribed to their having made their issues too large, (many of them, he believed, from patriotic motives,) and were not able to meet the sudden call upon them. We had, however, a guarantee now, which did not exist then, and that was in the regulation of the standard of our metallic currency, by which it would be kept from exportation.

Mr. P. said he would now conclude with hoping that the House would not so embarrass and trammel the bill as, in the judgment of those in favor of it, and of those who would be called upon to execute it, to render it impracticable, and thereby give the vantage ground to the Bank of the United States. He was anxious that the public should be secured in every possible way, but he could see no additional safeguards in the propositions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

One word in regard to these amendments. He did not know whether it was improper to allude to what had occurred elsewhere, but this he might say, that the proposition now moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania was not heard of when the original bill was discussed in the Committee of Ways and Means. The provision relative to specie payments was inserted in the present bill; though Mr. P. had deemed it unnecessary last session, still he thought it could do no harm. Mr. P. concluded by trusting the House would alter its decision by reconsidering its vote and rejecting the amendment.

Mr. BINNEY spoke at considerable length, in reply to the arguments of Mr. POLK, and going to show that the amendment introduced by him, and proposed to be reconsidered, would be salutary in its tendency, and necessary in its operation on the general influence of the bill. It was not unreasonable to require of each of the deposit banks to retain within their vaults at least one fifth of the amount, in specie, of its circulation and deposits. He pursued his argument and reply for upwards of an hour; contending that the amendment proposed nothing but which the local banks were fully able to meet. The converse of this opinion must arise from a want of information as to their real situation, highly injurious to them.

Mr. CAMBRELENG followed. He expressed his satisfaction at hearing the opinions from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIRNEY,] that the State banks were in such high reputation. He believed it was the first time such an admission had come from that quarter of the House. Mr. C. then proceeded to show his reasons for advocating a reconsideration of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; among which was the fact that the banks had no effectual control over the public moneys deposited in their vaults, which were liable to be drawn and transferred by the Government at any moment. On the subject of a hard-money system, he believed he would go as far as that gentleman. He concluded by repeating his conviction that the reconsideration should prevail, and the amendment be expunged.

Mr. McKINLEY then addressed the House at length, in favor of a reconsideration of the amendment. He appealed to the House to decide now, whether they were prepared to sanction, in this bill, a system which would most inevitably have broken down the old one, or to put upon these institutions such restrictions as none could bear.

Mr. JONES, of Georgia, said: Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] has called on all who are opposed to the Bank of the United States, it will not be surprising to any that I should offer a few remarks. I am as much opposed to the recharter of that bank as either the gentleman from Tennessee or Alabama, [Mr. McKINLEY.] Not that I think the bank unsafe, or that the directors have acted with any other view than to the obtaining of a charter; but because its powers are and must be, to render it effective, too great to be safely trusted to any such institution. While, therefore, I am opposed to the Bank of the United States and in favor of making the State banks depositories of the public money, I desire to put such restraints upon them as to keep them safe. For that reason I was in favor of the requisition of the amendment as modified at my suggestion to one fifth specie to the amount of circulation and deposits. I am still in favor of that, so far as regards banks in which the customs are deposited, whilst I would exempt those Western banks, so far as respects the deposits arising from sales of public land. They are the banks, and the only banks, which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] has called your attention to as being unable to comply with such a requisition. I entirely agree with him, that it is impracticable for them to do it. I was not unaware of this difficulty; shortly after the amendment was agreed to, I prepared an amendment to provide for and obviate it, which I intend to offer at a proper time. That the House may see it will freely meet the exigency of the only banks which have been brought to their notice by the gentleman from Tennessee, I will read it.

Provided, That the said requisition of one fifth specie shall not be construed to apply to the deposits made in any bank or banks by the receivers of land offices, of money collected by them from sales of land belonging to the United States: And provided, also, The bills so deposited by the said receivers shall be bills of speciepaying banks, which bills the said receivers of the land offices are hereby required to receive in payment for said lands.

I cannot believe some two or three millions will be paid into the banks in a day or two from customs. They are collected in smaller sums, and some weeks are required to swell the deposit to such an extent. Large amounts are frequently in a few days paid to the receivers of land offices, and by them deposited in those banks. They have not the opportunity, situated remotely from other banks, of converting those deposits, or any part of them, into specie; and this amendment provides for them. It is not so with banks in which the customs are collected. They are usually in large cities, where the banks are located whose bills have been collected, and it is perfectly easy to exchange them for specie.

We have been told this will compel the deposit banks to call on the other banks for frequent settlements, and to demand specie of them. This is all a mistake, sir. They cannot be compelled to call for exchanges more frequently than they now do. In large cities settlements are made every day; in other places every week or fortnight, as may be convenient. It is admitted that one fifth specie to circulation is not too high a requisition. Every bank, then, ought to have that much, at least. Now, the bills received by the deposit banks must be their own or the bills of other banks; they should have one fifth of their own bills, which were in circulation, and the other banks ought to be made to redeem the one fifth of their bills which had been received, in specie.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McKINLEY] says this is requiring more than has ever been required by any bank charter. I have not examined the charters, and therefore cannot speak certainly; but I think he is mistaken. If I recollect correctly, the charters require that the circulation shall not exceed one third the amount of specie in their vaults. And the banks have generally found it unsafe to go beyond twice the amount. And if you add to these the deposits of individuals, you will generally find in safe banks they both do not exceed five times the amount of specie. And, sir, I cannot consider any bank entirely safe which has not generally one fifth specie of its circulation and deposits.

The gentleman from Tennessee has said, and said truly, that if you adopt all the amendments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIRNEY,] it will be impracticable for the State banks to become the depositories of the public money. The adoption of this amendment does not pledge any gentleman or the House to adopt the others. On the contrary, there are several to which I am opposed. I am opposed to the monthly publication of the reports of the deposit banks. It is proper these reports should be made monthly, at least, to the Secretary of the Treasury; but it is both expensive and oppressive to have them published. It exposes the deposit banks to the tremendous power of the United States Bank, and also places them in the power of other State institutions. It gives those banks an unfair advantage, and is of no use. The information is wanted by the Secretary, to enable him to judge of their safety, and therefore ought to be given him. The community can derive no advantage from it. It is sufficient to have those reports laid before Congress at each session, to enable them to act advisedly when necessary. I am opposed to the interest. The deposit banks will have many things to do for the United States. They must make the collections; keep the money safely; transmit it from place to place as may be necessary. All these are expensive to the banks, and would be very much so to the United States. The expense to the banks cannot be less than two or three per cent.; and if the United States had to collect the money, build houses and vaults for its safe keeping, and transmit it from place to place where it may be wanted, you will find the expense not less than five or six per cent. It has been said the United States Bank paid a bonus for the use of the deposits. Sir, this is a mistake. On a former occasion I endeavored to show that the deposits was no part of the consideration for the bonus; but that it was paid for the banking privileges given by the charter. I shall not now go into that inquiry. The United States cannot then refuse to the banks the use of this money free of interest. It is not only of use to the banks, but benefit to the community. A principal reason why the banks should be the depositories of the public money is, that they may lend it to the community. By this the burdens of taxation are lessened. The merchant who has a large amount of duties to pay, can more easily do it by getting an accommodation from bank than if he had to pay the money in cash.

Territorial Bills—Tennessee Land Bill.

I am opposed to the security. The requisition of one fifth specie will keep them safe enough, and when monthly reports are made to the Secretary, he must be very negligent or corrupt if he does not discover any want of safety in any of those banks. This requisition I would consider unreasonable and oppressive. The one fifth specie I consider reasonable, and conducive to their safety. Whilst, therefore, I shall oppose the other amendments, I am in favor of this; and, believing it can be guarded from all ill consequences to the Western banks by the amendment I intend to offer, I shall vote against the reconsideration.

Mr. HUBBARD now moved the previous question; whereupon,

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved a call of the House, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and, being taken, stood as follows: Yeas 144, nays 59.

The Clerk then called the roll, when 190 members answered to their names.

The absentees were called.

Mr. MERCER moved that further proceedings in the call be suspended; but the House refused its assent.

Excuses were received on behalf of the (nine) absent members, some of which were admitted and others not; when all further proceedings were suspended.

The question then recurring on seconding the previous question, it was decided in the affirmative: Ayes 126, noes not counted.

The previous question was then put and carried; when the House, by yeas and nays, agreed to reconsider the amendment of Mr. BIXLER, which it had before adopted: Yeas 119, nays 109.

The amendment being thus thrown open again to discussion,

Mr. JONES offered an amendment, excepting from the operations of the amendment of Mr. BIXLER the banks in which the moneys paid for public lands shall be deposited, and requiring the registers and receivers to deposit only the notes of specie-paying banks.

Mr. JONES's amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, now moved the previous question, [the effect of which motion, if carried, would be to cut off all amendments, and bring the House to the question upon the bill;] but the House refused the motion: Ayes 97, noes 116.

Mr. CLAY moved an adjournment.

FRIDAY, FEB. 20.

TERRITORIAL BILLS.

After disposing of some preliminary business, Mr. SEVIER asked the House to consider certain bills relative to the Territories, which had been reported by a Committee of the Whole.

Objections being made,

Mr. SEVIER moved a suspension of the rule; which was agreed to: Yeas 113, nays 27.

Several bills in relation to the Territories were then read a second time, and ordered to a third reading.

The bill from the Senate, authorizing the construction of a railroad upon the public land, from Tallahassee to St. Mark's, in Florida, coming up among the rest, and several amendments having been disposed of, the question recurred upon the amendment adopted in committee, authorizing the construction of a railroad upon the public lands in the Territory of Michigan.

Mr. WHITE said that he understood the railroad in Michigan, provided for in the amendment, was connected with the disputed boundary question; he therefore hoped that the Delegate from that Territory would withdraw the amendment, and attach it to one of his own bills, as it would be calculated to embarrass the bill in which his (Mr. W's) constituents were particularly interested.

Mr. MERCER remarked that the adoption of the amendment would make the bill incongruous, as it was not competent for the House to change the title of a bill from the Senate.

Mr. LYON said he could see no force in the objection of the Delegate from Florida. The boundary question had nothing to do with it. He understood that the members from Ohio intended to resist the amendment because one end of the proposed road touched upon a tract of country claimed by the State of Ohio. He thought an objection of that character an illiberal one. In order, however, to avoid a long debate, and according to a promise which he had made to the Delegate from Florida, not to throw any embarrassment in the way of the passage of the bill, he would withdraw the amendment.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time.

POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. CONNOR moved to suspend the rules in order to take up the bill to establish certain post routes, and to alter and discontinue others.

Mr. VINTON expressed the hope that the gentleman would ask an evening session, for the purpose of considering this bill. And he moved to amend the motion so as to fix upon Tuesday evening next, at seven o'clock, as the time.

Mr. CONNOR accepted the amendment as a modification; and, after some conversation, the motion was further modified so as to fix on Monday evening at six o'clock, and the motion was agreed to.

TENNESSEE LAND BILL.

Mr. DUNLAP moved to suspend the rules of the House, for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole on the Tennessee land bill. Mr. D. said he asked the indulgence of the House to state the situation of the persons provided for in said bill. The citizens of eighteen counties, and the fractions of five others, were directly interested in the passage of this bill; they live on scraps of vacant land. They had been for twelve years asking Congress to provide some means for them to obtain a title to their homes; it had hitherto denied them. The members whose constituents were directly interested in the passage of this bill had, during the last and present session, contented themselves to give silent votes. They had not occupied the attention of this House with long speeches. Their great anxiety to get this bill passed had prevented them from occupying a portion of the time of the House in debate. Their constituents had a right to a portion of the time of the House, for the consideration of their business; none had been given them during the last or present session. We have been assisting other gentlemen to get the business of their constituents attended to; now we ask them to assist us. The provisions of the bill are such as will give general satisfaction. He did not believe there could be any opposition to the same, and that it would occupy but a short time of the House. He asked it as a matter of favor of the House to take up this bill.

Mr. CROCKETT wished to make a few explanations on the subject of this bill; but objections being made, Mr. C. resumed his seat.

The question was then taken on Mr. DUNLAP's motion to suspend the rules; which was negatived: Yeas 77, nays 52—two thirds being required.

WESTERN TERRITORY.

Mr. GILMER moved to suspend the rules, in order to take up the bill "to provide for the establishment of the Western Territory," reported at the last session. Mr. G. stated that he had been informed, by the Secretary of War, that the immediate passage of this bill was highly important.

After some suggestions from several members, Mr. H. EVERETT asked the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered.

The question being taken, the motion was agreed to: Yeas 145, nays 50.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill "to provide for the establishment of the Western Territory, and for the security and protection of the emigrant and other Indian tribes therein."

The several amendments reported from a Committee of the Whole were respectively concurred in.

And the question being on the engrossment of the bill, Mr. HORACE EVERETT entered into a lengthened defence of the provisions of the bill. He examined the relations in which the Government of the United States had placed itself by the several treaties made from time to time with the Indian tribes, and the relations in which it stood towards the Indian tribes, by the claims they had upon the Government of the United States, on account of those treaties. Various engagements had been entered into with those tribes, providing for their removal west of the Mississippi. For the fulfilment of these engagements, the faith of the nation was pledged.

Among those engagements was one guarantying to the Indians the possession of their lands against all hostilities whatever, whether arising from other tribes or between themselves. These were the two most important engagements, and it became necessary to take measures for the purpose of fulfilling those obligations.

One great object of the bill was to enable the Indians themselves to make such regulations among themselves as should, in a great measure, relieve us from the burden, so far as we could induce them to take upon themselves the obligations we had assumed; to defend themselves from foreign hostilities, and maintain peace among themselves. This could only be done by employing such a military force as that provided for under the bill. One word as to the relations between the Government of the United States and the State of Georgia: we had bound ourselves to extinguish the Indian titles to all the lands within the limits of that State; and that would be done if this bill passed, and that embarrassing question for ever settled. Mr. E. then referred to the Indian titles in Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, &c., which belonged to the United States, and which we should then acquire. The first great object of the bill was to fulfil our obligations towards the Indians; the next to redeem the faith we had pledged towards the State of Georgia; the third to acquire a territory for ourselves in those States wherein the Indian titles belonged exclusively to the Government of the United States.

The great question was, if the bill would effect these objects: First, with regard to the Cherokees in Georgia, it was a belief, well founded, that, as soon as the bill was passed, that tribe would emigrate, and one great end would be answered, that of disposing of those intricate and embarrassing questions which had so long been agitated, not only in the State of Georgia, but also in other sections of the country. Mr. E. then entered into a review of the various sections of the bill, seriatim. With regard to the alleged indisposition of the Indians to emigrate, Mr. E. said the committee had satisfactory evidence before them that the tribes were willing to do so, if their territorial Government could be ensured. The committee had procured a translation of the bill, and submitted it to a delegation in Washington, who expressed themselves satisfied with it. The object was not to force it upon the Indians, but to organize a plan, and to provide an officer on the spot, who might aid and assist in carrying it into effect. Much error had arisen from the name given to that officer, from his being called governor, instead of superintendent; and it was thence imagined that it was the object of the bill to form an Indian government; but this was not so. The plan of the council was for the purpose of their forming a confederation of the different tribes. It was indispensable that the presiding power should be somewhere; it was in the President of the United States, who, as commander-in-chief of the army, was required to see the bill carried into effect, which could only be ensured by a military force; and the commander of that force would be appointed in the usual manner. Sufficient powers had been reserved to the United States, in the provisions of the bill, between the different tribes.

With regard to a delegate, it was absolutely necessary that the Indians should have one in that House. What objections might be urged against it he knew not; but if they were to examine the subject minutely, they would find it exceedingly difficult to discover by what authority a delegate from either of the Territories came there. The end of the committee had been to provide for every thing which could civilize the Indian tribes, and no provision was thought more conducive to that end than the provision authorizing a delegate to be sent to Congress. It would also be productive of a great saving to the United States, and would eventually do away with much of the expenses of the Indian department.

Mr. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS regretted to see that there was an evident disposition on the part of the House to pass this bill. It was a bill interfering with the laws of nations, and proposing the establishment of a despotism. It was a bill to alter the constitution of the United States, and was contrary to the second section of that instrument. He asked the gentleman who reported the bill [Mr. EVANSTON] to show him any article of the constitution authorizing the establishment of an Indian territory. This land was guarantied to the Indians, and what right had we to take upon ourselves to form the Indians into an integral part of the United States? Such an instance was never known under the constitution. If you did this, what could prevent you from having a negro territory in the United States, and authorizing it to send a delegate to Congress? Were gentlemen prepared for this? He believed not; but it might come.

It was also a bill to change the laws of nations. The relations in which the United States existed towards the Indians, were relations under the common compact of the laws of nations. The Indians had retained the power of self-government. We had made treaties with them, and if we proposed any such control over them as that intended by the present bill, it could only be done by treaty. We were assuming more than we had a right to in doing it by legislation, though he was not unaware that an Indian treaty was a mockery.

Indian Territory.

It was a bill for the establishment of a despotism. It was in contravention of the laws of nations, and was therefore despotic. Under the constitution, every State must be republican, and the people were so punctilious that, although they reserved certain sovereign rights to the States, they made it a fundamental principle with them all, that no government in this Union should be established, other than republican. If they did so, the other States were bound to put it down by force. This bill was not republican at all; it established a military despotism. To prove this, Mr. A. read the second and third sections of the bill, and said it was the very essence of despotism. He intended to move to strike out those two sections. The bill had undergone a close and rigid examination last session, and was proved to be of the character he had designated, Mr. A. concluded by moving to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. BURGESS was always in favor of every thing that could be done to those wrecks of so many mighty nations but to see the representatives of a great Republic, sitting there to make laws for people who were unrepresented, was one of the greatest anomalies he could have conceived. It would be inefficacious. If those people had asked for it, and had requested the wise men of this nation to make a code of laws for them, that would be different; but they could not be coerced by laws made without their own consent. He should shrink from doing so with horror.

Mr. B. opposed, particularly, the provision of the bill providing for a reversion of the Indian lands to the United States, and said he could not support the bill. We were placing these men under the power of our legislation, and then providing for taking back their lands again. In a few years, he said, by dragons and bayonets, Christian tomahawks and scalping knives, not one of these poor fellows would exist on his land.

Mr. GILMER said, if they intended to act upon this bill, it was impossible to go into the old question with the Indians. The clause referred to by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BURGESS] was an exact transcript from the agreement made with the Indians themselves. The Indians were in a state of pupillage, regarded as unfit to govern themselves. It was said that the employment of a military force made this a despotism. Was not the United States a republican Government, and would the gentleman from Massachusetts refuse to employ a military force to carry the laws into execution? And why should not the Indian council do the same? The gentleman himself had once carried it out to a greater extent. Mr. G. contended that the bill was the only measure that could be devised to secure the Indian rights, and yet the bill was objected to by the gentleman from Rhode Island on that very ground.

[Mr. BURGESS explained. He wished their rights to be secured by treaty.]

Mr. GILMER resumed. With regard to the motion to strike out the second section, he would observe that the word territory was used not in the sense of a government, but as a territory or tract of country. Mr. G. would have no objection to strike out all that part relating to territory, and insert some other words, and also insert a provision to reserve to the Indians the same right to the lands they had now. The word territory was introduced by the committee in compliance with the wish of the Indians themselves. Mr. G. moved to insert "lands within," so as to read, "lands within said Territory," and gave notice of another amendment, connected with the provision for a delegate to Congress.

Mr. ARCHER regretted the apathy and indifference with which this subject was regarded. He contended that the bill under consideration was for the establishment of a foreign confederacy, that might become as great as our own. We had as much right to go abroad and incorporate a government in a foreign land. We had territories now, but of what are they composed? Of citizens of the United States. It had been said they were in a state of pupillage. Who governed them? Who appointed the meetings of their councils? Did not every one know that the agent of the United States could govern these Indians by the influence of whiskey and presents? When these presents had not proved sufficient, what had proved so? Force! Is this securing to the poor Indian a government of his own? The remedy proposed grew out of those very acts of oppression. Mr. A. contended that the proposed Government would be a despotism—a military government in its worst form. He had a feeling which he would never surrender, which would always impel him to discountenance any government in this country composed of people of any other color than his own. There was even now a proposition existing to form a government of blacks on our borders. There was one already established in Canada, formed of the negroes from our own territory, and occupying one of the most fertile sections of the country. He asked, what would be the relation of this government to ourselves? It would be a province. Were we dead to the warnings of history? What finally subjugated Rome? Her provinces. The Territory in contemplation, (though it did not deserve the name of Territory, and he would not call it such,) would make a parallel with fallen Rome. Our governor or superintendent would resemble her proconsuls. He hoped the members of that House would pause before they recognised the principles sanctioned in the bill, and he expressed himself opposed to it in every form.

Mr. HARDIN began by an examination of the claims of Georgia on the United States Government, in reference to the Indian titles to lands in the Cherokee country, &c., and maintained that we were bound to fulfil the engagements we had made with Georgia for extinguishing those claims.

It was the policy of the United States to give them such a form of government as should induce treaties with all the Indian tribes, and make all those tribes the true friends of the United States. Such was the object of the bill. Notwithstanding the profound respect which he entertained for the opinions of the gentlemen from Massachusetts and Virginia [Messrs. ADAMS and ALCORN] on constitutional law, he could not see the subject in the same light in which they appeared to view it. Mr. H. then referred to the act admitting the Territory of Louisiana into the Government as a Territory, for which the gentleman from Massachusetts voted, and which was similar in many of its provisions to the present one. The officers of that Territory were appointed by the President; and where was then the cry of despotism? And he would ask them where was the constitutional objection to this bill? Military force was authorized in the incorporation of Louisiana into the Government. Why then object to it here, where the Indians themselves were allowed a commanding voice in its exercise? He could see no despotism in the matter. The opposition to the bill reminded him of the trick of lawyers so often resorted to sustain a bad cause.

Mr. H. said he would be happy to see a delegate from that abused race upon this floor; and he doubted not that nine times out of ten he would go with him. Give these tribes a government, and a standing among nations. What more degraded the otherwise fair character of our country, than the fate of this almost extinct race? The remnant of them left on this side of the setting sun, was a reproach to Spain and to Europe. What could more contribute to our glory, than to be the instruments of making a reparation so long due to an injured, a persecuted race? Mr. H. alluded to the indirect and inefficient attempts that had been made to civilize the Indians, by sending missionaries among them, &c.; but he would say, give them a government, give them property, give them laws and literature, and every thing would follow. They would then become Christians like ourselves. We owed it to Georgia to do it. We owed it to ourselves, and to our God, and be never in his life voted more cheerfully for any bill than he should for the present. He had no such fears as those dreaded by the two gentlemen who had addressed the House that morning. Wait till the time come, and then meet the contingency. He hoped the bill would pass.

Mr. VINTON said this discussion was unexpected to him. It was a solemn subject, and he feared the character of the bill was not properly understood by the House. If the country was charged with any violation of public faith, which bore with particular force upon its national character, it was this of its obligations to, and contracts with, the aborigines. The Territory included in the bill extended over an immense portion of our continent—bounded on one side by the twenty-ninth degree of north latitude, and extending over thirteen degrees of longitude. He concurred with the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that the government proposed for this Territory was a despotism—a military government in embryo.

How was this Territory to be governed? By a governor, and a council consisting of twenty-four chiefs, who were "to be elected or selected." What selected meant, he knew not. Then, it was confined to chiefs; no other Indian than a chief. Then, the governor had many despotic powers. Mr. V. recited the various provisions of the bill setting forth the same.

Mr. CLAYTON rose and requested the Chair to call the House to order, as the stir was so great that, though sitting near the gentleman, he was himself unable to hear him distinctly.

Mr. HUBBARD said, as there was a great excitement prevailing, in consequence of the important news that had arrived, he moved that the House adjourn. Negatived.

Mr. VINTON resumed. He was opposed to the bill, because, in the first place, it was unconstitutional; and secondly, it was anti-republican. If it was intended to form a civil government, he was for the employment of civil officers only. If, however, the bill should be adopted, he should move to restrict the limits of the Territory within a smaller compass, so that it should not be larger than one, or two, at the utmost, of the Western States.

Mr. CLAYTON, of Georgia, now rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: As this is a question of great concern to the nation at large, and still deeper interest to the State of Georgia, I hope I may be allowed to trespass upon the patience of the House, nearly exhausted, I have no doubt, but for a few moments longer. I confess the discussion has greatly surprised me, because I have found opposition in a quarter where I least expected it, and it has disclosed to me some secrets that will not be unacceptable to the people I have the honor to represent. What does this bill propose? What I had supposed would have been hailed with acclamation among some benevolent people, who have been lamenting, in tears of bitter anguish, for ten years past, the deplorable condition of the Southern Indians. The bill proposes to give to all the Indians east of the Mississippi a fixed and certain home beyond that river. It is to be theirs, free from all future troubles from the white man. It is to be guaranteed to them under the faith and solemn pledge of this great nation, confirmed by all the sanctions of law, and secured by all the obligations of honor and justice. They are to have the right of self-government in their respective tribes, and a confederated one between all the tribes living upon the Territory, with the right of paternal supervision on the part of the general Government. To aid in carrying into effect these humane and desirable objects, and to protect and defend the Indians against invasions from abroad, as well as from internal dissensions, a governor or superintendent, to be appointed by the President, is to preside over their confederated government, and to employ the military force, if necessary, either for the purposes just mentioned, or the execution of such laws as may be passed by their council. And, finally, they are to be represented on this floor by a delegate, in the manner of the other Territories. To this plan I understand the following objections to be made: 1st, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that it is unconstitutional, that it violates the laws of nations, and is the "quintessence" of despotism. 2d, by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ALEXANDER,] that it is a despotism, and that such a confederation will be dangerous to the liberties of the people of the United States: first, from the confederacy itself; and, second, from the military force in the hands of the President, intended to defend the Indians; and, 3d, by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON,] that it is unconstitutional, and that it is too much land to be given to the Indians. I understand that these are all the objections to the bill; if there are any others, I desire to be informed of them before I proceed, because I feel a perfect confidence I shall be able to convince this House that none of these are of sufficient weight to impede for a moment the passage of the bill. I shall commence with the gentleman from Massachusetts, and in answering his objections I shall accomplish the same thing as to similar ones made by the other gentlemen. And, first, as to the unconstitutionality of the proposed law. The gentleman from Massachusetts contends that no part of the constitution authorizes such a government, and the absence of such a power is enough for the proof of this position. The gentleman from Ohio goes further, and shows that Congress has no other right to interfere with Indians, but to regulate commerce with the tribes, reading to us this clause of the constitution: that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes," and that any further legislation as to this class of people is wholly unauthorized. There is something so amusing in these grave arguments about the violation of the constitution, used by gentlemen who have stretched it in every possible shape which such a pliant instrument could assume, that it is difficult to restrain one's laughing propensities; and I can hardly forbear to ask them when they came to the knowledge of these very important discoveries? I know their illumination is of but very recent date, for I will show a time when they were perfectly ignorant, or affected to be so, of the sage doctrines now for the first time so zealously urged by them. I freely admit, Mr. Speaker, that the name of Indian is mentioned but twice in the constitution; once as just quoted by the gentleman from Ohio, and again where designating the population that shall be entitled to representation, "Indians not taxed" shall be excluded, and that neither of these provisions will authorize the contemplated legislation. But I will presently show the clause that will satisfy every mind. Before doing this, however, I must not lose sight of the promise just made to satisfy this House that the constitutional scruples of the gentlemen are of but very late origin. I lay down this position, and defy contradiction upon it, that the treaty-making power of this

Indian Territory.

Government must stick to the constitution as closely as the law-making power, and that neither can travel out of that instrument. Does any man dare to deny this? And recollect I do not use the expression in a spirit of menace. Now, how does it happen, Mr. Speaker, that if you cannot legislate further than the right to trade with the Indian tribes, that you can treat with them over and beyond that power? If there is but this single subject in the constitution that the law-making power can have any thing to do with, will these gentlemen show me where the treaty-making power has any further rights over the subject? Surely it will not be contended that the President and Senate can do more with a power in the constitution than the President, Senate, and House of Representatives, with the identical same power? Well, then, sir, if they cannot, let me call to the recollection of these gentlemen some treaties made with the Georgia Indians, in which this Government not only attempted to regulate trade with them, but it actually stipulated to guaranty their lands to them; to grant them the right of self-government, to establish a penal code for the punishment of citizens who should trespass upon their territory, to have them arrested by a military force and dragged to distant tribunals for trial; and all this, not upon the Government's own territory, but within the acknowledged limits of a sovereign and independent State! Is it remembered how Georgia has been abused and scandalized for objecting to these treaties upon the very grounds which these gentlemen now contend would be unconstitutional if carried into a law? The whole country, from one end of it to the other, rung with lamentations, far beyond any of Jeremiah's, at the cruel, heartless, faithless conduct of Georgia, in disregarding the solemn treaties of the Government. Benevolent societies, female associations, were formed, to mourn over the condition of a people whose lands and rights of self government had been wrested from them by virtue of violated treaties. Nay, sir, this is not all: these treaties were attempted to be enforced by a "superadded obligation higher than human authority;" and now, sir, we find that Congress has no other right but to regulate trade with the Indian tribes. I thank the gentlemen for their new lights upon this subject, as it redeems my State from a tremendous load of guilt; and they ought now to take back what they have said and thought about the conduct of Georgia, for both of them have maintained that these treaties were constitutional, unless, indeed, they should contend that the doctrine they now advance is not applicable to treaties.

Sir, I will show the House their right to legislate on this subject. In the third section of the fourth article of the constitution you will find these words: "Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States." This is the authority upon which you have founded your territorial Governments, that differ from the one proposed in the bill on your table in no essential particular, save perhaps the difference of color in the subjects of your government. You have this territory; no one disputes your right to it; and you find upon it numerous tribes of Indians, over whom you have a guardian care, and have exercised it from the foundation of the Government. I lay down this position, that the general Government can do with its territory, and the Indians thereon, under the provision of the constitution just mentioned, what the States can do with the territory, inhabited by Indians, within their respective limits. And what have they done? Have they not exercised the rights of government over them? Nay, has not this Government extended its regulations over the Indians in various ways? Have they not superintendents connected with almost every tribe? Look at your intercourse laws; do they not provide for the government of the Indians? The question is not how much regulation you will exercise among these people, but can you do it at all? for the moment you introduce the slightest rule over them, the whole power is let in to govern them in such a manner as will best promote, in your judgment, your and their interest. You have a right, as already shown, to dispose of your territory, and you have the further right to make all needful rules and regulations respecting it, that you may think proper. Well, here are these unfortunate beings on your territory, unfit, by reason of their color and the want of sufficient civilization, to be incorporated in those political institutions by which your own citizens are governed. What are you to do with them? Are you prepared to cut their throats, or drive them off at the Pacific ocean? If you could regulate them while they were within the limits of States, and this you claimed the right to do, by treaties, by intercourse laws, by your superintendents, by your army, what is to hinder you from doing the same thing on your own territory? Is it because you hate to give up your land, and had rather keep them on other people's land? I shall say something more about this hereafter. Does any man doubt, then, your right to go upon your territory, clothed with the power to dispose of it, and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting it, and, finding these people there, to say to them, we do not wish to exterminate you, but we are willing to cede this territory to you as long as you remain on it; but such is your savage character and warlike disposition, we wish to ameliorate the first and to restrain the last, and therefore you must submit to such needful rules and regulations as we may adopt for that purpose. You cannot think hard of this; for, with but little difference, this is the manner in which we govern our other Territories, inhabited by our own white people. Can any man believe that this would be unconstitutional? So much, then, for the constitutional objection.

The next objection is, that it violates national law, (by the by, I do not admit that they constitute such a nation as brings them within the privileges and benefits of that code, and so say the writers on that subject.) But suppose they do? I understand the gentleman to say the national law is violated, in this, that the bill destroys the right to treat with them. Now, so far from this, their rights under former treaties are secured to them by the last section of the bill; and it is one of the avowed objects of the law to enable the Government to make such treaties with them as will procure all their lands on this side of the Mississippi, for the very lands in the bill upon which they are to be settled. The Government, through the Secretary of War, has said, no treaty can be made until this law is passed, for the Indians want some pledge, some guarantee that they shall have another before they part with their present home.

[Here Mr. ADAMS rose and said there was another ground upon which he considered the national law infringed, viz: that the bill changed our relations with the Indians.]

Sir, I thank the gentleman for this last objection, for it is obviated as soon as made. The bill expressly declares that none of its provisions shall go into operation except by the free and voluntary assent of the Indians, and I apprehend he will not deny, after the great experience he has had in negotiations, that nations may alter, by agreement, their relations with each other to any extent they please.

So much, sir, for this objection. The next is the despotism which this bill creates; and the argument urged to prove it is the use of the military, on the part of our Government, to execute the laws of the general council of the Indians, if necessary, and to defend them from external aggression and internal commotion: precisely the use that is made of it in all other Governments. Sir, there are two forces employed in the execution of all laws, moral and physical. Every law presupposes the use of these agents: the first is a judicious and well-regulated public opinion, cheerfully acquiescing in all just and equal laws—and none other should be made—for the benefit which is derived to society. As this is the will of society, so the second is its arm, its whole strength, and must be used to carry its will into effect: government cannot exist without it. The first application of it is in its officers—your judges, sheriffs, constables—and, finally, these failing, your militia. Be it always remembered, however, that this is only applicable as between the Government and its individual citizens, municipally; not as between sovereign and independent communities politically. Now, sir, the gentleman from Ohio, in showing the despotism of this bill, emphatically asks, would you carry into effect the judgments of your courts by a military force? Why, sir, nothing is more common, and it is actually the law of the land, to which, in our own happy Government, he and the rest of us are daily subject. Is not your sheriff entitled to the force of the country to execute the judgments of your courts? He can first call upon a by-stander for aid, then upon the whole country, and, this failing, he can demand (through the courts) of the executive department, the whole militia of the country. Here, then, is the military provided by law to execute the laws of the land. It is not so much the degree of force, or the manner of employing it, as the right to use it at all. Once grant this, and the question is settled. If the law can be executed by the strength of one man, well and good; if it can be done by using a walking cane, that is equally well; but if it requires more persons, and the use of other instruments, the principle is not in the slightest degree altered. It was force before; it is nothing more now: there is only a difference in degree and manner; and no one will pretend to say of the individual resisting the law, it is a matter of any consequence to him whether the law officer comes against him with a bludgeon or bayonet, or dressed in a common coat or regimentals; if he is to overcome, it is not for him to choose either the mode or the champion. Now, sir, with all this cry of despotism, we live under precisely such a one, and so must all Governments. All that is intended by the military force in the bill on your table, besides the protection to the Indians before mentioned, for which our Government has also its military force, it is designed for nothing more nor less than as a substitution for the posse comitatus to execute the laws, which the common council of the Indians may, from time to time, enact, and to come in aid of the tribunals appointed by them to administer these laws. Away, then, with this charge of despotism. Look at your intercourse laws with the Indians, under which you have acted for years. See the military force constantly used to protect them, and to carry into effect your laws, not only as against the Indians, but against your own citizens. I myself, as a State judge, have discharged our citizens, under habeas corpus, from the military of this Government. They were only acting as a sheriff, and carrying their prisoners before the civil authority; and this is all that is intended by the present law: it is only to be used in aid of the municipal power.

Indian Territory.

Sir, it ought not to be forgotten that the very peculiar and anomalous relation in which this unfortunate people stand to our Government imposes very great embarrassment, and which must be left to our discretion—a discretion that ought to be regulated by a deep sense of justice, and the warmest feelings of humanity. They are said to be in a state of pupillage to our Government; and, if so, this same principle that runs through the relations of master and apprentice, guardian and ward, parent and child, must be applied to them; and, however it may be abused, nay, has been abused, not only as to them, but even in the relations of parent and child, yet it is the best rule that belongs to the connexion, both for them and for us, and we cannot dispense with it.

Having now, sir, disposed of the three objections of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and, with them, two urged by the other gentlemen, I shall next notice the argument used by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ALEXANDER.] He considers, 1st. A confederation of certain powerful tribes of Indians on our frontier, as dangerous to the peace of the States; and, 2d. That the military force, employed under the authority of the President, may prove dangerous to the liberties of the people; and instances the fate of Rome, whose liberties were lost by sending out the military into the provinces, under the command of a Sylla and a Cæsar. I feel no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that these warm feelings spring from a high and ardent love of liberty, and a jealous and justifiable watchfulness of its preservation. But, sir, I hope we all possess them; they are felt in a high degree by every member on this floor, not less, I am persuaded, than by the gentleman from Virginia. But, sir, they often betray us into reflections that in our cooler moments have more the appearance of fancy than of fact; and, sir, since this very discussion has commenced, there have been many things said that have much more of poetry in them than prose. Does not every one perceive, if these Indians are to be removed to our frontiers, to be mingled with those already there, that it will be safer to our frontier inhabitants to have them organized into a government connected with our own, with our own military to control them, with our fostering care constantly exerted to make them feel the benefits of the connexion, than to place them there in their wild and savage state, stimulated by want and the indulgence of their brutal propensities to the perpetration of their accustomed robberies and barbarities? Surely the two situations, as to their effect upon our tranquillity and safety, under their relative weakness to our power, can bear no comparison. And, sir, as to the other objection, of the President's turning the military upon our own liberties, can there be any rational fear of this, so long as the army remains unincreased? The President has the command of them now; who has ever had any dread of his using them against our liberties? This bill does not propose to enlarge the army; and, under its present organization of five thousand officers and one thousand soldiers, the gentleman cannot be serious in thinking that they will be marched to the Indian provinces, and return upon us with a Sylla or Cæsar at their head.

There is one thing, however, in which I agree with the gentleman; I am not prepared to receive the Indians into this hall, as representatives of their nation. With him I object to the color. There are some men among them to whom, on account of color and intelligence, there can be no objection, any more than could be urged against some of their blood who now occupy a very distinguished position upon this floor; but we cannot make a discrimination; and, giving them an unrestricted right, they might quarter upon us a full-blooded savage. This provision can be stricken from the bill; and, if hereafter their progress in the arts of civilization, the change of public opinion—for really this is a matter belonging to the prejudices of education, and especially a little bleaching of the color—should seem to call for it, they may be let into the privileges of our institutions. Let every generation legislate for itself; it does not suit us for the present; it may, however, sort with the increasing charities of the times hereafter, and they may be hailed as every way worthy of communion with the whitest skin in the nation. With what shall be done five hundred years hence, we can have no possible concern.

I come now to the last objection made by the gentleman from Ohio, viz: the immense quantity of the land

H. or R.]

Claims on France.

to be ceded to the Indians; and he pulled out upon the House, by way of alarm, a map half as large as the territory itself. Mr. Speaker, I could but smile when I saw this display, and the fable of the farmer and the lawyer rushed into my mind. While the Indians were complaining that Georgia avarice was taking from them their lands, what an outcry! what sordid cupidity! what land mongers! what gold cormorants! But now, when they ask these very feeling, humane, heart-melting friends of theirs, "do give us a good wide home on your own lands where we will be safe from future persecutions," behold! when they come to find that it is their bull that has gored the ox, that alters the case. It must be inquired into. We are like the Georgians—we want the land for ourselves—the old States are a little crowded—we must push our people over the Mississippi—the Indians must not be in the way—we must put them upon as small a spot as they can well live upon—we do not like the idea of civilizing them, it may save them from extinction, and then we shall lose the lands altogether—they will keep them for ever—this will never do! Ah, Mr. Speaker, I find there are other people, in this wide world, who love lands fully as well as the Georgians, and have only lacked an occasion like the present, to show their cloven foot.

Mr. Speaker, let me ask the gentleman to reflect for a moment who this land originally belonged to, and, indeed, who it now belongs to. Nay, sir, will he not also recollect that the very spot we are now legislating upon was once, at no distant day, either, theirs? That they roamed over this whole land, from the mountains to the ocean, as the undisputed lords of the soil; and that they have been driven back from time to time, until they are reduced to the alternative of perishing where they are, or to be crowded upon the spot described in your bill, compared to which it forms but a drop to the ocean with the land they have lost, and which we now enjoy. Sir, I am told, by knowing calculators, that we have now twelve hundred millions of acres unappropriated, and which cannot possibly be disposed of for five hundred years to come. What do we want with more lands, at least for the period just mentioned? Sir, let them have it: it is theirs by right, by law, by equity; nay, by every principle which can bind us to a sense of mercy, and, what is stronger, to the eternal principles of justice.

Sir, I said, in the beginning of my remarks, opposition came from a quarter whence I could not have expected it, if there is any such thing as sincerity in the conduct of men. If those persons who have heretofore called themselves the exclusive friends of the Indians, whose bowels of compassion yearned, in such bitter anguish, over their hard fate while in the hands of the unrelenting Georgians, who said so many fine things about our exiling them from the homes of their ancestors and the graves of their fathers, are now unwilling to give them a better home—a home where we shall have a right to protect them—a home where they can no longer be disturbed—if they refuse to give them the right of self-government in their primitive tribes, and to aid them in civil government suited to a state of civilization, where they may be christianized, improved in condition, and enjoy the peculiar blessings of the arts and sciences, away with all canting hereafter about Indian oppressions: let them dry up their tears, and draw up their long faces, so happily adjusted for affected grief; let them dismiss their benevolent societies; let their female associations betake themselves to some other equally fanciful scheme of benevolence. The game is up, and the delusion is past; and though I cannot justify Georgia in all she has done on this subject, yet she stands fully acquitted of all reproach from those, at least, whose benevolence revolts at the proffered charity of this bill.

Sir, it may be thought the interest which Georgia has in this question has produced my zeal on the present occasion. If the fact were admitted, I do not perceive how that would weaken the claim which the Indians have upon your justice and magnanimity; but, sir, I can tell you the course of Georgia is taken upon this subject; and this Government has had experience enough to know she cannot be driven from her purpose. I do not mean to employ any thing like threats towards this House: I can assure the House I am far, very far, from such a temper—on the contrary, I never had more kindly feeling towards it; I only wish to call their serious attention to the present relations between Georgia and the general Government. They are at the point of a most tremendous explosion, which may possibly shake the Union to its very foundation. A case is before the federal court, and, if terminated against Georgia, by which that court will hereafter assume the revision of cases belonging to her criminal jurisdiction, depend upon it the State will submit to it only when she has lost the power to resist. Then, sir, would not the settlement of this difficulty alone be sufficient to authorize the removal of the Indians from that State, and with them the cause of more bitter contention, at home and abroad, than perhaps ever afflicted the peace of any community? There is no view of this subject which does not challenge for the great measure before you the cordial support of every friend to humanity.

Mr. ADAMS rose to correct some statements of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDIN] in relation to the vote he gave on the admission of the Territory of Louisiana into this Government. He quoted from the journals of the House from 1804 to 1806, (which he held in his hand,) to prove that the course he pursued on that occasion was directly the reverse of that attributed to him. He made a wide distinction between that case, however, and the present. This was for the admission into our Union of another race of beings—and not the admission of white men belonging to a foreign Government.

Mr. FILLMORE proposed an amendment to the bill, which was decided then to be out of order, but at the solicitation of Mr. F. the amendment was read. Mr. F. was induced to offer his amendment, he said, to apply particularly to those tribes of Indians residing in New York.

This amendment not being considered in order,

Mr. GILMER obtained leave to make some explanatory remarks applicable to the subject to which the amendment of Mr. F. alluded.

On motion of Mr. JONES, of Georgia,

The House then adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 21.

CLAIMS ON FRANCE.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the bill of the Senate to create a commission for the adjustment of the claims of American citizens, on account of French spoliations committed prior to 1800. Mr. C. said the committee had instructed him to state that there was not sufficient time for its members to investigate a question of such magnitude, and requiring the examination of so many documents; and that the committee had therefore instructed him to move that it be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that the said bill be laid on the table. With the assent of the committee, he also moved that two statements—the one prepared by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. EVERETT,] in favor of the claims, the other by himself, against them—embracing much information on both sides of the question, be printed for the use of the House.

These motions were agreed to.

Public Printing—Western Territory.

[H. OF R.]

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. HAMER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which a resolution adopted by the House, on motion of Mr. BUNGE, had been referred, directing said committee to inquire into the expediency of providing that all printing hereafter required for every branch of the public service should be executed in the District of Columbia, and also into the propriety of excluding all newspaper editors, and publishers of the same, from a participation in the execution of said printing, made a lengthy report. Mr. H. moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. FOSTER asked for the reading of the report.

The reading of the report was commenced; but before it was concluded,

Mr. WATMOUGH called for the order of the day. Yeas 98, nays 48.

Sundry bills were then taken up, read a third time, and passed.

O. H. DIBBLE.

The motion heretofore made by Mr. MERCER, to reconsider the vote on the passage of a joint resolution, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to examine and adjust the claim of O. H. Dibble, for materials, &c., furnished for the erection of a bridge across the Potomac, and report the state of the same to Congress at its next session, was taken up.

After a few remarks from Messrs. MERCER and BANKS, the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS, instructed by the Committee of Claims, and by unanimous consent, submitted an amendment to the resolution; which was agreed to.

The question recurring on the passage of the joint resolution as amended, a desultory debate of considerable length ensued, in which Messrs. MERCER, BANKS, ANTHONY, FILLMORE, and MINER, participated.

Mr. ANTHONY moved to recommit the resolution to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. H. HALL moved the previous question; which was seconded: Yeas 80, nays 40.

The House then determined that the main question should be put.

The main question being, "Shall the joint resolution pass?" it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 98, nays 75.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

The bill from the Senate to repeal the first and second sections of the "act to limit the term of office of certain officers therein named, and for other purposes," approved, May 1st, 1820, was read twice.

Mr. ARCHER moved that the bill be committed to a select committee.

Mr. FOSTER moved that it be postponed to Wednesday next, and made the special order for that day.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to commit the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

Mr. FOSTER said, if the latter motion prevailed, it it would be equivalent to sending the bill to the tomb of the Capulets. He demanded the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered.

Mr. HUBBARD referred to the number of appropriation and other important bills, which were necessary to be acted on. He did not object to the postponement of the bill as proposed, but he was opposed to making it a special order.

Mr. ARCHER withdrew his motion to commit to a select committee.

The SPEAKER informed the House that there were various special orders upon the calendar, which would have precedence, and that the present bill could not be reached if made the special order for a particular day, unless the House, by a vote of two thirds, postponed all the previous special orders.

Mr. E. EVERETT inquired of the Chair, if the bill was of a character which required its commitment.

The SPEAKER replied that, as the bill made no appropriation of money, its commitment was not required by the rules of the House.

Mr. HUBBARD withdrew his motion to commit.

The motion of Mr. FOSTER was then agreed to.

WESTERN TERRITORY.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill to provide for the establishment of the Western Territory, and for the security and protection of emigrant and other Indian tribes therein.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. GILMER to amend the second section of the bill, by inserting the words "lands within," so as to read "lands within said Territory."

Mr. JONES, of Georgia, said: I rise, Mr. Speaker, not to discuss the details of the bill, or to add any explanations to those which have been made by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] and my colleagues. My object was to make some reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] Those remarks struck my ear with something like surprise, to hear that gentleman object to the employment of military force authorized by this bill, which he considered as despotism. Sir, that gentleman has not always had such an aversion to the employment of military force. If he has forgotten, I have not, and I believe I never shall, a memorable instance where military force was resorted to. I will recall the circumstances to his recollection. By the treaty of the Indian Springs, in 1825, the Creek Indians relinquished their title to all their lands lying within the limits of Georgia. When Georgia was about, in pursuance of her policy in all such cases, to survey and distribute the lands among her citizens, the military force of the United States was ordered into the State, and placed upon the frontier of her settlements, to prevent the survey and occupation of her lands. Yes, sir, her lands; for as soon as the treaty was ratified the lands within her limits became ipso facto her property. And by whom was it employed? By the authority of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who was then high in place, and had the power, but not the right to do so. Yes, sir, by that gentleman was the military force first employed against a State, and to prevent her from the legitimate exercise of her sovereign powers and the occupation of her own property.

But by way of explanation, and in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has told you he was always opposed to the exercise of this power, except when required by treaty stipulations. Sir, there was no stipulation in that treaty which required or authorized the use of the military. It was called out under the provisions of the act regulating the intercourse with the Indians; an act in its character precisely similar to the one now before the House. But, sir, as I am always glad to see any return to correct principles, I congratulate the gentleman on the abandonment of his error, and trust he may now continue in the true faith.

The gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] and Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] could not permit this question to pass without adverting to the policy of Georgia in regard to the Indians. Sir, Georgia has been "more sinned against than sinning." Possessed of a large extent of territory, she conveyed to the United States sufficient to make two large States—Alabama and Mississippi—for which the United States engaged to extinguish the Indian title to all the land within her then contracted limits as soon as it could be done on reasonable and peaceable terms. The treaty of cession was made in 1802; shortly after the Indian title to a small strip of land was extinguished. By one or two successive treaties small bodies of land were obtained. At the treaty of Fort Jackson, in 1814, when the United States had it fully in her power to have complied with her contract with Georgia, and when the lines of the treaty were marked out with the point of the sword, a large extent of territory was obtained, lying in the State of Alabama, and the Indians driven in upon Georgia. In 1817, a treaty was made with the Cherokees; by one section of which, the title to all their land would have been gradually extinguished, and we should long since have been in possession of the whole. But, in 1819, another treaty was made with them, and that article of the treaty of 1817 rescinded. And ever since that time, to all propositions made by the United States for cessions of land, we have received the short and emphatic "no" as an answer. When the Cherokees were about to form an independent government within her limits, "imperium in imperio," Georgia called on the United States to prevent them, and she was informed that the United States could not interfere. I will not go through the long lists of resolutions, protests, and remonstrances, made by Georgia upon her Indian relations to this Government, and which were almost entirely disregarded. Finding the United States would not interpose to prevent the Cherokees, Georgia determined to do so herself. This was not an act of choice, but of necessity. And she did interpose, and that effectually: she extended her laws over all that country, and surveyed and distributed the unoccupied lands among her citizens. Gentlemen may suppose that Georgia is peculiarly and largely interested in the passage of this bill. They are mistaken: she has taken her course, and she will pursue it, regardless of the monitions, citations, and judgments, of the Supreme Court. She never will submit the decision of her sovereign rights to that tribunal. The Cherokees must either remove or come under the jurisdiction of the laws of Georgia. If they have become so highly civilized as some have supposed, this cannot be considered a hardship. If those laws are unsuited and oppressive to them, let them not blame Georgia, but those false friends and pseudo philanthropists who have precipitated them into this disastrous and calamitous situation.

Mr. ASHLEY was opposed to the general principles of the bill, and said, at the proper time, he should also propose some amendments. His principal objection was that it was contrary to the spirit of the laws made by the Indians themselves. There was scarce an instance in which laws were made for them by us with which they were not dissatisfied. The only way, in his opinion, to civilize the Indians, was to surround them with civilization. He was in favor of giving a certain portion of land to each, limiting them to a certain territory, and leaving them to make their own laws and regulations. He was quite sure that the governor would become a despot, at least in the opinion of the Indians themselves. He put the case of murder. If an Indian were to be executed by the order of the governor, under our laws, it would excite general dissatisfaction among them; but if left to themselves they would do justice with alacrity.

One great object of the bill was to relieve the State of Georgia of the Cherokees; but that very act would burden the Territory of Arkansas, and the borders of other States, to the same extent.

The amendment was agreed to, without a division.

On motion of Mr. GILMER, the following lines in the second section were stricken out, "and that the rights of such Indians, or tribes, shall not be impaired by their being at any time formed into a Territory, or one of the United States."

Mr. FILLMORE wished to provide for the removal to the Territory of such parts of tribes, or individuals, as might choose to go; and, on his motion, the words "and Indians" were added after the words "various Indian tribes."

Mr. BATES moved to amend the bill by striking out these words from the second section: "and the faith of the United States is hereby pledged." He remarked that these words were either without meaning in the bill, or they involved a bitter and biting sarcasm.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GILMER said the adoption of this measure was to depend upon the consent of the Indians, but the bill, as it stood, made it the duty of the President to appoint a governor, &c.; and he therefore moved an amendment providing that the President should act upon a ratification from the Indians, that they had agreed to form the confederacy herein provided for; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts, moved to strike out the second section; which was negatived.

Mr. VINTON said the bill provided that the council should make the laws of the Territory; and this council was to be composed of chiefs only, who were to be appointed for an indefinite term of time, and of course for life. Whether elected by the respective tribes, or selected from the existing chiefs, they were to retain their rank for life. He should move an amendment extending the number of persons eligible, and limiting the term for which they should serve in the council. In the same section, relating to the council, there was no provision requiring a journal of their proceedings to be kept, nor stating whether a quorum or less number should be competent to the transaction of business. The government was made an oligarchy in the outset. The laws were subject to the veto—of whom, sir? of a man responsible to the Indians? No; they were subject to the veto of a governor appointed by the President of the United States, or were to have no force or effect until they received his sanction. The council were to be paid by this officer of the United States, and were to be subject to his will, passing no laws of which he did not approve.

He should propose that a journal of the proceedings of the council should be kept and transmitted to both Houses of Congress, and that the laws should be subject to the revision of Congress. This, he said, would open a way for the representation of the Territory, in Congress, by a delegate. He wished to hold out a powerful stimulus to the Indians to cultivate the soil and engage in the pursuits of civilized life, and, therefore, objected to the proposed mode of electing and selecting the members of the council. By confining the appointment of members to those who pursued the occupations of civilized life, he thought an inducement to civilization would be held out to the Indians.

Mr. V. moved an amendment to the 7th section, the object of which was to confine the appointment of members of the council to the existing chiefs, and to those who were engaged in the cultivation of the soil or in some of the occupations of civilized life, and to limit their term of service to two years.

Mr. U. EVERETT thought it better, he said, to leave it to the Indians to select such persons as they thought proper, and moved to amend the amendment by striking out the first clause.

Mr. ASHLEY was opposed, he said, to the amendment, and to the 7th section of the bill also. The Indians ought to make their own selections entirely. They had their orators, the men who were appointed to speak, and these frequently were not chiefs.

FEB. 23, 1835.]

Vermont Resolutions.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. VINTON said, if the object of the bill was not to civilize the Indians, it ought not to pass, in any form. If there was any stimulus to the pursuits of civilization so powerful as the distinction, in public honors, which he had proposed in the amendment, he knew not what it was. He had carefully looked over the bill, and had not found in it one single provision which tended to the promotion of civilization, except the appeal to brute force—and there was enough of that.

Mr. H. EVERETT said, if the object of the mover of the amendment had been to render the measure so odious to the Indians that they would refuse to agree to it, he could have moved no provision that was better calculated to effect that object.

Mr. SEVIER said he had lived the greater part of his life in a frontier country, and had been much among the Indians, and was acquainted with their habits. It was usual with them to cultivate the soil in common. Sometimes a hundred persons were concerned in the same fields, and drew from the same corn crib; and it would be difficult to tell who among the number were cultivators of the soil. In the Choctaw tribe there were but three chiefs, and but two of these could write, read, or speak, one word of English; but there were many individuals of the several tribes, and especially since the establishment of the Choctaw Academy in Kentucky, who were as intelligent as nine tenths of the members of this House. He was clearly of opinion that the selection of members of the council should be left to the unrestrained choice of the Indians.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question then being on the amendment as amended, limiting the term of service to two years.

Mr. GARLAND opposed it. The chiefs, he said, were hereditary, or chosen, and they had a right to sit in council. If they were excluded from it, the bill would be defeated entirely. Those who were excluded, being men of influence in the tribes, would defeat the object of the measure entirely. It would be better to leave it to the Indians to choose their orators and chiefs according to their custom.

Mr. JONES, of Georgia, was in favor of the limitation.

Mr. H. EVERETT said he would assent to it.

The amendment, as amended, was then agreed to.

Mr. BATES moved an amendment to the seventh section, providing that the elections by the several tribes should be from the tribe at large; which was agreed to.

Mr. VINTON moved further to amend the 7th section, by inserting a provision requiring that a journal of the proceedings of the council should be kept, and transmitted to each House of Congress, and that the laws should be subject to be annulled by Congress.

Mr. GARLAND moved to amend the amendment, by striking out the last clause, providing that the laws might be annulled by Congress.

Mr. LOVE said we were not legislating for a civilized state, but only fixing a basis for future civilization. The proposition of the gentleman from Ohio would throw the whole scheme into inextricable confusion. The object which the committee had in view from the commencement, was, without interfering with the internal concerns of the Indians, to give them a territory, and the facilities for civilized life, and to leave it to time to perfect the system. To submit their laws to the proposed inspection would only be an embarrassment to the scheme.

Mr. H. EVERETT remarked that the only object in giving to the governor a veto on the proceedings of the council was to prevent them from passing any law which would involve the peace of the confederation.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, rejected.

Some further unimportant amendments were adopted; when

Mr. ALLEN, of Ohio, commenced a speech in general opposition to the bill; but was arrested in his remarks on a point of order by the Chair.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to strike out the clause in the 11th section, which provides that "it shall be competent for the said confederated tribes to elect, in such manner as the general council may prescribe, a delegate to the Congress of the United States, who shall have the same powers, privileges, and compensation, as are possessed by the delegates of the respective Territories."

At the suggestion of Mr. MERCER,

Mr. DICKINSON modified his proposition, and moved to amend the above clause, so as to provide for the election of an agent from the Territory to Congress, to remain at the seat of Government during the session, receiving the compensation of a member of Congress.

Here Mr. MINER moved an adjournment, which was agreed to; and

The House adjourned.

MONDAY FEBRUARY 23.

VERMONT RESOLUTIONS.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion to print the resolutions of the Legislature of Vermont in relation to the public lands, the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, and a national bank.

Mr. SLADE said that, when the motion was before the House on a former day, it was opposed by gentlemen from New York [Messrs. BRADLEY and TURNELL,] on the ground that the proceedings of the Legislature of Vermont, to which it related, were disrespectful to the House. He now rose to call upon those gentlemen to say in what respect, either in their matter or their manner, those proceedings were justly exposed to so grave a charge. He made this call the more earnestly, because if, upon the urging such an objection, distinctly and prominently in the debate, the printing should be refused, it would go forth to the world as a solemn decision of the House, that the proceedings of the Legislature of the State of Vermont were of a character which forbade the House, out of respect to itself, to place them upon its printed records. He therefore repeated the inquiry, and called upon the gentlemen from New York for a distinct and unequivocal answer.

Mr. BOON moved to lay the motion to print on the table.

Mr. H. EVERETT asked the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered.

The question being taken, the motion to lay on the table was negative: Yeas 33, nays 138.

After some remarks from Mr. HALL, of North Carolina, in explanation of his vote which he changed, by consent, to the negative,

Mr. SLADE rose to repeat the question which he had before put to the gentlemen from New York who had opposed the printing of the proceedings in question, on the ground that they were disrespectful to the House. It was an inquiry, he said, which he felt it his duty to press with an emphasis which should cause it to be understood and felt.

Mr. S. said he would say a few words in reply to the argument against the printing, drawn from the fact that the papers were not addressed to the House. It was, indeed, true that they were not addressed, in from, to the House, but closed with a simple resolution of instruction to the Senators, and recommendation to the Representatives, from Vermont, in regard to the votes they should give, and the influence they should endeavor to exert in connexion with the subjects embraced in the report of the committee which preceded the resolution. But it was to be remembered, said Mr. S., that this resolution was the solemn act of one of the sovereign States of this Union; that it expressed the sentiments of the Legislature of that State upon subjects of great public interest, embraced within the proper scope of the legislation of Congress. It would not be denied that a State may properly express its opinions upon these subjects; and he, Mr. S., contended that it was due to the States, in their character of members of this great confederacy, that, without the intervention of any formalities of address, they should be heard here, whenever their Representatives should think proper to present their proceedings, connected with subjects of national legislation.

Mr. S. said he had been no great stickler for "State rights;" but he believed the time had come when the subject of State rights should be better understood, and, in their just, and fair, and undeniable extent, guarded from invasion. The history of this Government, for the last few years, admonished of dangers which the most moderate advocate of State rights could not contemplate without alarm. He need not particularize, but he would say that, if all the powers claimed by either branch of this Government were to be exercised and submitted to, it would be idle to talk any longer of State rights. He felt no disposition to go into this subject at this time; and had alluded to it only for the purpose of saying that he should feel compelled to regard it as no equivocal indication of a determination to prostrate the States at the foot of federal power, and degrade them from their just relations to this Government, to deny to their proceedings the respect which it was now sought to extend to those of the State of Vermont, and especially to brand, as disrespectful to this House, an assertion, by the Legislature of a State, that the President has exercised powers and claimed prerogatives not granted to him by the constitution and laws of the country.

The State of Vermont, said Mr. S., having distinctly and unequivocally, yet in terms evincing a just respect both for herself and the Chief Magistrate of the country, expressed her opinions, I ask, as one of her Representatives on this floor, that those opinions, as embodied in the proceedings of her Legislature, now on your table, be printed, to the end that they may go down to future time in testimony of her decision upon matters of the deepest interest, not only to herself, but to all the States which compose this confederacy.

After a word from Mr. H. EVERETT,

Mr. BOON explained that he had not made the motion to lay on the table from any feeling of disrespect to the Legislature of Vermont, or to the gentleman who presented the resolutions. His only object was to prevent the further discussion of the subject at this late period of the session, when the time of the House was so precious. As the resolutions had been received by the House, they might be referred to a committee, and acted upon without printing.

The question being taken, the motion to print was agreed to: Yeas 159, nays 32.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. SLADE presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of the county of Addison, in the State of Vermont, praying for the abolition of slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia.

Mr. S. said that the memorial which he had the honor to present was signed by three hundred and seventy-five females, a large portion of whom were of that portion of the community usually called Quakers, or, as they generally preferred to denominate themselves, and were with peculiar propriety designated, Friends; friends, he would take leave to say, in the best sense, not only of the African race, in whose behalf they plead, but of the preservation and perpetuity of the republican institutions of the country.

[The SPEAKER here interposed, and admonished Mr. S. that it was not in order, on presenting the memorial, to go into a discussion of the subject-matter of it.]

Mr. S. resumed, and said that he was aware of the rule which restricted debate on this occasion, but he was not aware that he had furnished any ground for supposing that he was about to violate the rule, which he need not assure the Chair he did not intend to do. But he had felt bound to state at least the character of the memorialists, which it gave him pleasure to do, as that character alone furnished a guarantee that nothing would be asked to which the most intelligent and enlightened friend of the country could deny at least a candid and respectful hearing. He would only add that the prayer of this memorial met his hearty concurrence. He should feel bound to move that it be printed, but for the vote of last Monday upon a similar motion, which admonished him that it would be useless to press such a motion at this time. He would ask, however, what could not be denied, that the memorial be read and laid upon the table; which was done accordingly.

Mr. JACKSON, of Massachusetts, having presented several memorials to the same effect, said he felt it to be incumbent upon him, in offering these petitions, as the representative of a part of these petitioners, to accompany their presentation with a very few remarks.

One of them bore the signatures, as he was informed, (he had not counted them,) of three thousand one hundred and six ladies; and the other of nearly the same number of gentlemen. They were residents of some twelve or fifteen, possibly twenty, of the three hundred towns in Massachusetts, principally in the vicinity of Boston. So far as he was acquainted with the gentlemen, (and with some of them he was intimately so,) they are men who intend to make, and who do make, moral principle their rule of action. Men of intelligence, integrity, and liberality; who command respect and influence wherever they are known. They disclaim all interference, or disposition to interfere, with the rights of property in slaves, or control over the slave question, within the jurisdiction of the slave-holding States. They believe that slavery within the District of Columbia is productive of much physical, moral, and political evil; that Congress, having the constitutional right to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over the District of Columbia, is bound to correct these evils; and that, until they are corrected, the nation, the whole nation, is responsible for them. And so long as these injuries and evils continue to be inflicted by and through the instrumentality of laws sanctioned by Congress, or in consequence of the refusal of Congress to legislate, they feel it to be not only their indisputable right to petition, memorialize, and remonstrate, in favor of the oppressed, but that they are morally bound to do so.

The principal object, however, to which these petitioners now direct the attention of Congress, is the slave trade, as now carried on within the limits of this District; and the laws of the District which encourage, support, and aggravate, this enormous evil.

They believe that there is no practice existing among the human family so productive of mental degradation and crime as the slave trade. They are induced to believe this, not only by the well-authenticated facts and details of this infamous traffic, which are coming to their knowledge every year and every month, but they know that their laws condemn it as such; that the laws of almost every civilized nation on earth placed this among the blackest of crimes, and inflict upon those who engage in it the highest and heaviest penalties known to any law. They can discover no difference in the moral character of the slave trade, as carried on from the shores of Africa, and from this District. They say that, not only slaves are here bought, and sold, and shipped, to the deadly climate of the far South, where hardship and premature death awaits, and almost inevitably overtakes them, but, like the African trade, it involves freemen in the same calamity; with this difference, that, while in Africa the freeman is seized, borne off by force, and stolen in violation of all law, here it can be lawfully done.

[Mr. J. was here called to order; the discussion of the merits of the question at this time not being admissible by the rules of the House.]

Mr. J. said it was with extreme reluctance that he at any time, or under any circumstances, intruded his remarks upon the House; and he certainly would not intentionally transgress any of its rules when he did attempt to speak. He would, therefore, in order to bring the few remarks he was desirous of making within the rules of the House, move that the petition lie upon the table, and be printed; and begged the indulgence of the House to a very few words in support of that motion.

He believed that the course pursued by the House in relation to similar petitions had been the most unwise that could have been adopted. The House had doubtless been induced to pursue it under a belief that but very few individuals in any part of the Union had adopted the sentiments of these petitioners in relation to the slave trade within the District. And it seemed to him due to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] that he should be told that these opinions were not confined to a "few Garrisonites." Garrison's name he (Mr. J.) had not found upon these petitions, nor had he any reason for believing that they had been gotten up through his instrumentality or influence. Gentlemen deceive themselves if they suppose this to be the fact. This feeling of indignant opposition is confined to no particular class or section in New England, but is deeply planted in the moral sensibilities of the good, and the intelligent, wherever the laws of the District, and the practices under them, are known; and, he would add, this House has done vastly more than Garrison to bring it out, and bring it into action, by throwing these petitions silently, unheard, and unprinted, upon the table, or committing them to the Committee on the District of Columbia, only to be thrown under theirs.

[Mr. J. was again called to order, and informed that his remarks must be exclusively applied to printing.]

Mr. J. then said, as it seemed not to be consistent with the rules of the House to submit the remarks he was desirous of offering, he would withdraw his motion to print; and, notwithstanding, under ordinary circumstances, at an early period of the session, he should consider a motion to lay these petitions on the table the most injudicious and improper course that could be adopted, considering that the short remaining period of the session made it impossible to act upon them, he would move to lay them upon the table.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE WABASH.

Mr. HANNEGAN, on leave, presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill from the Senate, No. 54, being an act to improve the navigation of the river Wabash, be made the special order of the day for Thursday next, the 26th instant.

Mr. H. remarked, on introducing this resolution, that his object in asking the House to make this bill the special order of the day for a day certain, was the perfection of the bill itself, so as to ensure its success, should the House feel inclined, as he hoped it did, to pass the bill. As the matter now stood, it was imperfect, and he wished, before the measure was finally acted on, to propose an amendment, by inserting a provision for a port of entry—a provision necessary to the final success of the object contemplated by the bill. He did not wish to excite debate at this time; but, when the bill came up, he should so move to amend it, and an opportunity would then be given for any discussion that might be considered necessary. Should the House adopt the resolution, he would, on Thursday morning, move a suspension of all the previous special orders, for the purpose of considering this bill.

Mr. McCARTY was in favor of the resolution. The bill was one of the utmost importance to a large portion of the citizens of Indiana.

Mr. MERCER suggested that the resolution be modified by adding, after the word "Wabash," "and such other bills as relate to roads and canals, and surveys thereon."

Mr. HANNEGAN accepted the modification; when, after a short explanatory conversation between Messrs. HANNEGAN, MERCER, EVANS, McKENNAN, and SUTHERLAND, the resolution was rejected.

Mr. HUBBARD moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of going into committee upon several appropriation bills which he named.

Various other bills were named by different individuals, which they desired to include in the motion.

Mr. HUBBARD varied his motion so as to suspend the rule generally, for the purpose of going into committee, without designating any particular bill or bills; which was agreed to: Yeas 120, nays 38.

HARBOR BILL.

The House then, on motion of Mr. HUBBARD, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. McKENNA in the chair.)

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the committee took up the bill No. 648; a bill making additional appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, for certain harbors, and removing obstructions in and at the mouths of certain rivers, for the year 1835.

The bill was read through by the Clerk.

Mr. HUBBARD proposed an additional appropriation for the pier or breakwater in Dunkirk harbor, New York, $9,570 16; and also a further appropriation for filling up three hundred and fifty yards, with stone, of the outer pier on the said breakwater. Agreed to.

Mr. H. also proposed a proviso to the bill, giving the direction of these expenditures to the War Department, &c. Agreed to.

Mr. VINTON then proposed an appropriation of $50,000 for the improvement of the Ohio river between Pittsburg and the falls, to be expended under the direction of the War Department, and explained the necessity that called for the appropriation, for the removal of certain bars on the river which obstructed its navigation.

Mr. HAWES opposed the amendment, as altogether unnecessary. He was convinced that, as soon as one bar was removed, the same causes which had made it, would make it in some other part of the river; and in this way they might go on and expend the whole treasury of the country, and then effect no good.

Mr. HUBBARD said the committee had had the matter under consideration, and had not deemed it necessary to report in its favor.

Mr. DENNY was in favor of the amendment, and denied that if one bar was removed another would take place; at least it would not generally be the case. He hoped the Committee of the Whole House would not reject the appropriation because the Committee of Ways and Means had not entertained it.

Mr. CHAMBERS said this was an appropriation in which the whole West was concerned, and ought to be deemed a national work, and to be treated as such by that House. It extended over hundreds of miles, and accommodated the interest of millions. It facilitated the great chain of communication between the East and the West, which would be imperfect without the improvement of the stream from Pittsburg to the Falls of the Ohio.

Mr. LYTTLE argued in favor of the appropriation, with considerable energy, in reply to Mr. HAWES. It was recommended by the appropriate committee—the Committee on Roads and Canals—and it was grounded upon the report of a gentleman (Captain Shreve) in whom the whole country had confidence.

Mr. HARDIN gave an explanation relative to the effect produced by removing the bars; which, he contended, was generally productive of more harm than good. If he thought otherwise, he should cheerfully vote for the item; but his present convictions would lead him to oppose it.

Mr. DICKINSON addressed the Chair as follows:

I did not intend, Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. D.,) to have said one word upon the subject of this bill, but since it has been under discussion, the principle and object of it appears to me so enormous and so iniquitous, in some sense, that I feel it to be a duty I owe to my constituents, not only to oppose it, but, as far as I am able, to expose its injustice and impolicy. Here is a bill appropriating $500,000 of the public treasure, which comes from the Committee of Ways and Means as one of the standing annual appropriation bills. It professes to be for the completion of certain works, already begun, and, therefore, holds out to the community the deceitful hope that there will be some end to this branch of public expenditure, and of this system of internal improvement. How long are we, how long are the public, to be abused by such empty and unmeaning professions? Have not many of these works been just being finished ever since the oldest member of the House had a seat upon this floor? Why, sir, it takes more thousands to put the finishing stroke to some of these works, each year, than the entire original cost of some of them, according to the estimates furnished this House, and upon which they were originally sanctioned by Congress. It is clear, now, that these works never will be finished, until Congress shall cease to give any more money to be wasted upon them. The districts in which these moneys are annually expended must continue to have an expenditure of public money, or they will feel the want of it; and hence it is that these works are never to be completed. If it becomes too palpable, that, with no plausibility, could Congress be called upon for more money to complete works already begun, some new work or some addition to the old ones would soon be invented, which would be said to be indispensable to preserve or give efficiency to the old. Sir, it is not so much the work, in many cases, as it is the money which is so much sought after. The habit of getting annual appropriations from Congress in certain sections of the Union is so inveterate, that the evils of discontinuing or breaking it off would be felt as a grievance, and would, no doubt, be as much complained of as if some branch of trade or commerce which they had long enjoyed were suddenly taken away from them. This is one of the great evils of this system of improvement by this Government. It corrupts the people and begets a dependence upon the Government, in particular districts, which may become dangerous to a free expression of opinion upon other important subjects, and, of course, dangerous to our liberties.

But there is one singular feature in the nature of bills of this kind; the larger they are, or the more money they appropriate, the more certain are they to get through this House. This is a seeming paradox; at least, we know that it is one of our most important duties to guard the public treasury, and to maintain the simplicity and economy of the Government. To say that the larger the sums which are proposed to be voted away, the greater is the probability that they will pass the House, seems to be a perversion of every thing that is proper, safe, and wise in our conduct; but still, such is the fact, extraordinary at first view as it may appear; but it is not extraordinary when we look at the operation of the system of improvement, or rather this want of system. Have we forgotten in what manner the bill of the same kind, of the last session, was killed, by being laid upon the table by a large vote of this House, and then, how miraculously it was raised from the dead, on the next day? Does not every one know the nature of the combinations which must have been entered into, the preceding night, in order to effect that object. As long as there shall be no regular plan of securing to all sections of the Union their equal proportion of the public expenditures for objects of this kind, those sections which are unprovided for will oppose all appropriations of the kind: and, in order to carry through such a measure, you must include in it objects enough, and money enough, to interest the majority of the districts represented in this House; otherwise, there will always be danger that it will not carry. If there shall be no work actually demanded by the situation and wants of a sufficient number of districts, you must invent some want of the kind, and then vote money to relieve it, in order to get those along which there is a real occasion for. Thus it is that a bill appropriating a million of money for objects of this kind is more likely to pass this House than one for half that amount; and thus, the proposition first stated is not a paradox at all.

But what right have the inhabitants of the districts to which the half million contained in this bill is appropriated, to have their internal landings or lake harbors, their small rivers and creeks, improved at the public expense, any more than the people of the interior States of Tennessee and Kentucky have to call upon the Government to make their roads, or to clear out their creeks and rivers? The one improvement promotes the convenience of the country as much as the other. One of those harbors, or one of those creeks, in New York, upon which tens of thousands are expended, undoubtedly add much to the commercial convenience and advantages of its immediate neighborhood; but there is no one of them which is of general utility, and they have no better claim to nationality than the Maysville road itself, nor even as much as that road, in my opinion, though I consider the veto of the President upon the bill appropriating the money of the United States to that work as one of the most important and praiseworthy acts of his administration. Sir, it is not enough to say, in answer to this argument, that the one set of improvements belongs to our foreign commerce, and the other to our internal commerce. What advantage ought the one to have over the other, in the attention and patronage of the Government? Is not our internal trade the foundation and support of our foreign trade? Can the one flourish without the other? Why, then, should millions upon millions be applied to the improvement of the natural, and in some instances to the construction of artificial, outlets on the northern border of the United States, or upon the Atlantic coast, for the benefit of the inhabitants of those sections only, while you refuse to give one cent to improve or to create channels of commercial intercourse among the inhabitants of the interior, and in parts remote from market? If the public money is to be applied at all, why not apply it to those sections which have no means of getting to market except at such labor, and over such rugged, deep, and almost impassable roads, as to sink nearly the whole value of the article in the cost of transportation? Is there any justice in this system? Is there any equality? Do not say that Congress has power in one case, and not in the other; and thus attempt to mantle over the unjust conduct of this House, by charging a defect of constitutional provision. It is true that the constitution gives us the power to regulate foreign commerce; and I know that it is under this provision of the constitution that gentlemen say they are authorized to pass such a bill as this. But have gentlemen forgotten that Congress is also authorized, in the same clause, to regulate commerce between the several States? No, sir, this is not the true ground of the distinction. The sections where these moneys are expended have got the advantage in the established habit of receiving appropriations of this kind, and they are disposed to keep it. There was some more plausibility in the argument in their favor; there was an idea that what concerned foreign trade, and the places visited by foreign traders, was of more general interest to the country, and of less proportional interest to the districts in which they were situated, than any work in the interior of the country. Appropriations were commenced for them without much examination; and since the principle has begun, and although the reason for the preference originally given to them is admitted no longer to be solid, it is almost impossible to withhold the annual allowances. I do not blame the individual members who support this bill, as unjust and unnecessary as I think it is, so much as I do the system itself. From the very nature of its operation, no man can represent the districts in which these works are situated, unless he will vote to carry them on, nor can any man, in whose district the bait is held out, refuse to take it. Honorable members are thus compelled to give their support to a bill appropriating a million of the public treasure, because some ten or twenty thousand dollars have been artfully set down to the improvement of some harbor, river, or creek, in his own section of the country. The whole system is radically wrong, corrupting in its tendency, and ought to be abandoned, or established upon such a footing that all sections may partake of its benefits; and all the members of this House vote and act upon the questions arising out of it, independently, and without bias. What, sir, is better calculated to destroy the harmony, to create dissatisfaction, and finally a disposition to break up this Government, than to see, from year to year, millions of the public treasure—a treasure exacted from the hard earnings of the people of every section—expended, and in so many instances uselessly squandered, in some particular and favored sections of the Union, and not one cent given to certain others? How long will this state of things be submitted to? Let gentlemen reflect upon the injustice, let them ponder upon the danger, of such a course.

There is a remarkable feature in the career of some gentlemen of distinction on this floor, in relation to this subject. Always clamorous against such appropriations, and denouncing them as prodigal and unconstitutional; and yet, upon almost every other question, these gentlemen act in the strictest ties of political interest and sympathy, with that very class of members by whose votes the balance is always cast in favor of this system. How gentlemen can reconcile this course to themselves, I cannot tell. For my own part, I have contributed, as far as I have been able, upon every occasion which presented itself, my feeble efforts to keep down the expenditures of this Government, and to maintain a system of economy and simplicity in our whole financial policy. While I have the honor of a seat here I shall continue to do so. A time may come, and I hope may soon come, more propitious to the adjustment of this, as well as other great questions connected with the economical administration of the Government, than the present. I hold that the greatest danger which threatens us is, expensive and extravagant public establishments of every description, profuse and wasteful disbursements of the public revenue, a supernumerary army of public officers and contractors, high salaries, and an unquenchable thirst for office among our public men. When this is the character of the Government, and of the times, let the people look to it; for assuredly there will soon be a rapid and fatal decay of public spirit and public virtue. There will be the grossest corruption in the Government itself, and the practice of venality will be reduced to system, and become interwoven with the entire politics of the country. This danger is enough of itself; but when we consider the sense of injustice which is engendered by this system of internal improvement, in those sections which share no part of the benefits of it, where, from their constitutional opinions, they are prohibited from asking such appropriations, and when this system is such that, where money is never asked, it is never given, we ought to pause, and seriously consider of some plan more equitable in itself. We ought either to abandon it altogether, or introduce into its principles of common and equal justice. What shall it avail us if, after expending some hundreds of millions upon works of internal improvements, we shall have sown the seeds of discord, alienated one half of our country from the other, and when we are fondly dreaming of having perfected the cements of union, we shall find that, by our injustice, we shall have driven one portion of the States into opposition to the other, and that the Union itself cannot longer exist? I hope the bill will not receive the sanction of the committee.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New Hampshire, regretted the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DICKINSON] was so much opposed to the bill. In most things he concurred in the views of that gentleman; he had acted with him on most of the great questions which had recently presented themselves, and he hoped the gentleman from Tennessee would not separate himself from his old friends.

Mr. DICKINSON, in reply, said he had with pleasure acted with the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. HUBBARD,] since he had been a member of this House, and he would be pleased to be able to continue to go with him; but if that gentleman and his friends thought proper to give their support to such an unequal and unjust apportionment of the public treasure, and to objects so partially distributed; in other words, if the present system of internal improvement were to be supported by them, he must say that he could no longer act with them.

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, remarked that he had listened to the eloquent gentleman from Tennessee, as he always did, with pleasure, and he was only sorry that he had taken so incorrect a view of this subject. He was sorry to hear that gentleman avow such opinions, inasmuch as they might be supposed to be those of a party which was forming in this country. If, said Mr. S., this Government is not to have the power to execute works of internal improvement, he did not know of what value it would be. He considered this power as one of the first and best objects of Government.

Mr. DICKINSON replied that he was authorized to speak for no party; what he said was the dictate of his own private judgment, and he could only say that he greatly desired that the doctrines which he advocated might be the doctrines of the party with which he acted.

Mr. POPE made a few remarks in favor of the bill.

Mr. LANE was well acquainted with the Ohio river, but he had no constitutional scruples on the subject; for he would not give a fig for the constitution if the treasury of the nation could not be expended in promoting such works as the present. He explained what was necessary to be done in removing the bars, and denied that they would come up again. The Ohio river was, of all others in the country, the most truly national, and it was the duty of the Government to improve it.

Mr. BOON said that he had lived near the Ohio river upwards of twenty-three years, and within twelve or fifteen miles of three bars, which have presented the greatest obstruction to the passage of flat boats down the river, below the falls, as well as to the passage of steamboats both up and down the river. The circumstances mentioned by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] of a flat bottom boat or two having been injured, perhaps lost, I am not disposed to controvert. This has happened, however, when the river was some two or three feet above low-water mark. The improvement of those bars by wing-dams, is intended to improve the navigation of the river in times of low water. This, sir, I know has been done at the Scuffletown bar, as also the French Island bar; and at the bar above the mouth of Green river, the improvement at it is in a state of progress, which bids fair to result in a successful improvement of the navigation of the river at that place.

My residence near the bars which I have mentioned has given me an opportunity of knowing something of the effect which has been produced by the improvement of the navigation of the river at those points, by wing-dams. Before the improvement which has been made, I have known from twelve to fifteen steamboats, at one time, to be obstructed in their passage over those bars, to say nothing of the great number of flat boats that were obstructed in their passage down the river, before the erection of wing-dams at those bars. But now that those improvements had been made, and their utility tested, I am enabled to state that steamboats of middle size can and do pass over the Scuffletown bar at the lowest stage of water, thereby extending active facilities to the commerce carried on upon that river. I have thought it my duty to say thus much in relation to what has come under my own observation.

Mr. EWING maintained that it was not the West alone that was interested in this improvement, but the South was equally so, and every section of the Union was more or less so. It was, in his opinion, a perversion of the constitution to oppose the appropriation of the people's money for the people's good. Mr. E. proposed to amend the amendment by inserting, at the end of it, "for improving the river Wabash, $25,000."

Mr. HUBBARD submitted whether the amendment was in order, a bill having been reported providing for the same object.

Mr. EWING said the bill was not the same as his amendment, for it provided for a different amount, $30,000.

The CHAIR decided the amendment out of order, on the grounds set forth by Mr. HUBBARD.

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, produced a letter from Captain Shreve, covering a statement of the expenses of the proposed improvement, with his opinion of its propriety and expediency, &c., which was read by the Clerk, and Mr. S. supported the amendment at some length.

Mr. CHILTON hoped the discussion would be brought to an end; for this question had been argued so frequently, from session to session, that all must be well versed in it.

Mr. BURI) hoped the House would not draw an invidious distinction, by rejecting so small an appropriation for this part of the Ohio river, while so many hundreds of thousands were expended elsewhere. He believed the object within the intent and meaning of the constitution; for the means of the country could be devoted to no object more national than that of improving its rivers, which were the veins and arteries of the country.

Mr. HAWES gave an explanation with reference to his votes at the last session. He added that the communication of the engineer confirmed him in his opinion that the appropriation was unnecessary, and if made would be endless. If $20,000 were expended, it would necessarily involve an expenditure of $40,000; and as soon as $40,000 were expended, $80,000 more would be required; and so it would go on. He believed more harm than good would ensue, and he would never give his vote for destroying the navigation of this beautiful river.

Mr. LYTLE again addressed the committee in favor of the amendment, and maintained that its character was peculiarly national, and was scarcely equalled in point of importance. If, however, the issue was to be made of opposing all appropriations for improvements in the West, Mr. L. should oppose equally those in other sections of the country, which were not more national than the one now under consideration.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, said a few words on the same subject.

Mr. HARDIN was as solicitous as any gentleman could be for the improvement of the Ohio river, provided it was productive of benefit; but he was still convinced that the removal of the bars would do, as it had done heretofore, harm. When one bar was removed, generally a worse one was formed instead of it. Mr. H. contended that the West had no right to complain. By the compact, three per cent. of the produce of the public lands in Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois, were to be expended in internal improvements; but if the whole of the lands within the triangle formed by those three States were sold at the full price of a dollar and a quarter an acre, it would barely make one third of the amount already expended there upon the Cumberland road. Mr. H. entered into an explanation with reference to his course on the Portland and Louisville canal. He had voted to take up the subject, but he explained the difficulties he was under, whether he should vote for it or not, to one of his colleagues, and had he been present when the vote was taken, he intended to have asked leave to be excused from voting.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, referred to a survey made for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi, and thought the amount contemplated in the amendment might with more propriety be devoted to this subject.

Mr. VINTON desired the Clerk to read the concluding part of Captain Shreve's letter, to show the importance of the improvement.

Mr. HUBBARD little thought the bill would have brought up such a discussion. He would appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee himself [Mr. DICKINSON] to say if there was any thing constitutionally objectionable in it. Of the three hundred thousand dollars appropriated in the bill, sixty thousand were for western harbors; and the amount for new entries did not exceed twenty thousand. It, moreover, contained already $50,000 for the Ohio, Mississippi, and Missouri. It had been argued in favor of the amendment, that the Committee on Roads and Canals were for it: why, then, had they not reported a bill for the purpose? The Committee of Ways and Means could not be expected to do it. He denied that the bill was exclusively for the benefit of the seaboard; for it only appropriated $17,000 for New England. He hoped the bill would be reported as it stood.

Mr. DICKINSON, of Tennessee, again reiterated his objections to the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND rose to urge the friends of the bill not to debate it, but to act, if they did not wish to kill it. He referred to several bills which he was desirous of bringing before the committee, involving no constitutional difficulties.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was agreed to: Yeas 72, nays 54.

Mr. BARBER moved an amendment appropriating $35,000 for removing obstructions in the Thames river, Connecticut. Negatived.

Mr. PARKER proposed an amendment appropriating for the protection and scouring Flat Beach, alias Tucker's Island, Little Egg Harbor, New Jersey, $5,695 40, and sent to the Clerk's table a report of the engineer thereon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND objected to the amendment, on the principle that it was for a new work, and was now before the Committee on Commerce, to whom it had been referred by a resolution introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey himself.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BEATY moved an item of $25,000, for improving the navigation of the Cumberland river.

Mr. B. made a brief explanation in favor of the proposed appropriation, and said that he had been informed at the War Department, that the report of the engineer on the subject would be sent to the House to-morrow. The vicinity of the river contained bituminous coal, iron, coppers, and other ore, sufficient to supply the whole continent, all of which were now lying useless for want of improving the navigation of the Cumberland river.

The amendment was rejected: Ayes 49, noes not counted.

Mr. WATMOUGH proposed an item of $7,000, to remove the bar at the mouth of the Schuylkill.

Mr. POPE asked if there had been any survey.

Mr. WATMOUGH replied in the negative.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said, some four or five years ago, he had attempted to get a survey made for this very object; and the committee to which Mr. S. belonged intended to report a bill for that purpose.

Mr. WATMOUGH asked if the gentleman was opposed to the amendment; as Mr. W. wished that fact should be known elsewhere as well as in that House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND again explained. The subject was under consideration by the committee of which Mr. S. was a member, and would be reported upon in the present session.

The amendment was rejected, without a division.

Mr. MERCER moved an item for defraying the expense of surveys, pursuant to the act of 30th April, 1834, $30,000. Negatived: Ayes 65, noes 71.

Mr. HAWES proposed an amendment for the improvement of Green river, Kentucky, $25,000.

Mr. TRUMBULL moved an item of $25,000, for improvements at the mouth of the Connecticut river.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said the subject was embraced in a bill reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LYON offered an amendment for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of St. Joseph's river, in the Territory of Michigan, $10,000.

Mr. HAWES jocosely asked if the place was in Canada or in the United States.

Mr. LYON said the whole section of country in its vicinity was in the United States.

The bill having been gone through with, was now laid aside to be reported to the House.

The committee, on motion of Mr. MAY, then took up the bill to establish a surveyor general's office in Illinois.

The blanks in the bill, for salaries, were filled with $1,200 and $1,000, respectively.

Mr. KINNARD moved an amendment for a similar office in Indiana, and supported it with earnestness; but it failed.

The bill was then laid aside.

The committee then, on motion of Mr. POLK, took up the

INDIAN ANNUITIES BILL,

Which received a few minor amendments, suggested by Mr. POLK and Mr. LOVE.

Mr. ASHLEY moved a general amendment, providing that the annuities should be paid to the chiefs, and, in presence of the agents, should be distributed among the Indians of the respective tribes.

He called for the reading of a memorial from the Fox Indians, remonstrating against the present mode of payment.

Mr. H. EVERETT opposed the amendment as unnecessary, the case being provided for by law.

Mr. ASHLEY replied, and insisted that this was the only way to secure the Indians in receiving their money, which might else be diverted by the chiefs.

The amendment did not prevail.

The bill having been gone through,

Mr. CORWIN, of Ohio, moved to take up the bill for the Cumberland road.

Mr. LYON remonstrated, and preferred the bill from the Senate for the same object, because it contained appropriations for certain roads in Michigan.

The committee, however, without taking up either bill, rose and reported to the House the bills which it had disposed of; and, thereupon,

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 24.

PUNISHMENT OF CRIME.

Mr. BEARDSLEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the Senate bill amendatory of the acts for the punishment of certain offences against the United States, without amendment; which was read twice, and, after some explanations from Mr. BEARDSLEY, Mr. BINNEY, and Mr. FOSTER, was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. PHILLIPS expressed a wish to examine the bill before its final passage, and it was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That on Wednesday morning, after reading the journals and receiving reports from committees, this House will appropriate one hour to the consideration of the following bills:

A bill to render permanent the present mode of supplying the army of the United States;

A bill respecting the appointment of three additional paymasters;

A bill respecting the topographical corps; and

A bill respecting the corps of engineers.

Mr. JOHNSON explained the object of the resolution, and after some conversation, in which Messrs. FILLMORE, ASHLEY, E. WHITTLESEY, and WHITE, of Florida, took part, the resolution was agreed to.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, by consent, moved to print three thousand extra copies of the documents prepared by Mr. E. EVERETT and himself; the one in favor and the other adverse to the bill from the Senate making an appropriation to satisfy the claims of certain American citizens, on account of spoliations committed by the French prior to 1800.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to suspend the rule requiring the motion to lie over one day; which carried: Yeas 110, nays 38.

The motion to print was then agreed to.

Light-Boats, Beacons, &c.—Marine Hospitals.

[FEB. 24, 1835.]

Mr. CONNOR remarked that the House had heretofore determined to hold a session this evening at six o'clock. It was proper that there should be a recess, and he therefore moved that the House should adjourn at four, to meet again at six o'clock, P. M.

Mr. C. P. WHITE moved to amend the motion by proposing a recess from four to six o'clock, P. M. each day, for the remainder of the session; which was disagreed to: Yeas 61, nays not counted.

Mr. MARSHALL proposed a recess from three to five o'clock. Lost, 69 to 72.

Mr. CONNOR'S motion was then agreed to.

Mr. C. P. WHITE called for the orders of the day. Agreed to.

Mr. C. P. WHITE then moved to suspend the rule, for the purpose of going into committee, with the view of considering such bills as might be determined on by the committee; which was agreed to: Yeas 134, nays 29.

The House then, on motion of Mr. C. P. WHITE, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WARDWELL in the chair.)

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, the committee took up the bill making appropriations for building light-boats, beacons, and monuments, and placing buoys, for the year 1835.

The bill was taken up by sections.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved to strike out the item of $400 for the erection of a fog-bell on Cape Elizabeth, Maine. Agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND also moved to insert $1,000 instead of $700, for placing buoys near Lynn, Lobster's rock, Western rocks, Sawyer's river, &c., Massachusetts. Agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND also moved an item of $400, for buoys in New Jersey. Agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND also moved an additional item for placing six buoys on the Potomac river, $250, and a spindle at Potomac creek, $500. Agreed to.

Mr. PINCKNEY moved an amendment of $5,000, for five beacon lights at Charleston harbor, in lieu of the clause appropriating $750 for three buoys in the north channel in said harbor. Agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved an additional item of $3,000, for improvements at the mouth of Portland harbor. Agreed to.

Sundry other amendments were also agreed to.

The bill, with amendments, was then ordered to be reported to the House.

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the committee took up the bill making appropriations for certain roads, and for examinations and surveys, for the year 1835.

Mr. CORWIN moved to strike out the clause appropriating $346,086 for the repair of the Cumberland road. Agreed to.

Mr. CORWIN also moved an additional item of $320, for one of the superintendents on the Cumberland road. Agreed to.

Mr. LYON moved an additional clause of $10,000, for certain surveys and improvements in the military road from Mackinaw to Green Bay, &c.

Mr. MERCER opposed the appropriation.

The amendment was rejected. The bill was then laid aside.

The bill making appropriations for the erection of marine hospitals, in the city of Baltimore and other places, being next taken up,

Mr. McKIM moved an amendment, providing that the site for the hospital at Baltimore be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury; which was agreed to.

Mr. MERCER protested against the policy of multiplying hospitals all over the country, and thereby increasing the patronage of the Executive to an indefinite extent. In England there were, he believed, but two hospitals; one at Chelsea, and another at Greenwich.

Mr. HARDIN said he had seen no estimate of the cost and expenses of these hospitals. One at Louisville, established by the State of Kentucky and individuals, cost forty or fifty thousand dollars, and several thousand dollars a year to maintain it.

Mr. POPE thought this was one of the most exceptionable and extraordinary bills ever brought before the House. He thought it would be better to furnish and support the hospitals already erected, than to erect new ones.

Mr. DENNY advocated the bill, and spoke in favor of the erection of hospitals on the Western waters, where the steamboat travelling, and the danger from cholera, was so great. The captains of the boats were now compelled to set apart a portion of the boat for the sick; for it was impossible to get them suitable accommodations on shore. The time had come, he thought, when it was necessary to make appropriations for hospitals on the Western waters.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, advocated the principle of the bill generally, and explained, especially, the necessity of the erection of an hospital at City Point, Virginia, the localities of which place he fully explained. He stated that all the other establishments proposed in the bill had been well considered, and were highly necessary. He adverted to a petition from ship-masters and owners, concerned in the coasting trade to Petersburg and Richmond.

Mr. PEARCE, who had reported the bill, replied to the objections of Mr. MASON: adverted to the fact that the bill had passed at the last session, but had failed in the Senate for want of time. The establishment at Louisville was not strictly a marine hospital, or a pest house, but an establishment for the sick generally. He explained and defended the provision for an hospital in Illinois, to receive the sick hands and passengers landed from steamboats.

Mr. SEVIER advocated the propriety of the proposed hospital at the mouth of the Arkansas river. Persons sick with the cholera and yellow fever were every year landed on the coasts of that Territory, and thrown on the charity of the inhabitants.

Mr. BURGESS regretted there was no report to show how the marine hospital fund had been applied. He gave the history of a memorial from Rhode Island for the appropriation of $5,000 for an hospital at Providence, when there was a large surplus fund. The money was appropriated, but the design had failed by the money being improperly withheld. Yet now there was an item for an hospital at Newport, though no petition for such a thing had ever been presented to the House. He complained of such a course, and expressed his desire for a general report from the Committee on Commerce on the need of the different parts of the Union for establishments of this kind.

Mr. LYTLE offered an amendment proposing the application of $10,000 to the increasing of the buildings at the marine hospital at Cincinnati; but it was declared to be, at present, out of order.

Mr. REYNOLDS defended the propriety of the erection of an hospital in Illinois.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, supported the item for an hospital at the mouth of the Arkansas river with earnestness, but, as he turned entirely from the reporters, his remarks could not be heard.

FEB. 24, 1835.]

Marine Hospitals.

Mr. PEARCE replied to the remarks of Mr. BURGESS, and vindicated himself from the charge of improper management, which seemed implied in what his colleague had said. He went into a history of the Providence memorial, which he said had been suffered to sleep by his colleague, until after the present bill had been reported. The appropriation for Newport did not interfere with the object of his colleague. There had been a surplus at Providence, because but few sailors were there; while at Newport all the fund was exhausted by the perpetual necessities of the sailors of all nations, who came there often while Providence was blockaded by ice. Places where surpluses accumulated were not the places which most needed an hospital. There was no surplus at New York or Norfolk, and all the Southern ports. Hospitals were most needed where there were most sick. Instead of being no memorials, there had been three, at least, in favor of Newport. That being the out-port, and open while Providence was shut by ice, the hospital was most needed there.

Mr. BURGESS moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, and then replied to Mr. PEARCE, and defended his own course in respect to the Providence memorial.

Mr. POPE opposed the erection of an hospital at the mouth of the Ohio, in Illinois, because there was already one at Smithland, only 60 miles above. That at Louisville was strictly and exclusively a marine hospital, and not for general purposes, as had been represented.

Mr. REYNOLDS remarked that he would sustain the bill as far as he was able, and vote for the establishment of several hospitals on the Western waters. He would vote for the hospital at the mouth of the Arkansas, and other places in the West, as well as for those on the Atlantic coast. He said he did not rise so much to make a speech as to make a statement of facts, many of which came under his own observation. He would not occupy a long time of the committee, as the time was important; but the establishment of an hospital at or near the mouth of the Ohio was also of vast importance to the community in general, and to the people in that section of his district in Illinois where it is to be located.

The committee, Mr. Chairman, will, at the first glance, see that the mouth of the Ohio river is a central and important point in the establishment of these hospitals in the West; nevertheless, this would not make him vote against others on the waters of the Mississippi. The mouth of the Ohio river is almost the mid-way between Pittsburg and New Orleans; and the same may be said of it in regard to the extent of the navigation up the Mississippi and Missouri rivers. This point, therefore, may be considered central in the navigation of the whole extended valley of the Mississippi. On an examination of the country, or the maps of the West, it will be seen that all the large tributary streams of the Mississippi converge towards this point, and make it more central for such an institution than any other point west of the Alleghany mountains. These are facts that are before the committee. They cannot be denied, and will, of course, have the proper consideration with the committee. Every member will readily recognise that almost one half of all the States of this confederacy are less or more interested directly in the navigation of these rivers. Some States, and those too the most flourishing, are entirely located at the Western waters; others are partially so, and all are, in proportion to their location and commerce, interested in the trade and business done on these rivers. These commercial transactions increase in proportion to the increase and wealth of the population of the Western country. There is more business done in each succeeding year, than in the previous; and, if he may be allowed to predict, he would say that the business, importance, and prosperity of the valley of the Mississippi, would not be stationary, but increase and prosper, until that valley would present to the world a population of millions of freemen, enjoying more natural advantages, and more happiness, than is allotted to the human family on any other portion of this globe. From these facts, it will be readily perceived that there are at this time, and will increase, a vast number of voyagers or sailors engaged on these waters. This class of the community is not the most wealthy, but they are worthy, and deserve the kind consideration of the Government. It is on them, in a great degree, that depends all this commerce and extensive business. It is on their labor that the prosperity and wealth of the country, in a great measure, must be founded. They are not only often without the means of supporting themselves, but are also in even a worse situation, without friends or relatives; so much so, that it seemed to Mr. R. that the Government was bound to take care of their interest and welfare. But my friend [Mr. MERRICK] from Virginia seemed to say, in his remarks, that such provision or hospitals should be made only for the sailors who navigated the main ocean.

Mr. R. observed that the same reason and the same principles of humanity would apply as well to the sailor who became sick navigating the fresh waters, as to him who got sick on the ocean. A sailor who contracted sickness navigating the ocean to London, had no more claim on his country than one navigating the Mississippi river to New Orleans. The humane principles of the members of this committee, Mr. R. hoped, would not be confined to the ocean more than to a river. He was willing to relieve the distressed in all situations, where it was right and proper to do so. His humanity was the same on fresh as on salt water. Mr. R. said he would present to the consideration of the committee another fact, that would show the necessity of the establishment of an hospital at or near the mouth of the Ohio more than any other point in the West. During a certain season of the year, a great number of the largest steamboats, some ten, fifteen, or more, in number, are frequently stationed at this point for some months of the most sickly part of the year. The boats cannot ascend the Ohio river in low water above this point, and the trade in the lower Mississippi is generally suspended for a few weeks or months, and by these means hundreds and hundreds of these sailors will crowd together at this point, without any place in which to accommodate so many, even of the healthy, much less the sick. All that have navigated the river at this season of the year will testify to the fact above stated. They will also testify to the fact, as Mr. R. said he had seen, of the sick being exposed on the shores of the river without any accommodation necessary for them. He said he might be permitted to add, in this place, that the citizens of Illinois in this section of country were not wealthy, and many of them had not the means, although they possessed the good will, to provide the necessities and comforts suited to the case, often, of malignant disease. There were no people on earth more generous and hospitable than the citizens of Illinois are to the sick and distressed; but good feelings, without the means to carry those kind sentiments into operation, could not relieve the afflicted sailor. In many cases the diseases were contagious. Sailors navigating all parts of the West, and to New Orleans, were always in danger of contracting such contagious and infectious diseases as would forbid the idea of the citizens taking them into their private families. This could not be expected. Every individual would preserve the health of his family at the hazard of every thing else. It is almost useless to remind this committee that the small pox, the cholera, and other diseases of an infectious and contagious character, always prevail the most on those rivers, and with those that navigate them.

H. or R.]

Marine Hospitals.

These facts being presented to the committee, and this view of the case being also before them, that humanity, which is in the breast of every man, will, he had no doubt, prevail in this case, and influence the committee to sustain in the bill the establishment of an hospital at or near the mouth of the Ohio river. It is so equitable, and so just withal, that he confided in the committee, he said, with that firm reliance which is founded on principle and humanity, that this hospital, with others in the bill, would be sustained. But the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PORS] raised objections particularly to the establishment of an hospital at or near the mouth of the Ohio. He said that the State of Kentucky had established one at Smithland, within sixty miles of the mouth of the Ohio; and that he intended, at a proper time, to offer an amendment for an appropriation for the hospital that is already erected at Louisville, Kentucky.

Mr. R. remarked, to these objections, that he was satisfied from the expressions of the gentleman, [Mr. PORS], that he entertained no hostility to Mr. R. or to the section of country in which the hospital was to be erected. These considerations, if they existed, would not influence any honorable member from a proper course; but he had no doubt that they did not exist on this occasion. Mr. R. supposed that the gentleman [Mr. PORS] considered it his duty to add to, and build up still more, the splendid and magnificent city of Louisville, and also to accommodate the sick there. Smithland is also, by the gentleman's mode of reasoning, to be crowned with an appropriation of twenty-five thousand dollars for her hospital; and because we, at the mouth of the Ohio, are located within sixty miles of the great city of Smithland, where there is a little State hospital, we must be almost disfranchised, and deprived to a certain extent of the privileges and blessings enjoyed by other sections of the country. The wealth of the State of Kentucky, and particularly the wealth and commercial standing of Louisville, would be a strong argument to convince the committee that at this point the citizens themselves would establish hospitals commensurate to the demand. But, at the mouth of the Ohio, we are not able; we have the good will, but not the ability. The city of Louisville is prospering and healthy. Mr. R. said he was proud of its wealth, prosperity, and splendor; but this wealth was in a great degree made by the labor and sweat of those sailors who navigate the Western waters. And is it not right for some of this wealth to be expended to take care and accommodate the sick, who assisted to make it? Mr. R. observed that it appeared so strange to him to make such objections, that it was difficult to believe the gentleman was in good earnest. We, in Illinois, are proud to be a neighbor to the generous, and, he might add, humane State of Kentucky; but he hoped that our nearness to her would not be turned to our disadvantage, and our hospitality destroyed by it. Our good feelings which we entertain for Kentucky, nor our juxtaposition to her, will never make us desert a high-minded and generous course towards her.

Mr. R. concluded by remarking that, knowing the necessities of the country for an hospital at or near the mouth of the Ohio so well as he did, and knowing that it would be the means of not only relieving the sick and the distressed sailor, but in many instances of preventing the destruction of human life, he did not believe that the humane feelings that existed in the breasts of the members of this committee would allow them to abandon this hospital, and permit the poor and friendless sailor to perish on the shores of our rivers, without such accommodation as Congress can bestow on them without feeling it.

Mr. REED observed that he regretted that the bill before the House, making provision for the erection of several marine hospitals, had not been accompanied with a report. The subject was an important one, and deserved mature consideration. It might not be known to all the members of this House, that every seaman was required by law to pay 20 cents per month ($2 40 per year) into the treasury of the United States, as a fund to support sick and disabled seamen. This sum, for poor men, is a severe tax, and should be expended for their benefit justly and impartially.

I have had the honor, said Mr. R., to present a memorial from the merchants and others of New Bedford, requesting that some provision may be made in their behalf for the support of sick and disabled seamen. I perceive no provision in the bill on their behalf. It should be remembered that there are but three or four cities in the United States which have more tonnage and seamen than New Bedford. No provision is made for the other collection districts of those I represent. All have contributed largely to the general fund, but have received very little. The district I represent has contributed according to the report before us:

		Paid.	Received.
Barnstable,	-	$24,835	$1,441
Edgartown,	-	8,914	1,116
Nantucket,	-	7,076	78
New Bedford,	-	17,046	472
		$57,871	$3,107

Yes, sir, they have contributed nearly fifty-eight thousand dollars, and received there little more than three thousand dollars.

On a proper occasion, I shall propose amendments making provision for New Bedford and Holmes's Hole, for whom I have presented memorials, and who are, in my opinion, entitled to the provisions of the bill as well as other places. I agree with the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. PEARCE] that we are not to be governed wholly by the amount paid. I agree that provision at the South, where sickness prevails, should be made to a much greater extent than at the North. But the amount of money paid shows the number of seamen and amount of navigation. Take one half of the money paid at the North, and carry it to the South, if that be deemed expedient, and I will not complain. But no reason can be given why, in the great and rich cities of the North and favored places, much more should be expended than is collected, while large sums are taken from less towns, without making provision there to support those who may need assistance, although they may have contributed all their lifetime to the fund. The whole system is defective; it needs reform. I have endeavored for years past to effect it. In my opinion, the best course we can now take is to abandon the bill before us, and call upon the Secretary of the Treasury to present to Congress, at their next session, all the information he has in his possession in relation to sick and disabled seamen, and to state what provision may be necessary and expedient for Congress to make for them, and the mode, in his opinion, best calculated to effect their relief. If no other gentleman offer such a resolution, I will endeavor to do it.

Mr. WISE objected to the bill on the same ground: there was no marine hospital at New Orleans, while they were sprinkled liberally in the remote interior.

[Mr. PEARCE explained how it happened that New Orleans was omitted; no application had been made to the committee for that port in time.]

Mr. WISE resumed, and argued from the explanation that the bill must have been most loosely drawn. The House had not the requisite information for its action. He was in favor of the motion to strike out. He was opposed even to the establishment at City Point; because the vessels which went there passed in sight of a noble hospital on the way up the river, while such ports as New Orleans and Baltimore were unprovided for. The sea dogs on the coast were very differently situated from the boatmen on the rivers. It might as well be proposed to provide hospitals for the Western hog drovers.

Mr. HAWES said he would not give twenty Western hog drovers for every man in the gentleman's district. Mr. MASON replied and explained.

Mr. BURGESS withdrew his motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND warmly advocated the appropriation for the mouth of the Arkansas. He eulogized the people of the West, and insisted on their claims to humanity, especially as most exposed to disease in the sickly ports at the South. As to a report, there was one on his table from the Department. If gentlemen wanted a report, they had one—nay, two—which stated all the hospitals and their locations.

Mr. VINTON warmly remonstrated on the consumption of time and the press of business. He moved for the rising of the committee, to report the bills already disposed of.

The motion prevailed: Ayes 75, noes 46.

The committee thereupon rose, and reported the bills acted upon.

Various bills reported yesterday, from the Committee of the Whole, were ordered to their engrossment for a third reading.

THE LIGHTHOUSE BILL,

With its numerous amendments, was taken up, the amendments concurred in, and the bill then ordered to its third reading.

THE HARBOR BILL

Was in like manner considered; the amendments being considered in order.

Mr. HAWES opposed the concurrence in the item of $50,000 for the improvement of the river between Pittsburgh and the falls, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. POLK earnestly joined in the opposition, as unnecessary, since the usual annual appropriation for the Ohio, Mississippi, and Missouri, was already in the bill.

Mr. LANE advocated the amendment, and dwelt on the beneficial effect of such an appropriation. He described the obstructions in the river, and stated the facility of their removal. He dwelt on the great and growing amount of commerce on this part of the Ohio river, and he appealed to the pride and justice of the West.

Mr. VINTON, who had moved the item, replied to Mr. POLK, showing that the money appropriated in the bill would all go to the Mississippi and the Southern rivers; and the Ohio would, in fact, get nothing. There were items for the Arkansas and the Red rivers, though as much commerce passed the Ohio in a week as did over those rivers in a year.

Mr. HUBBARD said that, if no part of the money had been applied to the Ohio, it was very improper in the agent.

Mr. VINTON explained. Mr. Shreve reported that it would not be in his power to do any thing on the Ohio above the falls; nor would any thing be done there for years to come.

Mr. HUBBARD resumed, and opposed the amendment as breaking through the rule of confining the appropriations to what had been recommended by the Department and the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MERCER remonstrated with severity on this principle. For what did the House sit, if they were only to pass what the committees chose to report, or the Departments to recommend? He recognised no such authority. Mr. M. contended for the propriety of the amendment; and dwelt on the importance of the Ohio as a channel of communication through a most important part of the Union.

Mr. DENNY said the amendment had the sanction of a standing committee of the House, (that on Roads and Canals,) whose authority was quite as binding as that of the Committee of Ways and Means. The House had in other cases exceeded the amount fixed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. POLK] as the limit for its action; and why not now? He appealed to the House whether $50,000 was sufficient for these three rivers, when it had first been intended for the Ohio alone.

Mr. VANDERPOEL inquired whether the Committee on Roads and Canals had directed this amendment to be proposed.

Mr. VINTON replied in the affirmative; and explained why the committee had not reported a separate bill.

Mr. POLK went into the origin of the item of $50,000 in the bill for the Ohio, Mississippi, and Missouri rivers. The Committee on Roads and Canals had had no communication with the Secretary of War on the subject; they relied only on a report of Mr. Shreve.

Mr. VINTON interposed and explained, and said that Mr. Shreve's report referred only to that part of the river below the falls; this item was for the river above the falls.

Mr. POLK resumed, and strenuously opposed the amendment, and remonstrated against the great augmentation of appropriation bills, and the subsequent charge on the administration of comparative extravagance. He admitted the importance of the river, and disclaimed the doctrine that the House was bound by the recommendation of a committee; but there ought to be strong reasons for exceeding the estimates.

Mr. LYTLE replied to Mr. POLK, denying that it was a common practice to pass bills just as they came from the Committee of Ways and Means. He had the most profound respect for the Committee of Ways and Means, for their astuteness, learning, and skill; but still, there were some other committees for whom he cherished almost the same respect. He would regard the recommendation of the Committee on Roads and Canals quite as much as that of any Department. It possessed better means of knowledge, and quite as much authority over the action of the House. Mr. L. adverted to the intrinsic importance of the object; and said he should always advocate a measure on that ground, notwithstanding the omnipotent voice of the learned Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BURGESS took the same ground, and protested against any committee's assuming to tell the House what it must do. All the committees of the House stood on the same ground, and he should regard the recommendation of one as much as of another. All New England was concerned in the navigation of the Ohio river; it was the property of the whole country. He adverted to the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States. The distinction between foreign and domestic commerce, as to a constitutional power, was a mere political contrivance, and he hoped it would speedily be abolished.

Mr. HUBBARD defended the course of the Committee of Ways and Means, and replied to Mr. BURGESS, denying any thing like a claim on the part of that committee to any power over the House. The bill before the House was for carrying on works already begun; but the amendment was virtually a new scheme, and should have been placed in a distinct bill. Why the gentlemen from Rhode Island and Ohio should cast abuse on the Committee of Ways and Means, he knew not. If this amendment was sanctioned, what was to close the door against as many more projects as gentlemen might choose to propose?

Mr. STEWART denied that the amendment was any new project. It was for a work ordered in 1824, to improve the Ohio up to Pittsburg. The law was eleven years old, yet nothing had been done on the six hundred miles above the falls.

Mr. DICKINSON thought the amendment the most important in the bill, but he should vote against it. He moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

On this motion Mr. PEYTON demanded the yeas and nays; whereupon Mr. DICKINSON withdrew his amendment.

The question was then put on the amendment, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 109, nays 86.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DICKINSON now renewed his motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, on the ground that the whole system was wrong.

Mr. HUBBARD demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. HARD moved to adjourn.

Mr. GORDON moved a call of the House; but it was refused.

The yeas and nays were then taken on striking out the enacting clause of the bill, and resulted as follows: Yeas 56, nays 128.

So the motion to reject the bill was negatived.

The House then, according to order, took a recess till six o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The House, according to order, reassembled at six o'clock, P. M.

POST ROUTES.

On motion of Mr. CONNOR, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the "bill to establish certain post roads, and to alter and discontinue others, and for other purposes."

Numerous amendments were offered, few of which found favor with the committee, and most of which were promptly negatived.

The evening was far spent, and the committee had made its way on to the twentieth page of the bill, when

Mr. H. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved to amend the bill by inserting a provision by which it should be made "the duty of the Postmaster General to enter into contracts for carrying the daily mail between Mobile and New Orleans."

An angry debate ensued, of which, from the lateness of the hour and the confusion attendant on an evening session, the reporter can give merely a general outline.

Amongst other members, the amendment was strenuously opposed by Mr. BEARDSLEY, who insisted on the impolicy of establishing any new routes at all in the present embarrassed condition of the Post Office; and who, in adverting to that embarrassment, and to the strange difficulties in which the Department found itself involved, took occasion to allude to the Postmaster General as having been "liberal to a fault, and, he might almost say, beyond a fault."

After some objections from Messrs. WISE, SEABORN JONES, and others,

Mr. PEYTON, in remarks of some length, called upon the honorable member from New York [Mr. BEARDSLEY] to declare to the House what was the latent meaning of the language he had used towards the Postmaster General, when he stated that "he was liberal to a fault, and, he might almost say, beyond a fault."

In claiming this explanation, Mr. P. said that this was not the proper opportunity for gentlemen to drag forward the conduct of the Postmaster General, nor to show their patriotism at his expense, if they were desirous to do so. He had once thought that that officer had some sincere friends, but he began to think that they were fast falling away. Did the honorable member from New York intend to say, or to insinuate, that the Postmaster General had connived at a dishonorable expenditure of the public money, or that, to gratify particular men, interests, or objects, he had stepped aside from the plain and open path of honesty? If the honorable member did intend to say so, he (Mr. P.) denied the assertion, and he wished to have an avowal or disavowal of the imputation. He expressed his astonishment at the new-born zeal which had been growing up for the last three, four, five, or six weeks, (not longer,) in respect to the Postmaster—a zeal which seemed inclined to make an attack upon the character and conduct of that individual. He (Mr. P.) disliked side-thrusts of all descriptions, even though not probably intended. For his own part, he must say that he believed the Postmaster General to be pure, honest, and patriotic, and withal as honorable a man as God had ever made.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said, that if the honorable members who had found fault with his expression, [Mr. WISE and Mr. PERRY,] had heard and comprehended what he had said, and had known and appreciated his feelings on the subject, (feelings, the only object of which was to do justice to the Postmaster General, and to all public functionaries as well as private individuals,) he was sure they would not have fallen into the error which they had committed in regard to his motive, and still less would they have indulged in the strain of censure which had characterized their observations.

He did not distinctly understand what the gentlemen themselves had meant. Was it censuring a man, or imputing a crime to him, to say that he had been "generous to a fault, and almost beyond a fault?" Did those gentlemen sincerely believe that the force of this language imputed a criminal design, or that the person who had made use of it entertained any such opinion? He dismissed the thought. The honorable members ought to have known him and the subject better than to believe him capable of remarks pointing to a criminal intention in the mind of the Postmaster General. With all his faults, (and who was without them?) he (Mr. B.) repeated that the Postmaster had been generous and confiding, immeasurably so; but he was as ready now as ever he had been to bear testimony to the purity and uprightness of that officer. He made this declaration, because he believed it to be the truth, and not because the honorable members had chosen to put an interrogatory to him. But as to asserting that the Postmaster had not confided in others, to such an extent as that the Department had fallen into great derangement—why, he would say nothing about it. He merely desired that, neither here nor elsewhere, should any conclusions be drawn from his language, which it never was intended to warrant.

Mr. B. again alluded to the inexpediency of passing such a bill in the present condition of Post Office affairs, and said that, at a proper season, he proposed to offer for the consideration of the House an additional section, providing that none of these routes should be followed up until the finances of the Department were again in a disembarrassed condition.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON, of Maryland, was understood to inquire from the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, [Mr. CONNOR,] what would be the probable expense to the Department of carrying these routes through.

Mr. CONNOR was understood, in reply, to state that he could not distinctly say what the expense would be, but he thought about $50,000.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON proceeded to express his entire disapprobation of the bill, in every shape and form. The Department was in a state of absolute bankruptcy.

He would now express his conviction, upon this floor, that that Department was corrupt from head to foot, through and through; and for the Postmaster General, he believed him to be as culpable as any officer under his control.

Mr. GARLAND called to order.

The CHAIR said the gentleman was certainly wandering a little from the direct line of the debate; he must confine his remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON continued. He would endeavor to do so, and if his observations should annoy any honorable members, he could not help that. His only desire was to speak his sentiments frankly; he hoped he spoke them understandingly. He knew his responsibility to members of this House; he also knew his responsibility to the House itself; and he should, on all occasions, yield with respect to the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. J. said that he found the bill under discussion when he entered the hall, and had glanced his eye through it, but had seen enough to convince his judgment that, in a bill of near thirty pages of post routes, fifty thousand dollars was a sum totally incommensurate to carry all the routes contemplated into operation. He could not speak advisedly, but he would hazard the opinion that five hundred thousand dollars would be an amount not too exorbitant to effect the purposes of this bill. He had seen, in looking hastily through the bill, all the States, save Maryland and one or two others, most bountifully supplied with new mail routes. If this is to be a system of general accommodation, or of particular and careful arrangement, he was at a loss to know why these States were excluded from the general or partial benefits of new mail routes. But whether his own State was included or omitted, he was still against the bill. According to the opinion of the honorable chairman of the committee, an increased expenditure is necessary; and not a dollar is asked in the bill to give the Department the means of doing what you would enjoin upon it; and this at a time when the Department is notoriously bankrupt, by squandering the public money with favorites and electioneering partisans. His objection was not to the bill in detail, but to the bill in the aggregate. It was calculated to increase the expenditure and patronage of the Government, at a time when it was corrupt enough from one end to the other, from the Postmaster General down to the most subordinate officer in the service. He made this declaration because he believed it, and because he had data and facts to sustain the belief. He moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, and asked for the appointment of tellers on the motion.

Mr. HAWES agreed with the honorable member from Maryland as to the propriety of striking out the enacting clause, in this and every other similar bill, until such time as the Department should have funds to carry on the routes. He believed that the routes contained in this bill would add an expenditure to the already exhausted treasury of the Department, of full three hundred thousand dollars. But there was one point on which he differed from the honorable member, and he hoped that, on consideration, the gentleman would withdraw the assertion he had made. If, continued Mr. H., I understood him correctly, he gave it as his opinion that the Department was corrupt, from the Postmaster down to the lowest officer in the service. Did I understand him correctly?

[Mr. W. C. JOHNSON. You did, sir.]

Mr. HAWES continued. This was, indeed, a broad and sweeping assertion, to go forth to the people of the United States, from this House, that one of the highest officers in the Government had been corrupt in the discharge of his duty. He (Mr. H.) had been one of those who, for months past, had been engaged in the investigation of the Post Office affairs, and although he believed, with the member from New York, that the Postmaster General had been too liberal and confiding, that he had involved the Department in unnecessary expenditure, and had brought unnecessary and improper burdens upon it, yet he would say, because he believed it to be the fact, and because there was not one iota of testimony before the committee to disprove or qualify the assertion, that he believed the Postmaster General to be as pure, as honest, as honorable, and high-minded a gentleman as any individual who had the privilege of a seat on this floor. He would ask the honorable member from Maryland, he would ask every member of the committee, if they could point to one shadow of a transaction, or to one solitary scratch of a pen, which contained any thing that could throw a breath of suspicion upon this officer as a just and honorable man. He denied it, and he called upon the honorable member from Maryland to declare upon what grounds he had asserted corruption.

He was sorry to see that the members from Virginia and Tennessee [Messrs. WISE and PARROTT] had indulged in such remarks as had fallen from them in reply to the observation of the member from New York. For himself, he believed it to be the part of a true friend to tell a man of his faults; and he thought that the member from New York had acted in that capacity, when he had proclaimed that the Postmaster General had been too confiding and liberal, that he had listened too easily to the solicitations of members on this floor, and of the people in different parts of the country. Undoubtedly such was the fact.

[Mr. WISE offered some explanations in reference to remarks he had made on the expression which had fallen from Mr. BEARDSLEY. He thought, probably, that the House did not exactly understand the part he had taken. It was well known that he had not been considered a personal friend to the Postmaster. He condemned that officer, not for political malfeasance, but for political mismanagement; and to that extent to which both the reports had condemned him. He had never heard, either from friend or foe, that the integrity of the Postmaster had been impeached, until he heard it from the member from Maryland. He had said what he did, because he thought that the observations of the member from New York needed an explanation, and he was desirous to give him the opportunity of making it. He thought that something more of culpability was intended than it appeared there had been, and he wished to understand directly from the gentleman whether there was any design to impeach the motives of the Postmaster. The remark had struck his mind, as it appeared to have struck the minds of other members, and all he sought was to know the true intent of the language which had been applied. He was glad, moreover, to express his dissent from the opinion which had been expressed by the member from Maryland.]

Mr. HAWES continued. He would again repeat that it was the part of a true friend to tell a man fairly and openly of his faults, and any man who would rise upon this floor or elsewhere, and say that the Postmaster had not been guilty of faults, was no true friend to him. He thought that the member from New York was discharging one of the very best acts of friendship, when he made the declaration he did. The land from which the Postmaster came was not the land of dishonest men; and if it were, that officer was one of the last men on the face of the earth whom any gentleman had a right to charge with dishonesty. He made this declaration on a knowledge of his character, for he had known him for years, and, during some part of the time, intimately. It was true the Postmaster had been an unfortunate man; it had been his fate to go through life almost in poverty; and there could be adduced no stronger proof of his honesty than the fact that, with all his reverses, and whilst others were wallowing in millions, he had never closed his ear to the poor man's wants. He would repeat that, although the Postmaster had brought deep embarrassment on the Department, and had involved it in trouble, almost in ruin, there could be found no charge of dishonesty or corruption against him, and that he was as honest and honorable a man as any that had a seat on this floor. He again called on the member from Maryland to give the grounds on which his charge had been founded.

Post Routes.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON said that, having been called upon so repeatedly to assign the grounds upon which he had founded his assertion, he rose for the purpose of doing so. He had not felt disposed to interrupt the honorable member from Kentucky in his observations; but he would take this occasion to say, once for all, that although he did not in the least doubt the sincerity of the gentleman's opinions, that the Postmaster General was an honest, high-minded, and honorable man; at the same time he did not retract the sentiment which he had expressed a few moments before. On the contrary, he repeated that he believed there was corruption from beginning to end, from head to foot, from the highest to the lowest officer in the Department. He did not intend, by this assertion, to criminate every individual separately; he spoke of the Department in the aggregate. He had been asked for the data on which he had formed his opinion. He would give data. [Mr. J. was here understood to allude to the vote of the Senate at the last session of Congress, pronouncing an opinion that the Department, not its tools, or its subordinate officers only, but that the Department, had violated the constitution and laws by unauthorized loans and extra allowances.]

Have not two voluminous reports been made to Congress by their committees, carefully and laboriously investigating the administration of that Department; and have they not exhibited a mass of evidence and proof of the mal-administration of that Department which has astounded and surprised the moral sense of the nation? Yes; party influence, with all its considerations, could not prevent the committee of this House, though friendly to the administration, to close their eyes to facts, or to deafen their ears to the truth, and they were compelled, by the high and paramount duty which they owed to their country, to proclaim that that Department had been badly conducted, and merited the strongest censure. This, too, after a vote last winter by which a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature had resolved, with singular unanimity, that this Department had violated the constitution and the law. Facts enough are on record to justify him in the conclusion he had arrived at; and, sir, if the partial and limited investigation which has been had has disclosed so many frightful spectacles of abuses in this Department, what, he would ask, would be the true picture, if it could be probed thoroughly from centre to extremity, and the whole truth laid before the nation?

Were we to be told (Mr. J. asked) that these things were done by a subordinate officer, and that the head of the whole Department was free from blame? He, for one, held the head of the Department to be the responsible man. He looked upon him as the guilty individual; and to say that he was not the responsible man would be to shrink from the plain path of our duty. Were members to be frightened from their purpose, were they to be driven from the honest expression of their opinions, when corruption, deep and rank, was stalking abroad, which every man might gaze upon, and which no man could deny? He would say that the head of a Department, when he knew that such corruption existed, and refused to remove individuals who might have caused it, was himself accessory to the corruption, and, therefore, criminal. No honorable man could deny that such was the fact. There was confirmation strong that these officers had been guilty of corruption, and even of bribery, and yet they were continued in office; and if the Postmaster knew that such practices were in existence, and still continued the defaulting individuals in office, the irresistible conclusion was, that he himself was no better than his officers. This, at least, was the conclusion to which he (Mr. J.) had come, and he hoped he had arrived at it as an honorable man ought to do. Others might entertain different opinions, and they had a right to do so. He had felt it to be his duty to express his sentiments. He was well aware of the responsibility he had incurred, and he would never shrink from it. He would look upon a member of Congress as recreant to the trust which had been reposed in him, if he could turn away from a full and fearless avowal of the opinions he honestly entertained, on this or any other subject. He, however, had spoken these sentiments in no personal disrespect towards the Postmaster; he knew him not, or if he did, he had no acquaintance with him. He had no personal motive to gratify; and if, on the one hand, he sought no difference or collision of sentiment with any member of the House, on the other, he should always express his opinions, whenever he considered it his duty to do so.

Mr. STODDERT intimated his intention to vote in favor of the motion to strike out the enacting clause. To induce such a course, it was enough for him to know that the Department was at this time in debt to the amount of two or three hundred thousand dollars. As to the Postmaster General, the reports would show that, although his honesty had never been called in question, still his incapacity was sufficiently plain. Whatever his faults might have been, there could be nothing in all these transactions which could affect his private character.

After some remarks from Mr. GARLAND and Mr. LANE,

Mr. BEARDSLEY rose and replied to the data which had been adduced by the member from Maryland, in support of the charge of corruption. He had listened with attention to the remarks which that gentleman had made, and he admired the spirit and candor with which he had avowed his opinions. But this was the first time he (Mr. B.) had ever heard that, because a public officer had transcended the powers vested in him, therefore he was corrupt. Mr. B. answered at some length the two specific charges of loans and extra allowances, and cited previous usage as an argument against the charge of corruption. The member from Maryland had made some general charges about bribery, but, as he had laid down nothing specific on this point, he (Mr. B.) need not make any reply. He concluded by stating that probably no public officer, having any power in his hands, had retained office for any length of time, without transcending the power that was given to him; and if the necessary inference from such a proceeding was corruption or dishonesty, who on earth could stand up?

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON said he was free to confess that his intention, when he rose, was not to make an argument, but when he was called to account for the opinions he entertained, and that too by a member who had first alluded to the Postmaster General in terms so ambiguous, and leaving room for so strong an inference against the integrity of that officer that his friends had thought an explanation necessary; when that same honorable gentleman had had the spirit to come forward and explain away his own doubtful expressions, and at the same moment to charge upon himself a want of spirit in the course he had adopted, he (Mr. J.) could only tell that gentleman that his rule of thinking and acting, was not that which the honorable member laid down for his guidance. Of one thing that gentleman might be certain: if he (Mr. J.) had made a charge against another man, he had spirit enough to stand to it, let the consequences be what they might.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said he had expressly spoke in commendation, and not in detraction, of the spirit which the member from Maryland had evinced.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, called for order.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON. Am I out of order? Will the honorable member take down my remarks?

The CHAIR. The gentleman from Maryland will take his seat.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON. Am I not entitled to the floor? Have I not a right to reply to remarks which have been applied to me?

The CHAIR said the gentleman certainly had a right to reply; but the debate had taken a wider range than was proper, and gentlemen must limit their remarks.

There were some further calls to order, but the CHAIR decided that reply was admissible; and

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON proceeded. If there were gentlemen in this hall who had not a becoming sense of their own dignity, nor of the dignity of this House, all that he could say was, that he should not fail, on all occasions, to do justice to himself, and to his own views of propriety. He would remark, in reply to the member from New York, who had first charged impropriety on the Postmaster General, and who had since found it convenient to retract his observations—who had first come out with a charge, and then with a panegyric; that he (Mr. J.) did not possess that duplicity of character; that subtle attribute of mind; that non-committal feeling, which could induce him first to charge a man with wrong, and then to become his evident eulogist. The objections which he (Mr. J.) had raised were not predicated alone on the vote of the Senate, or on the item of extra allowances; but they were founded, hypothetically, upon the whole course of the Department. The knowledge of the evil being in the possession of the Postmaster General, and he not correcting the evil, he (Mr. J.) believed him to be culpable. The same remarks would apply to Mr. O. B. Brown—the Reverend Mr. Brown, as he was commonly designated—and who had some intimate friends in the members of this House. He (Mr. J.) might be censured; he might be called to order as he had been; but he would say, there was no gentleman in this House who could rise and say that the affairs of the Post Office, for the last two years, had been conducted with propriety, honor, or honesty. Were members to be muzzled? were they to have padlocks put upon their mouths when these facts were laid before the whole American people, and when all parts of the nation had come to a solemn conclusion that delinquency and corruption existed? Was he not to dare to speak his opinions in this hall, simply because the ghost of some murdered man should rise before him and bid him be silent? From his youth upwards he had been accustomed to express his honest opinions at all hazards. He was not one of those politicians who was ever wooing the popular breeze; a mere weathercock, to be veered by the gust of passion or of party, in whatever direction it might blow, or who felt called upon to hitch himself to the car of any chieftain or magician who might beckon him to his service. If his best and dearest friend had acted as the Postmaster had acted, he would, as a President should, have shaken him off as a viper, whose touch brought pollution and death. Corruption in one Department of Government will, if not exposed and censured promptly, lead to abuses in other Departments, and finally become abiding in all, and will extend itself from office-holders to office-hunters, (as is much the case now,) and will soon spread a pestilence of bribery throughout the nation; for, when political independence can be purchased with place, and the people endure that, then their freedom, as a birthright, may be yielded to the allurements of station and the temptation of gold; which, once tolerated, they

"First endure; then pity; then embrace."

Mr. BEARDSLEY said he did not exactly understand the drift of the honorable member's censures; nor could he precisely tell whether they were intended personally or otherwise. In regard to the gentleman's observations as to his spirit, it was due both to himself and to that gentleman to say that he (Mr. B.) intended no reflection of that kind; and, even if he had, the repeated assurances which the honorable gentleman had given that he did possess spirit, would have been sufficient to satisfy every reasonable mind that such must be the fact. But he did not intend to make the reference which had been alluded to; on the contrary, he expressly stated that he admired the spirit of frankness with which the gentleman had expressed his opinions. So much for that. Nor had he called in question the honesty of the honorable member's opinions. That gentleman had a right to his opinions; and it was immaterial to him what opinions another individual might hold, so long as they did not interfere with the free exercise of his own. Nor had he charged versatility upon the honorable member; he had made no such issue between them; the gentleman had made it for himself. He (Mr. B.) intended simply to assert, what he had a right to assert, that the grounds upon which the gentleman stated he had inferred corruption were not tenable. The gentleman ought not to be astonished that the opinions he expressed here should meet with a response. He appeared to take it unkind that he (Mr. B.) should have replied at all to his objections. He (Mr. B.) had replied, because he felt that he ought to do so; and if the honorable member thought he was wrong, he could settle the matter in any way which he thought proper. There was no necessity for that gentleman to indulge the remarks which, it appeared, he thought due to himself and the occasion. He (Mr. B.) had merely differed upon inferences to be drawn from facts, and he had expressed his opinions. The honorable member might have reserved his observations until a proper occasion. He (Mr. B.) repeated, that the Postmaster General had been liberal to a fault, and almost beyond a fault. Such he believed to be his character. Gentlemen seemed to have inferred that the remark was intended to point to a criminal design. Let the House judge whether it did or did not. If it did, then he (Mr. B.) knew not the meaning or the force of language.

Mr. LYTLE regretted the course which the debate had taken; and he rose, not to enter into debate, but simply to remark, as he had done when his sentiments were elicited on a former occasion, that the gentleman of the head of the Post Office Department was as pure, as just, and as incorrupt a man as ever breathed the breath of life; not only incorrupt as a man, but incorruptible. His official concerns were another thing; and he (Mr. L.) conceived that no assault had this evening been made upon the personal character of that officer. On the contrary, he had understood from the gentleman from Maryland, who had stated that he was not personally acquainted with the Postmaster, and who had since said that the charges were made hypothetically, that the observations applied to his official character. This was scarcely the legitimate arena in which an investigation of this description should be instituted. It was not the time, it would be unfair, and he was sure such an intention was not in conformity with the general views and spirit of the gentleman from Maryland, to put the Postmaster on his trial now. That honorable member had charged malfeasance hypothetically. When the proper time came, the charge could be examined. If he meant to say, as he (Mr. L.) had not at all understood him to say, that the integrity of the Postmaster was impeached, there was no better man than the Postmaster to sustain his own honor and his own reputation. He wanted no champion here; for, notwithstanding his weakness and disease, he had spirit enough left to defend himself; that was a task which he would not desire to impose on any of his friends. But he (Mr. L.) did not believe that the member from Maryland intended to make so serious and grievous a charge. He would not believe it of any member on this floor.

Mr. W. C. JOHNSON said he wished it to be understood that his remarks were intended to apply officially alone to the conduct of the Postmaster General. He had expressly stated that he knew nothing of him personally. So far as he had heard the private character of that individual spoken of, it had been without reproach. But if he had intended to make such a charge, he hoped he should not have been so low spirited as to bring it forward here, and take shelter from his opinions under the protection of this legislative hall. What he had said he would neither qualify nor retract, but would reiterate every sentiment he had uttered; and felt convinced that the honorable member from Ohio did not wish to give any other interpretation to them than his language would justify.

Mr. J., in rising, wished to be distinctly understood, and, while on the floor, repeated, that, although the member from New York [Mr. BRANDEGE] seemed to be at a loss to comprehend the full scope and meaning of his (Mr. J's) arguments, yet he had, with as much sincerity as ambiguity, admitted his (Mr. J's) candor and frankness in assuming the positions he had taken in this debate. And in dismissing the subject under discussion, he would finally say that, whether his remarks on this occasion met with favor or disfavor was a matter of perfect indifference to him, so long as he felt that he was discharging his duty as a member of this House.

Mr. LYTLE said he had no doubt, from the first, that such was the meaning of the member from Maryland. He would now move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again; but, on request, he withdraw the motion—

When Mr. POLK renewed it. ●

Tellers were appointed, and the members having passed through them once,

The tellers asked for a second count, declaring that they could not tell how the members stood.

A second count was accordingly ordered and obtained.

But the tellers asked for a third count, the second not being satisfactory.

The third count was taken, and the motion to rise stood: Ayes 64, noes 53, [no quorum.]

The committee rose and reported; whereupon,

Mr. JARVIS desired to know whether less than a quorum could ask leave to sit again.

The SPEAKER said that the proper mode would be for the House to resolve itself back into committee and retake the vote.

Mr. POLK moved an adjournment: he was satisfied that the House could arrive at no gratifying result this evening.

The SPEAKER said he was referring to the rules on the question of order.

But the motion for adjournment, in the face of the point of order, became reiterated and loud. So the question was taken and carried; and, at 10 o'clock,

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

ARMY BILLS.

After disposing of some preliminary business, On motion of Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WARR, of New York, in the chair,) and took up for consideration the "bill to render permanent the present mode of supplying the army of the United States."

No amendment being offered to the bill, the committee rose and reported it to the House; whereupon, it was ordered to a third reading, and, subsequently, was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. LYTLE in the chair,) on the remaining bills embraced in the order adopted yesterday.

The bill authorizing the appointment of three additional paymasters in the army was considered, and no amendment being offered thereto, it was laid aside.

The bill respecting the topographical engineers being then taken up for consideration,

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON moved an amendment adding twelve second lieutenants to the corps.

Mr. SPEIGHT thought, he said, that the corps was already sufficiently large, and he considered the proposed measure as a step towards a system of roads and canals, in the country, at the expense of the general Government.

Mr. DUNLAP said the amendment of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, if adopted by this House, would go to increase the topographical engineer corps. It would be carrying out the splendid system of internal improvement, commenced by the act of April, 1824. There was no necessity to increase the number. It was not pretended that we had not now a sufficient number to instruct the army, and answer all our purposes in time of war. But they were wanted only to go through this immense Union, to survey routes for roads and canals; to provide the means for this House to violate the constitution of our country, in appropriating money by the general Government to make roads and canals. Mr. Chairman, this is a subject for the States; it is within their exclusive jurisdiction; and every cent of money appropriated by this House for such purposes is, in my opinion, a most palpable violation of the constitution. Sir, it is time this extravagant system should be put an end to. The American people have a right to expect, under the administration of the present Executive, that this system of internal improvement will be stopped. I know that there are many gentlemen on this floor who believe that Congress has the right to appropriate to such purposes; and there are those who vote to spend the money in any manner whatever, to create the necessity to collect more. I call on the gentlemen who were elected by their constituents to a seat on this floor, to sustain the administration of the present Executive, now to assist in carrying out one of his acts to reduce the expenditures of this Government, to go with me in resisting this amendment.

Mr. LANE said he trusted that the amendment would be adopted. It was not a proposition to carry on a system of internal improvement by the general Government. No one denied the right of the States to carry on improvements with their own resources, and the States called on the general Government to assist them in making examinations and surveys. He had himself applied last year in behalf of his State for the services of an engineer to be employed by the State, and he was told that they were all employed, and that many similar applications had been made and refused for the same reason. Unless the corps was increased, their services could not be procured by the States, though the States were willing to pay the expenses of the surveys made by them.

Mr. SPEIGHT said he would not detain the committee by continuing the debate, but in the House he should move, in order to test the principle of the bill, to strike out the first section.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON withdrew the motion to amend. Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, remarked that there was but one engineer on the whole Southern coast, and that there were a great number of works requiring examination and survey. He thought it, therefore, highly important to increase the number of the corps of topographical engineers.

Mr. MERCER said he would barely suggest that this country had sustained a great loss to its commerce for want of what no prudent Government would be without, accurate maps of its coast and of its interior.

Mr. DUNLAP then offered an amendment, providing for the repeal of all laws authorizing the appointment of topographical engineers.

In reply to Mr. LANE, of Indiana, Mr. D. said he had been often somewhat astonished at the course pursued by many gentlemen on this floor, but none more than the gentleman from Indiana. I have often heard that gentlemen assert his friendship for the Executive; and as often have I seen him voting against the most important measures of the administration.

We hear it often asked, on this floor and elsewhere, how it is that this administration spends more money than any former one, when it was asserted by the great body of the friends of the present Executive, while he was canvassing for the executive chair, that the former administration was profligate in its expenditures. To the members of this House it is an easy matter to account how this happens; but to those who are not here it cannot be so well accounted for. They know what the principles of the administration are, and when they see that such and such gentlemen are elected as friends to the administration, they expect to see them aiding and assisting the Executive in curtailing the expenses of the Government. But how is it, Mr. Chairman? There is a very decided majority of the members of this House elected by their constituents as friends to the Executive; and upon every question of expending money we find many of them always voting with the opponents of the administration, some of whom would vote to expend every dollar in the treasury, for any purpose whatever, only to bring odium on the administration. Mr. Chairman, I have a right to call on those gentlemen who were elected as friends of this administration to vote for my amendment. It repeals all laws authorizing the Executive to employ civil engineers under the act of April, 1824. That law appropriated thirty thousand dollars annually, for the purpose of authorizing the President to employ two or more civil engineers, together with the topographical engineer, to make surveys and estimates for such roads and canals as he might deem of national importance. What, sir, has been the practice under this law? Application after application is made to the Executive to have a route for a road or canal, from such and such a place, surveyed; and it is almost impossible for him to tell whether it is of national importance or not; it is so represented to him; he can only do what Congress directed him to do. He sends the engineers, they make the surveys and estimates, and when their report is made it is sent to Congress; and gentlemen in whose district the improvement is to be made ask Congress to make the appropriation to complete the work. And, sir, what are we told when we resist the appropriations? That the surveys and estimates are made by a public officer, and he recommends the usefulness and practicability of said work; and if Congress does not make the appropriation, all the money spent by the Government in having the survey made will be thrown away. Mr. Chairman, this argument appears to have great influence on some gentlemen; and, if my amendment is adopted, we will in future get clear of any such fallacious argument.

Mr. Chairman, the act of April, 1824, was intended to carry out the grand scheme of internal improvement which so characterized the late administration. It was passed, and the policy adopted, by a union of tariff and internal improvement men. The one was to have their manufactories protected, and the other to have the money thus collected expended in internal improvement. The interest of the agricultural part of this Union, and particularly the Southern and Southwestern parts, was thus compromised, to subserve the interest and views of this unholy alliance against the common principles of the constitution of our country.

Mr. Chairman, I call on gentlemen to lay down their rule of action, and to vote by it, in this House. This seems to me to be the only mode to make principles and measures directing counsel for this House. It is the only manner by which public sentiment can be fairly tried, when our conduct shall be submitted to our fellow-citizens. Is it fair play for gentlemen to run at home under the Jackson banner, with personal eulogies upon the virtues of the man, and, after they receive all the advantages of the influence of his name, come here and vote against the great fundamental principles which brought him into favor and power? Such a course is delusive and deceptive, and tends to divert the public mind from the great landmarks of a republican Government. I, sir, would greatly prefer that gentlemen should be personally opposed to the present Chief Magistrate, and so boldly speak, and, when they come into this consecrated hall, vote for the principles of his administration. This, in my opinion, would do gentlemen more credit with the enlightened character of the American people, and would be a better guarantee for the purity and principles of their constituents, than to run into public favor on the personal popularity of the President, and then, with a false love, baffle his measures. This, sir, is one of the greatest causes why we have heard so much noise about the President's not carrying out in his administration the principles which called to his aid in the popular elections, the great republican party. Many of his personal friends have been made the dupes of his enemies, or they have been false to their own principles.

If the President had attempted to have brought into favor principles adverse to the republican doctrines, I, sir, would have been among the first to raise my voice against him; but while he, year after year, repeats and presses the true doctrines and measures of his well-established republican faith, I will go with him, and call on his elected friends to do the same, or, like men who deserve the rank and confidence which place them here, to renounce their Jacksonism, acknowledge their errors, and vote as becomes the representatives of a free people. Then we can have a fair expression of public opinion, stripped of its deceptive character, which is the only safeguard to the principles of the constitution, and the equal and just measures emanating from the whole object and character of our best and happiest form of government.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON here remarked that the hour was out.

Several members simultaneously addressed the Chair; but, after some difficulty as to a point of order,

Mr. LANE said, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DUNLAP] that the House had received a lesson of party discipline, and that a large portion of it seemed to have been intended for himself. It would have been wisdom in that honorable gentleman if he had applied the discipline to himself, before he should have instructed the House. He says he is surprised that the gentleman from Indiana, and others, who were elected as Jackson men, and sent here to support the principles of the administration, should vote for these extravagant appropriations for surveys, and for works of internal improvement; and that to increase the corps of engineers, was to authorize unconstitutional improvements. Mr. L. said it was true he had been elected as a friend of the distinguished Chief Magistrate, not to serve the Chief Magistrate, but to serve his constituents, the State, and the Union; that he wore no collar—no man's robe. In his votes, and the course he had pursued, and would pursue, while honored with a seat in this House, he would always follow the dictates of his own conscience and judgment, uninfluenced by any other consideration than the interest and prosperity of his constituents, the State, and the Union.

H. or R.]

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee might have been elected, because he was a Jackson man, to sustain the administration right or wrong. If so, Mr. L. said he was proud to say his situation was a different one. He had been elected in a district where General Jackson himself had been beaten a few months before. He was willing to compromise with the gentleman from Tennessee, and let the House and the American people determine who had accorded to the Chief Magistrate the most efficient support. In the present instance he was, he said, sustaining the Chief Magistrate, while the gentleman from Tennessee was opposing him and his measures. The President recommended it in his message; the Secretary of War required it. It was emphatically an administration measure. A distinguished officer of one of the bureaus was now in the hall, urging the passage of the bill. That he was in favor of the general Government improving the condition of the country, for the benefit of the people, with the money of the people; that he believed it not only constitutional, but the duty of the general Government to aid the States, and even private companies, in the surveys and prosecution of all works calculated to facilitate commerce and the interests of the Union.

That he had no constitutional scruples, nor did he subscribe to the doctrine, that a stream, because the water was salt, had the preference over a large and commercial channel of fresh water. If the gentleman means to be understood that, to be a Jackson man, is to oppose all appropriations for the improvement of our rivers and channels of commerce, and all aid by the general Government for improvement in the several States, he could only say no such Jackson men could be found in Indiana.

That he not only believed the general Government possessed the power, but that it was their duty to improve all the channels of commerce in every part of the Union; that this principle had been acted upon, so far as they participated in the character of national works. That he understood these to be the principles of the Chief Magistrate; that he desired the passage of this bill increasing the corps of topographical engineers for the purpose of aiding the nation, the States, and companies, in the prosecution of works of internal improvement.

Mr. BOON said he was aware that the remarks which had just been made by his friend from Tennessee, [Mr. DUNLAP,] were not directed to him individually; but as he (Mr. B.) should vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, and for the bill itself, he was not, therefore, to be considered as being inconsistent in his course toward the administration. Mr. B. said that no one, perhaps, had been more uncompromising in their support of the present Chief Magistrate in three several elections, than himself; and that few, if any, had given a more hearty and uniform support of the general policy of the present administration than he had done during the time he had been honored with a seat in Congress; and that while he had given his support to the leading measures of the administration, he had also taken the liberty, on some occasions, to go a scruple further in relation to some matters involving a mere difference of opinion.

Mr. DUNLAP then withdrew his amendment.

On motion of Mr. R. M. JOHNSON, the committee rose, and reported the bill to the House.

The bill for the appointment of three additional paymasters of the army then came up on its engrossment.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON explained that great delay and inconvenience were now experienced in the payment of the army, from the want of a sufficient number of paymasters; and he referred to the statements of the paymaster general, to show the necessity of adopting the measure proposed in this bill.

Mr. SPEIGHT was, he said, opposed to the passage of the bill. It went to increase the patronage of the Government, which, by many, was said to be already too great, and he did not think there was any necessity for it.

Mr. GRENNEILL asked whether the appointments were to be made from the line of the army.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON said the appointments were not confined, by the bill, to the army, but could be made from citizens.

Mr. BURGESS moved to amend the bill by changing its phraseology, so as to provide that the President should nominate, and, with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint, &c.; which was agreed to.

Mr. MANN opposed the bill.

Mr. CHILTON opposed the bill, on the ground that it was unnecessary, and increased the patronage of the Government.

Mr. WISE said he would vote against the bill in its present form, because it proposed a direct violation of the constitution, in authorizing the paymasters to appoint clerks with a salary of $500. He moved to strike out that provision.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON said he would agree to the proposition.

And the question being taken, the section was stricken out.

After some remarks from Mr. LYTLE, in support of the bill,

On motion of Mr. HUBBARD, the House proceeded to the orders of the day.

ELECTION OF PRINTER.

Mr. McKINLEY moved that all the orders of the day be postponed in order to take up the resolution for the election of a printer to the House. He said it was his object to have the question decided, whether the House would go into the election of a printer at this session or not.

After some remarks from Messrs. FOSTER, McKINLEY, MERCER, and BRIGGS, on the question whether the motion was in order,

The SPEAKER decided that the motion was not in order without a suspension of the rule.

Mr. McKINLEY appealed from the decision of the Chair.

The question being "Shall the decision of the Chair stand?"

It was discussed by Messrs. MERCER, BURGESS, PATTON, EVANS, and McKINLEY, when

Mr. McKINLEY withdrew his appeal.

The SPEAKER, by consent of the House, went into an explanation of the grounds of the decision from which the appeal had been taken.

Mr. McKINLEY then moved to suspend the rules of Amendment of the Constitution—Judicial Circuits.

[H. OF R.]

the House, and take up the resolution respecting the election of a printer.

Mr. CONNOR moved to include the bill to reorganize the Post Office Department; but withdrew the motion.

Mr. McKINLEY asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, resulted as follows: Yeas 103, nays 110.

So the motion of Mr. McKINLEY was negatived.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. WILDE moved to postpone the orders of the day, with a view to take up the resolution for the amendment of the constitution, in relation to election of President and Vice President, heretofore proposed by Mr. GILMER.

Mr. GILMER proposed some modifications of the motion, which were not heard by the reporters.

Mr. HUBBARD remonstrated warmly, and expressed his fears that the harbor bill, and others from the Committee of Ways and Means, would be so delayed that there would not be time for the Senate to act upon them.

Mr. WHITE, of New York demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and stood: Yeas 112, nays 92. So the orders of the day were suspended.

JUDICIAL CIRCUITS.

The House, by consent, admitted the reference of Senate bills on the Speaker's table. Among them was the bill to rearrange the circuit courts of the United States.

[This bill provides for consolidating the circuits composed of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, with that composed of Delaware and Maryland, and requiring Judge Baldwin to hold the circuit courts in the Delaware and Maryland circuit, so as to obviate the necessity of appointing a judge of the Supreme Court in that circuit, and thereby to extend the circuit system to the Western States.]

Mr. FOSTER suggested to the House the consideration of the question, whether it was worth the while of the House to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, inasmuch as that committee had already reported that it would be impossible for the House to act upon it during the present session. He moved to commit it to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BEARDSLEY thought the bill too important to be acted on by the House without its first going through the investigation of a standing committee of the House.

Some conversation ensued between Messrs. FOSTER, MERCER, WILDE, THOMAS of Maryland, and CLAY.

At the suggestion of Mr. CLAY, Mr. FOSTER modified his motion so as to include the printing of the bill.

Mr. WILDE demanded the previous question; which motion was not, however, seconded by the House: Ayes 68, noes 74.

Mr. COULTER could see no reason why there should be any departure, in this case, from the ordinary course. The bill was a most important one, involving the lives and properties of thousands, and he hoped the House would not divest it of those protective proceedings which the rules had thrown around every such measure. He was in favor of extending every privilege enjoyed by the old to the new States, but not at the expense of the former. New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland, had increased in population, and ought not to be deprived of any of their rights and privileges; and he entered his protest against it. The bill proposed a manifest act of injustice, and he trusted would undergo the strictest scrutiny in the standing committee of the House.

Mr. CARMICHAEL addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I concur with my honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COULTER,] in the opinion he has expressed in regard to the importance of this subject. It is entitled to the most deliberate action of this House. This bill from the Senate is designed to operate in a peculiar manner upon the rights and interests of the State in which I reside, and of which I am one of the Representatives upon this floor. I feel myself, therefore, called upon to protest against the adoption of the motion of the honorable member from Georgia, [Mr. FOSTER.] Its effect is to dispense with the usual routine of business, which secures to every measure, before it is submitted to the consideration of the House, a previous examination by one of its constituted organs, by one of its standing committees. Sir, why this haste? Why hurry this bill into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? Where is the motive for all this precipitation? Deeply interested as are the people of Maryland in the result of this proposed alteration of the judicial districts of the United States, I must claim for the subject the most mature consideration. Sir, I have another reason for resisting this unusual and unnecessary proceeding. This measure proposes to accomplish one object; it reaches another by indirection. Its apparent purpose is to arrange the existing judicial districts, and to establish two additional circuits. It merges the district of Maryland and Delaware, and gives a circuit to the Northwest and the Southwest. But whilst it professes—and you know, sir, as it originated in the Senate, I cannot speak of the motives upon which it is based—it would be discourtesy to do so—whilst it professes to sink a district, its effect is to despatch a judge. Its effect is to relieve the Senate of a responsibility imposed upon them by the constitution. Sir, I understand the ready willingness of the honorable member from Alabama [Mr. CLAY] to embrace this measure at once, to disregard the usual and established order of legislation here. It extends advantages to the people of the Southwest. It is enough for him to know there is a benefit held out to his constituents. He overlooks the consideration that it works a rank injustice to his friends elsewhere. I have no objection to extend the contemplated advantages to the West; but I cannot do it at the expense of my constituents. It was only by holding out this benefit, never before contemplated for the West, that it was hoped to effect this unjust purpose to Maryland. If this bill is to be adopted, I hope it may be required to pass through the usual routine. I hope it will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. But I must earnestly resist any proceeding, however presented, the manifest tendency of which is to impose upon this House a share of the responsibility devolved by the constitution upon the Senate of the United States; which will require of this House to dispose of executive nominations. And more especially, when the obvious effect of it is to affect injuriously the interests of Maryland, and to crush one of her most valued citizens. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw his motion to commit this bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLAY disavowed any personal feeling on the subject. While, on the one hand, however, he was disposed to render strict justice to other parts of the Union, he stood there as the Representative of Alabama, and gentlemen must not expect him to abandon her interests.

Mr. GARLAND was convinced that the commitment of the bill to the Judiciary Committee would only tend to defeat or delay it. His only object was to secure the action of the House on this all-important subject.

Mr. CAGE adverted to the long-withheld justice which this House owed to the new States. He moved the previous question; but withdrew it at the request of

H. or R.]

Amendment of the Constitution.

[Feb. 25, 1835.]

Mr. FOSTER, who made some explanatory remarks. He was surprised at the opposition which had been elicited by the simple motion which he had made. He avowed his intention of proposing certain amendments when the bill should come before the House. He then renewed, according to promise, the motion for the previous question.

[Here a discussion ensued on the nature of the previous question, as applicable to the present case. Mr. SPEIGHT thought the previous question would be the passage, but the Chair decided otherwise.]

Mr. CAGE then withdrew the motion for the previous question.

Mr. THOMAS addressed the House. He viewed the bill in the light of an attempt to destroy one of the worthy citizens of Maryland. Justice had been denied to that State by the proceedings in this matter, and he demanded, as one of her Representatives, that it should be rendered to her. Mr. T. had protested at the early part of the session, and subsequently, against acting upon this subject, because the facts were not fully in possession of the House, and he would appeal to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to say if he was acquainted with all the circumstances involved, or had given the subject such an investigation as had put him in possession of the principles of the bill.

Mr. BARRINGER said, were it earlier in the session, he would have no objection to gratifying the gentleman from Maryland, by committing this bill; but he was convinced it would be impracticable to obtain the action of the House by this course. New Jersey, Delaware, and North Carolina, had very little business, and Virginia not a great deal, and he was quite sure that the judges could perform the additional duties imposed under this bill. He was quite sure that neither the chief justice nor Judge Baldwin would feel themselves unable to discharge the burdens under this bill. Mr. B. referred to what fell from one of the gentlemen from Maryland, that the advocates of the bill designed by it to destroy a distinguished citizen of Maryland, and Mr. B. disclaimed it for himself, and hoped such a suggestion would have no influence there or elsewhere. He supported the bill because he believed the measure it embraced was required by the wants of the new States. He was convinced there was no necessity for sending the bill to the Judiciary Committee, which would only postpone it till too late for action. Mr. B. asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, remarked that the subject-matter of the bill was of great importance to the Western States, and on that account he hoped the most speedy action that was within the constitutional means of this House would be had on it. The importance of this measure to the State of Illinois, a part of which he had the honor to represent, and to the other Western States, would be demonstrated by the exertions of the honorable member from Maryland. That State, as he understood gentlemen, was to be put in the situation in which Illinois has been for many years past. Mr. R. observed that he was sorry he had not the ability and high standing of character which the honorable gentleman from Maryland possessed, who addressed the House, so he could use it in favor of the State and the rights of the State which he, in common with other members, represented. All of it should be employed, as the cause was worthy of it. Mr. R. remarked that he would be satisfied, almost in any manner, if equal principles and privileges were extended to the new States, as are enjoyed by the old. When we were admitted into the Union, there was an express recognition of that principle of equality, that we should be, in all respects, admitted on the same footing as the original States. The House of Representatives, and the Congress of the United States, have now the power to do the new States justice. And he appealed to the patriotism and the known integrity and honesty of the House to do the new States justice on this occasion. They expect it from your hands, and he sincerely hoped they would not be disappointed.

Mr. R. observed he had no intention to injure the States of Maryland, New Jersey, or even the little State of Delaware. Justice could be done to these States in the Committee of the Whole as well as in any other committee. Justice was what he hoped would be done to all the States on this occasion; equal benefits to one State as to another was his object. Let us, in the West, have the same order and grade of courts, and it is not much matter to us what they are, if the same grade and kind exist in the other States. We will be satisfied with old or young judges, with marshals or others, if a like sort is given to the other States. If the justices of the peace administered the law, and held the courts in the old States, he would be content with them in the new. But let us have equality on this subject, as it is our right, under the express recognition of it by the solemn act of the Congress of the United States, at the time we became one of the members of the confederacy. Justice and principle are in our favor, and the Congress of the United States have promised us an equal standing with the other States. And shall we not now expect it, when it is in the power of Congress to extend this principle to us on this occasion? Mr. R. observed he would not go farther into the principles and subject-matter of the bill, on this motion, as he understood the Speaker had so decided it in the case of another gentleman. The question then is, in what committee is it the most likely that these desirable objects will be attained? The time is so short in which to act on this subject, that it will delay it too long to go through the ordinary progress of legislation; and it may be remarked that the Committee on the Judiciary has already acted on this subject, and reported a bill. With this view of the subject, he considered it the proper course to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole. In that committee justice can be done to Maryland and to all the States, which was, he remarked, his sole object in supporting the reference.

Mr. ROBERTSON said a few words on the character and qualifications of the present chief justice.

Mr. THOMAS again opposed the motion, and referred to a statement of the business in Baltimore, and also the opinions of the bar.

Mr. MERCER said a few words in reply.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays, as follows: Yeas 119, nays 82.

So the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MANN moved that the House adjourn. Negatived: Ayes 78, naves 84.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The question on engrossing the joint resolutions on the subject of the election of President and Vice President of the United States then came up.

Mr. GILMER said he had no wish that the resolution should be discussed at that time, and he had risen only to ask that the question on the resolutions and the amendment should be taken separately, and thereon he asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. SPEIGHT said, like the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GILMER,] it was not his intention to discuss these resolutions. He wished to suggest a single amendment, which was to strike out the word "four," and insert "six," as the extent of the presidential and vice presidential terms. He believed four years too short a period, where the duration of the office was restricted to a single term.

Mr. PINCKNEY asked for the reading of the resolutions; which were read.

Mr. BARRINGER regretted that his colleague [Mr. SPEIGHT] had thought it necessary to offer the amendment he had. Mr. B. had no intention of provoking a discussion on these resolutions, but he rose to express his entire dissent from the amendment. He was convinced that four years was sufficiently long for a good President, whose place might be supplied by other good men consecutively, and four years was abundantly ample, and rather too ample, for a bad President.

Mr. SPEIGHT asked for the yeas and nays on his amendment; which were ordered.

Mr. PATTON said he could not vote for the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SPEIGHT,] nor was he in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GILMER.] He believed it to be a cardinal point in our institutions, that no worthy citizen should be disfranchised. That they should at all times be eligible to office, and to being returned to that office at the pleasure of the people. He accorded with the sentiment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BARRINGER,] that four years was too long for a bad man to serve us as President; but he would add to that sentiment, as amendatory to its force and truth, that eight years was not too long a period to secure the services of a good man to his country.

The question on the amendment of Mr. SPEIGHT was decided in the negative: Ayes 41, nays 162.

Mr. PEYTON remarked that he did not rise to discuss the question of whether these resolutions were perfect in all their details, or not; if they were defective or ambiguous, they could be readily amended. This was the obvious course to be pursued by the friends of the principle which they contained. He very much regretted that his honorable colleague [Mr. POLK] should have presented any obstacles to acting upon the resolutions at this session. His colleague was opposed to immediate action, because the subject was one of great importance: at the same time he had informed the House that he had thoroughly examined the subject; that he had made his first speech upon this floor on it. Mr. P. could not understand why he [Mr. POLK] should throw his weight against considering the resolutions at this session. Has not this subject been earnestly recommended to the consideration of Congress, and to the consideration of the American people, by the President? Have not the resolutions now before the House been on our tables for months? Can it be possible that any member of this House, that any well-informed politician, that any American citizen, after all which has been said and written on this deeply interesting subject, has not formed an opinion as to the propriety or impropriety of securing to the people the right of electing the President and Vice President of the United States?

Mr. P. would deprecate as much as his colleague, or any other gentleman, a recurrence of an election of President by this House. He was desirous to make it impossible that it ever should recur. He was anxious to adopt such an amendment of the constitution as would put the question to rest. This is the doctrine of our party. It has been recommended and reiterated by the President. If gentlemen are in earnest, now is the time to show it. I call upon them to act out their doctrines, and stand firmly to their principles.

Sir, said Mr. P., I cannot shut my eyes to the signs of the times. There are some grounds for doubting whether gentlemen are altogether sincere in their professions of wishing an amendment of the constitution at this time. They profess to consider an election of the President by the House as the greatest of all political calamities. They carry their apprehensions so far as to contend, in effect, that, to avoid this danger, there shall not, must not, be but one candidate of our party. Yes, sir, that one man shall appropriate to himself, in the coming election, the entire strength of our overwhelming party. This is saying that all but one man of the great republican party in the United States is disfranchised, and that the mantle of its strength must fall upon his shoulders. Why, upon what ground is this argument built up? Because gentlemen say, by possibility, the election may devolve upon this House.

Sir, the name of Hugh Lawson White, of Tennessee, is before the nation, as a candidate for the presidency. He has been taken up by the people in their primary assemblies, and in their legislative assemblies, without any solicitation or agency of his own; and, having been thus presented, he will so continue, unless the same power which brought forward his name shall withdraw it. And, sir, there is another distinguished individual of our party spoken of as an aspirant to the same station. It is true he is not yet a candidate, and, as I understand his friends, he will not consent that the people shall have any agency in bringing him forward, but is waiting to be endorsed by a national caucus, before he comes into the field. This, sir, will present no difficulty to him. The endorsement will be made; it is already arranged; for it is universally admitted that none but his friends will attend the caucus. Now, as I understand the position of my honorable colleague, and those who act with him, the main reason which they assign for supporting the candidate of the caucus against Hugh L. White, is that, by possibility, the election may come into this House. Yes, sir, this is the pretext by which the people of the United States are to be induced to surrender their right of electing a President, or even to have the claim of any candidate which they may choose to present considered. Why must they make a surrender of their most important privileges? Because, forsooth, the constitution ought to be amended so as to give them more power. Let their representatives make the necessary amendments. But then there would be no pretext for a caucus—no necessity for a convention—no excuse for disfranchising any man—no argument to force Judge White from the field.

Sir, Judge White's friends are in favor of passing these resolutions for making the necessary amendments to the constitution, to prevent an election by the House in any event. Where are the great body of the friends of the caucus? They are found opposed to acting upon the subject at this session; and, before another meeting of Congress, the caucus will have done its service, and be in full operation. If gentlemen are earnestly in favor of the principles of these resolutions, let them present such amendments as will secure the great object, obviating all objections to their form. If they will not do this, let us hear no more about caucuses, and the exclusive rights of one man to the immense power of the republican party.

Mr. POLK said: Mr. Speaker, it is certainly most foreign from my expectation that I should be called out into a field of discussion, not in the slightest degree alluded to by me; no, sir, I repeat, not in the slightest degree. I rose only to suggest what I supposed I had discovered to be an important omission in the draughting of these resolutions; and it was conceded by the honorable chairman of the committee [Mr. GILMER] which prepared these resolutions, that it was an omission. Conceiving, then, that this was a defect, I had draughted an amendment to supply it, and at the proper time intended to submit it to the House; but the honorable gentleman at the head of the committee said that he would himself, in a little time, prepare an amendment. Under the supposition the gentleman would do it, I was willing to give him the preference, intending, if it should not appear so perfect as I might conceive my own to be, then to submit mine to the House.

Mr. Speaker, I have been too long a member of this House to suffer myself to be drawn out into a partisan debate, not necessarily connected with the subject before us. There are occasions enough when most of us may be unwarily drawn into that character of debate upon the discussion of great and important questions; and not unfrequently all of us, when we come to reflect, regret it, and those who occasion it regret it, not the least. In regard, sir, to the particular position I occupy here, I am responsible to no man here: I am responsible, sir, to those who sent me here; to those confiding, liberal, and patriotic, constituents whose commission I have held for the last ten years; and whose confidence has never been withheld from me; and permit me to say, sir, I have as yet no evidence that it will be. Here, I am responsible to myself in what manner I shall act upon all questions; and whatever may be the consequences, personally, to myself, upon these convictions I will stand or fall.

Mr. Speaker, I need add nothing more than that I am ready to co-operate with any and every gentleman in making these resolutions as perfect as possible. I cannot be misunderstood here, nor elsewhere, in regard to my views upon this great question; for they have been too often expressed in debate, and the journals of your House will testify what my former course has been. I will only add, sir, that as my opinions are unchanged upon this question, so shall my vote be unchanged.

Mr. PEARCE opposed the resolutions, as calculated still more to narrow the powers of the small States; he was now of the opinion he entertained in 1826, when this subject was under discussion, and when the discussion lasted more than six weeks. I will bear the gentleman out who has just taken his seat, [Mr. POLK,] in all he has said as to the part he then acted. You were not then, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. P.,) a member of this House. I was opposed then, as I am now, to what is proposed by these resolutions. The House has overruled me in the only amendment to the constitution I would ever agree to. I would agree to limit the presidential term to six years, and render the incumbent ineligible at the expiration of his term. We have been told of the different flags that we shall be called upon to fight under, and that the White flag has been raised, and this, too, as a reason for altering the constitution of the United States. He might be in favor of the White flag, if there should not be found too many black spots in it. The flag which he should rally round would be the flag of democracy. But because, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTON] has told us, and why at this time I do not (said Mr. P.) know, there are to be no candidates in the field of the same party, he saw no reason why Rhode Island should give up even the contingent power which she had, though the exercise of it might not devolve upon her more than once in one hundred years. He called upon every New England State to come to the rescue; for if they were not now all small in fact, they were comparatively so; and in a very few years all of them would be considered small. He would summon to his aid all the small States in the Union, and say to them, that although he might dread an election of President of the United States by the House, not to alter the constitution, so as at all events, and under all circumstances, to prevent an election by the House. The small States had suffered enough in consequence of the alteration of the constitution, by the result of the contested election in the case of Jefferson and Burr. This was the effect of a temporary excitement, natural enough, but when special legislation or action is followed by it, the consequences are not always salutary or agreeable. How

(said Mr. P.) did Rhode Island stand in 1800? One of her electors (and she was entitled to but four) could settle the question between A and B, and determine of the two which should be President. That power or right is taken from us, or we have parted with it. Now, sir, the two Representatives in this House from Rhode Island may decide who shall be President, and we are called upon to surrender this power. I can agree to nothing of the kind. I am opposed to these resolutions, one and all, and since 1826, when my opinion was at length given, my mind has undergone no change.

Mr. BURGESS said he wished to see this subject divided; for, in its present shape, it was incompatible with his views. On the subject of the first proposition, to render the Chief Magistrate eligible for only one term, he should be in the affirmative; but on the second proposition he was, and should ever remain, in the negative. It swept away all the reserved rights of the less States, which, he contended, in the spirit of our institutions and our original compact, should for ever remain inviolable. Mr. B. pursued his argument at some length.

Mr. GILMER then proposed to supply the omission by inserting the following: "according to the rule now fixed by the constitution."

Mr. POLK proposed so to amend it as that each State should be entitled to the same number of electors as members of Congress.

Mr. GILMER withdrew his own amendment, and accepted Mr. POLK's.

Mr. WISE remarked that, even if it were an omission, it did not repeal the existing law, which was sufficiently explicit.

Mr. POLK replied that it might hereafter give rise to great disputes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GHOLSON then moved an amendment to allow the people an unrestricted choice of a successor, in case of the death of a President.

Before the question was taken,
The House adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 26.

HARBOR BILL.

The bill making appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, for certain harbors, and removing obstructions in and at the mouths of certain rivers, for the year 1835, was taken up.

Mr. MCKAY moved to amend the bill so as to prevent any extra allowance or compensation to any officer of the army on account of services performed under the provisions of the bill; which was agreed to.

Mr. BARBER moved to amend the bill by inserting an appropriation of $25,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the river Thames, in the State of Connecticut, and demanded the yeas and nays on his motion; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 63, nays 115.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAWES moved to amend the bill by inserting $20,000 for the improvement of the navigation of Green river, in the State of Kentucky; which was negatived.

Mr. TRUMBULL moved to insert in the bill the sum of $25,000, for the purpose of deepening the channel at the mouth of Connecticut river.

Mr. T. said that a survey had been made of the mouth of Connecticut river, in reference to the proposed improvement, together with an estimate of the necessary expense, from which it appeared that the obstructions might be removed at a cost not exceeding $30,000.

Several favorable reports of committees had from time to time been made upon this subject, and a similar ap-proposition passed both Houses of Congress at a former session, but failed to receive the approbation of the Executive, in consequence of its being comprehended with other appropriations in a bill to which he entertained objections. Mr. T. said that the Connecticut river was navigable for sea vessels about sixty miles, and for boats three hundred—passing through two States, and forming the entire boundary line between two others; that large sums of money had been already expended by incorporated companies in valuable improvements upon this river. That a great quantity of goods and produce was annually transported over land, the natural course of which seemed to be upon the river. That, in addition to the ordinary navigation upon the river, there was, during the summer months, a daily line of steamboats between New York and Hartford, whose progress was not unfrequently interrupted, and the passengers delayed at the mouth of this river. He further stated it as the opinion of engineers and other competent men, that, by removing the bar at the mouth of the Connecticut, a capacious harbor would be formed, within which might safely ride one thousand vessels; situated about equidistant between New Haven and New London, and adding greatly to the convenience and security of all vessels passing through Long Island Sound. He said the Connecticut river valley contained nearly one million of industrious, enterprising citizens, whose indefatigable exertions in the various employments of life would amply compensate the Government for any facilities granted to them. He also alluded to the appropriation of $150,000, granted at the last Congress to remove a similar obstruction in the Hudson river, one hundred and fifty miles above its mouth. He claimed that, if the contemplated improvement was viewed with reference to internal trade, the convenience and safety of our coast navigation, the comparatively small expenditure of money, or the number of individuals to be accommodated, it would be found an object peculiarly demanding the favor of Congress; and that there could be no objection to the manner proposed for the accomplishment of this object, that did not equally exist to the amendment in the same bill, whereby $50,000 had already been appropriated for the improvements of the Ohio river.

Mr. JACKSON remarked that the parties on the great question of internal improvement were so strongly discriminated in that House, as well as in the nation, that, while he had no right to expect aid or favor from the enemies of the system, he certainly had the strongest claims upon its friends to afford their countenance and support to the amendment offered by his colleague. It was time that the point should be understood and settled, how far the friends of internal improvement in that House might depend upon each other for mutual support. The Connecticut delegation had uniformly sustained the cause in both branches of the Legislature, and had cheerfully and disinterestedly voted appropriations of public money for meritorious objects of this nature in all parts of our common country. That State had, however, thus far shared very little in the benefits of the system, and if the reasonable claims which they now preferred were not worthy of the favorable consideration of Congress, they could scarcely hope ever to entitle themselves to it, by any which they could present hereafter. This application was not new to the House; it had received the favorable notice of the Committee on Commerce, who had provided for it in another bill now on the table, upon which any action of the House was, at this late period of the session, very uncertain. Nor could it be regarded as strictly a new and original work, as upon the surveys which had been actually made and submitted to Congress, a bill had heretofore passed both Houses, appropriating the sum now asked, which was rejected by the Executive, not on account of the demerits of this particular provision, but because the bill happened to embrace other and very different objects which the President deemed exceptionable.

It was well known (Mr. J. said) that an active and extensive commerce was carried on upon the Connecticut river, flowing, as it did, through an extensive, cultivated, and thickly peopled country; and he would add that very large expenditures of money had been made by the private enterprise of a company incorporated for the improvement of its navigation; all of which were frequently rendered fruitless by the obstructions at its mouth, vessels being very often detained from putting to sea by the shallowness of the water on the bar, which formed a serious obstacle to the successful prosecution of foreign trade. It was true that Connecticut could not vie with some of the great and fertile States of the West, or present to this House such magnificent pictures of the rich freight which was carried down its waters, but it would be perceived that they regulated their claims accordingly; and, while other States received from the treasury vast appropriations for internal improvements, Connecticut had limited her demands to a sum which every one must deem moderate in proportion to her contributions to the national revenue. If, then, a claim heretofore recognised by Congress, liable to none of the objections or scruples which the present Executive entertains respecting other classes of internal improvements, but, on the contrary, coming entirely within the rules which he has laid down, should not receive the aid of the friends of the system here, it would be a just cause of complaint to the people of Connecticut, who cannot be expected, through their delegation, to continue the support of a policy whose operation is so unequal; which exacts from them a full measure of contribution to the national treasury, yet denies, in its distribution, a fair and impartial return. In this House the numerical influence of a small State might not have much importance; but gentlemen should recollect that there was another body in which their influence could and would be felt, by withholding all support to objects of this kind, until a more just and equitable principle should prevail of proportioning the disbursements of public money to the amount of revenue contributed. He trusted, therefore, that unless it could be shown that this appropriation was larger than the State of Connecticut had a right to claim, by comparison with those constantly made in favor of other States, or that the object contemplated was not so important as it had been represented, the friends of internal improvement, from whatever section of country they might come, would feel the justice and policy of sustaining the proposed amendment.

The amendment was supported by Messrs. MERCER and BURGESS, and opposed by Messrs. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, and SPEIGHT, when

Mr. MILLER moved the previous question; which was seconded: Yeas 91, nays 69.

Mr. H. EVERETT demanded the yeas and nays on the previous question; which were ordered.

Mr. EVANS moved to lay the bill on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays on his motion; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 81, nays 135.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The question, "Shall the main question be now put?" was taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 109, nays 104.

Mr. CHINN called for the special order of the day, being the bills reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested the propriety of first taking up a message from the President of the United States.

After some conversation between various members, by general consent, the special order was postponed for one hour.

FRENCH RELATIONS.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress a report of the Secretary of State, with copies of all the letters received from Mr. Livingston since the message to the House of Representatives of the 6th instant, of the instructions given to that minister; and of all the late correspondence with the French Government, in Paris or in Washington, except a note of M. Serurier, which, for reasons stated in the report, is not now communicated.

It will be seen that I have deemed it my duty to instruct Mr. Livingston to quit France, with his legation, and return to the United States, if an appropriation for the fulfilment of the convention shall be refused by the Chambers.

The subject being now, in all its present aspect, before Congress, whose right it is to decide what measures are to be pursued in that event, I deem it unnecessary to make further recommendation, being confident that, on their part, every thing will be done to maintain the rights and honor of the country, which the occasion requires.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 25, 1835.

The reading of the message and documents having been begun and concluded, being heard with profound attention,

Mr. CAMBRELENG, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, presented the following resolutions, by the wish, as he stated, of a majority of the members of that committee, and moved that they be printed; without, however, any wish that they should be considered to-day.

Resolved, That it would be incompatible with the rights and honor of the United States further to negotiate in relation to the treaty entered into by France, on the 4th of July, 1831; and that this House will insist upon its execution, as ratified by both Governments.

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the President's message as relates to commercial restrictions, or to reprisals, on the commerce of France.

Resolved, That preparations ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, rose to inquire in what form the message of the President, with the accompanying documents, had been disposed of.

Being informed by the Chair that they had not yet been disposed of in any form,

He moved that they be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He said that, when the resolutions moved by the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] were read, he understood them as having been offered by that gentleman in his private capacity as a member of the House, and not as resolutions of the committee; for he believed the committee had not been called together.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed his hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts would withdraw his motion for reference of the message and papers. The gentleman would observe that one of the resolutions was for the discharge of the committee from the further consideration of the subject, that it might be in the hands of the House. He had moved the resolutions, as he had stated on presenting them, by the wish of a majority of the members composing the committee, and not as a measure of his own.

Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts, offered the following resolutions, by way of amendment to the resolutions moved by Mr. CAMBRELENG:

1. Resolved, That the rights of the citizens of the United States to indemnity from the Government of France, stipulated by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 4th of July, 1831, ought in no event to be sacrificed, abandoned, or impaired, by any consent or acquiescence of the Government of the United.

2. Resolved, That if it be, in the opinion of the President of the United States, compatible with the honor and interest of the United States, during the interval until the next session of Congress, to resume the negotiations between the United States and France, he be requested so to do.

3. Resolved, That no legislative measure of a hostile character or tendency towards the French nation is necessary or expedient at this time.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to postpone the further consideration of the whole subject until to-morrow.

Mr. EVERETT said he should not delay the action of the House further than to ask its permission, since the gentleman from New York, at the head of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, had offered three resolutions, expressive of the views of a majority of that committee, (although the subject had not, to his knowledge, been yet acted upon in the committee,) that he, together with two other members of the committee, might send to the Chair a paper containing their views also; and that this might be printed, together with the other resolutions.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped they would be printed.

[There was much sensation in the House: many cries of "No! No!" and others of "Yes, certainly! print!"]

Mr. ARCHER observed that this mode of proceeding, even according to the respective avowals of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT,] was entirely irregular. The gentlemen respectively presented to the House the imbodyed views of a majority, and also of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, requesting that they might be printed; yet, in the same breath, they informed the House there had been no action in the committee, and that the subject had not been considered in it.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained. The committee had had the subject under consideration for more than a week past, although the presentation of the resolutions he had offered had not been determined on in committee, but only by the separate agreement of a majority of its members.

Mr. ARCHER had not the least doubt that the subject generally had been before the thoughts and consideration of the committee all the session; but there had been no definite action of the committee in relation to it; and now resolutions were agreed to by members separately. The proceeding, he repeated, was, in the highest degree, irregular; and he thought that none of the resolutions presented under such circumstances ought to be printed by the House. Let the message and documents be referred to the appropriate committee; and to-morrow let the House have such resolutions as the committee might judge it proper to adopt. Surely, on a subject of such dignity and great national importance, the ordinary forms of the House should not be dispensed with. He was desirous of no delay. The committee would certainly meet in the morning, and then the House would receive their matured views of the whole case, as further illustrated by the message and documents just received. This was the proper, the appropriate, the parliamentary, and the dignified course of action, and he hoped it would be adopted.

Relations with France.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he would adopt the suggestion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia. His only object had been the saving of time, inasmuch as there were now but a few days left of the session. The committee have had the general subject of our relations with France before their consideration during the whole session, and it was but a week since they had instructed him to report, substantially, the same resolutions as he had now offered to the House. But, on the same day on which he was to have performed that duty, important intelligence had been received, which had produced a delay in the presentation of the report. The committee had waited only for an official communication, which, having been now made, the resolutions, after being slightly modified, had been, by agreement of a majority of the committee, laid before the House. Mr. C. moved that the message and documents be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and that the resolutions, as well those offered by Mr. EVERETT as by himself, might be printed.

Mr. ADAMS said that, as the chairman of the committee had assented to the course indicated by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCHER,] he had to request that the amendment he had offered might also be printed with the others.

Mr. COULTER (a member of the committee) considered the course suggested by the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] as certainly the most orderly and parliamentary, and the most proper way, in every view, of disposing of the papers from the Executive. But Mr. C. could see no necessity or propriety in printing the resolutions which had been offered; and for this reason: as the subject had been sent to the committee, it was impossible for the House to say, or officially to anticipate, what the result would be of the committee's deliberations. It was, indeed, very likely that the resolutions which had been offered, or something very like them, would be adopted; but it appeared to him wholly irregular and anomalous to print resolutions offered beforehand, when the subject to which they related had been referred to a committee. He thought the whole of the documents ought to go to the committee, and there was no question but what that committee would report without loss of time.

He would add one word as to the course which had been pursued in the committee. There was no disposition on the part of a portion of the committee to find fault with what had been done by their colleagues; all that had been done, had been done in a spirit of harmony and mutual good understanding. But, at the same time, the course now adopted by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] was the only course which circumstances left to him. It was very true that, three days since, a majority of the committee had agreed to a report, to be made in the name of the committee to the House; but gentlemen constituting a minority of the committee had also agreed upon a different report to be offered by them separately: a report not very materially differing from that of the majority, but having a somewhat different form and aspect. But soon after the committee had adjourned, the recent news had reached the country, in consequence of which no report had been made. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts could not, of course, present the report of the minority; the committee had not, since that time, been called together; but the chairman had gone round to the members individually, and obtained the assent of a majority to the resolutions he had reported. Of course, no opportunity was left to the gentleman from Massachusetts to offer the views of the minority than the present, which he had consequently embraced as the first presented to him. He hoped, if the resolutions offered by the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] were to be received as the report of a majority of the committee, those presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] would in like manner be received as expressing the views of the minority.

Mr. PATTON (another member of the committee) said that he had not been present when the committee met, and he wanted to know whether the resolutions offered by the chairman had been agreed upon since the reception of the documents now communicated. He had supposed that the resolutions were offered by the gentleman from New York as his own; they had been shown to him, a short time since, by that gentleman; but he had understood that it had been for his reflection and consideration. As to those offered by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. EVERETT,] he had never seen them. He was therefore in a predicament such as rendered it impossible for him to give his sanction to either at this time. He was ready for the consideration of them when they should come up in order; in what way they were brought before the House he little cared.

Mr. LETCHER (another member of the committee) rose to suggest that it would be best for all parties to withdraw the resolutions they had offered, for the present; to-morrow, when the committee had considered the subject, they would offer them again, if still so disposed. Possibly, a consideration of the correspondence which had now been submitted to the House might lead them to a different result. It would be most prudent not to do any thing until the committee had met.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said it would give him great pleasure to comply with the suggestion of his colleague on the committee. It was due to himself to state that he had submitted the resolutions he had offered to every member of the committee yesterday. The same, indeed, as he had stated, had been adopted by the committee when together; they were only a little altered in point of form. If he had heard any objection from any member of the committee, he should not have presented them. He had never seen or heard of any report of the minority till now. Mr. C. then withdrew his resolutions.

Mr. EVERETT explained. He had not objected to the presentation of the resolutions by the honorable chairman. All he had asked was, that if they were received by the House, those which he had prepared, as expressive of the views of the minority, should be received also. As to what the honorable gentleman had just remarked, about never having seen or heard of any report, on the part of the minority of the committee, until now, the gentleman's memory must most certainly have deceived him. The gentleman had at least heard of such a report, for he (Mr. E.) had himself suggested that it would be best to report it to the House in conjunction with that to be reported by him.

Mr. CAMBRELENG replied, if it was so, it must have escaped his memory.

Mr. ARCHER complained of these discussions, as being out of order.

Mr. MCKINLEY said that it had been moved to print the message and documents; but if it was intended (as would appear from the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts) to recommend to the President to continue to negotiate, he would ask whether the printing of these papers was likely to facilitate that object. He could not see that any thing was likely to be gained by printing them. If the resolutions were all to be postponed until after the committee had deliberated on the communications now submitted to the House, and had recommended what measures the House should adopt, why print the documents in the meanwhile? Surely such a step would not further the design of continuing to negotiate, and to preserve amicable relations with France. He thought it might be good policy not only to abstain from printing these papers for the House, but even to prohibit their being printed in the newspapers, until the committee should have had time for their inspection, and for full deliberation on their contents. He hoped the printing would not be ordered. He moved to divide the motion to refer and print, so as to take the question in the first place on the reference only.

Bills in relation to the District.

Mr. ADAMS said that, as the resolutions offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] had been withdrawn, the withdrawal of the amendment he proposed would follow of course.

The SPEAKER said the amendment fell, the resolutions having been withdrawn.

Mr. SUTHERLAND thought, perhaps, it would be as well for the House to postpone printing the correspondence until the report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs had been made, which would be to-morrow, so that the correspondence and the report of the committee might go out together.

Mr. CAMBRELENG withdrew his motion to print the message and documents.

The motion to print having been withdrawn,

Mr. WATMOUGH rose and said: Mr. Speaker, whatever may be my own opinion with regard to the correspondence we have just heard read, I do not propose to express that opinion at this time; it would be unseasonable, and quite improper. I rose simply to renew the motion to print, which has just been withdrawn. I think, sir, that much greater injury would result to all the great interests of the country from the ex parte statements which would be the inevitable consequence of the determination to withhold the information we have just received, than can possibly arise from a full perusal of these documents. I therefore renew the motion to print.

Mr. WILDE stated to the House that the printing of all the papers had already been ordered by the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Georgia, was in favor of the printing. The Committee on Foreign Affairs were to report to-morrow measures founded in part on these papers, and the House ought to have the whole before them. Could the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McKINLEY] expect that, after these documents had been read at the Clerk's table, the editors of papers would abstain from noticing them in the public prints? It was impracticable now to keep them concealed; nor, were it otherwise, would their concealment be desirable or proper.

Mr. ADAMS said he hoped the gentlemen who were opposed to the printing would withdraw their objections. If the object was to avoid excitement, an attempt to conceal the papers would counteract it effectually. The public mind would be far more excited by knowing that they had been received but withheld, than by their publication. Indeed, he saw nothing in these documents to cause much excitement beyond what already existed. He hoped they would be printed.

Mr. LYTLE said that if there was any mischief to grow out of these papers going before the public eye, it was already done, by the reading of them in the hearing of the reporters and of the vast concourse which at that moment crowded the galleries of the hall. As a cure for the evil, he proposed that the resolutions which had been offered should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to report them to the House.

The CHAIR pronounced the motion out of order; the resolutions were not before the House.

Mr. McKINLEY said that, as the printing had been ordered by the Senate, he should of course withdraw his opposition to the documents being printed for the House.

Mr. BURGESS hoped the papers would be printed. He saw nothing in them to excite the public mind. They had been openly communicated to the House, with no injunction of secrecy; and why should the House attempt to withhold them from the nation? He thought the House should on this, as on all other matters, proceed step by step with the other branches of the Government.

The printing was ordered.

DISTRICT BILLS.

The House proceeded to the special orders of the day, viz: the bills relating to the District of Columbia.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. MAW in the chair,) and took up the bill concerning the orphans' court, in the county of Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON, of La., moved an amendment providing that the register of wills should not act except in the absence of the judge of the orphans' court.

After some conversation, Mr. J. withdrew the motion; and the committee rose and reported the bill without amendment; when it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. CHINN moved to suspend the rule, in order to have the Senate bill for the benefit of the cities of Washington, Alexandria, and Georgetown, read a second time; and, thereupon, the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JARVIS moved a call of the House.

Mr. CHINN withdrew his motion, and moved that the House go into committee on certain bills relating to the District of Columbia.

Mr. THOMAS, of Md., requested the gentleman from Virginia to except from the motion the bills for a renewal of the charters of the banks of the District.

Mr. CHINN and Mr. VANDERPOEL urged the propriety of renewing the charters, as proposed.

Mr. THOMAS was unwilling, he said, to act on the subject, until a thorough and searching investigation had been instituted in the manner in which the concerns of these banks had been managed. There was no time to consider the subject at this session, and three months of the next session must elapse before it will be necessary for the House to act on the subject. He moved to except from the motion all bills relating to the District banks.

Mr. BEARDSLEY concurred in the views of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. McKENNAN thought, he said, that the charters of the banks which had not suspended specie payments ought to be renewed now, including the deposit banks. As to the banks which had suspended specie payments, it was only proposed to renew their charters one year, in order that a thorough investigation may, in the mean time, be made as to their condition and management.

Mr. THOMAS called for the yeas and nays on his motion, and they were ordered.

The question being taken, the motion was rejected: Yeas 102, nays 66.

So the bills relating to the District banks, were excepted from the motion to go into committee.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the remaining bills included in the motion, (Mr. PIXON, of New Hampshire, in the chair.)

The bill to incorporate the Alexandria Savings Company was taken up.

Mr. GILLET moved to strike out the enacting clause. The reading of the bill being called for, it was read by the Clerk.

Mr. VANDERPOEL explained the nature of the proposed institution.

FEB. 26, 1835.]

Bills in relation to the District.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. GILLET thought that it would possess all the objectionable features of a bank—a monopoly. It was decidedly such an institution as the people of this country have, with a loud voice, condemned; and it was the duty of Congress to carry out the views of the people.

Mr. CHINN denied that this institution partook, in any degree, of the character of a bank; and defended the bill.

Mr. MANN, of New York, was apprehensive that, if his colleague [Mr. VANDERPOEL] would more closely examine this bill, he would discover that it was essentially a savings bank; but he was unwilling to deprive the city of Alexandria of the benefits of our legislation. He hoped his other colleague [Mr. GILLET] would withdraw his opposition, and suffer the bill to pass, after some slight amendment.

Mr. VANDERPOEL replied. He said if the motion to strike out the enacting clause should not prevail, it was his intention to offer an amendment to the bill, to meet the scruples of his colleague, [Mr. MANN.]

Mr. HUBBARD expressed his utter surprise at the evidence of the slightest opposition to this bill. Such institutions had been of immense benefit to the country, in enabling the poor to lay up their scanty earnings. This he had witnessed in his own neighborhood, and he hoped the motion would not prevail.

Mr. FELDER referred to instances in which the managers of such establishments had been guilty of the grossest abuses. He expressed himself opposed to the whole class of these institutions. They were too often bottomed in fraud and swindling.

Mr. FILLMORE proposed an amendment to the third section, providing that no notes should be made payable to the directors. He then proceeded to defend the nature of the proposed incorporation. He deemed it emphatically the poor man's bank, in opposition to the rich man's monopoly.

Mr. POLK spoke against the passage of the bill. He saw nothing in its nature to prevent the investment of the funds of capitalists for purposes of speculation. Neither did he see any injury that could result to the community by its postponement to another session.

Mr. PARKER went into an examination of those institutions. He was opposed to the bill, and thought the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FILLMORE] would not remedy it.

The amendment of Mr. FILLMORE was then agreed to; and Mr. F. then submitted another, relating to the amount of loans and deposits to be made by the company to and by a single individual, limiting the same to $500.

Mr. HARPER spoke in general terms in favor of savings institutions; but he believed the amendments proposed were not entirely sufficient to secure this one from abuse.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said a few words in explanation of the features of the bill.

Mr. GILLET again addressed the House in opposition to the bill, and in favor of his motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. FILLMORE then withdrew his amendment, in order to avoid further discussion.

Mr. PLUMMER said he could not permit the occasion to pass without expressing his decided disapprobation of adding another to the list of banks in this District. He was opposed to corporations of all kinds conferring on a company of men exclusive powers and privileges which were not and could not be enjoyed by the great mass of the people. It was incompatible with that equality of rights intended to be secured by our Government to its individual members. This act of incorporation is said to be for the benefit of the poor man, of the laborer, of the mechanic—a savings institution for the accommodation of the widow and the orphan. Who are these poor men, and who are they that desire this act of incorporation for the safe keeping of their earnings? Are there any petitions on our table from the mechanics and laborers of Alexandria, asking for this charter? Do they acknowledge themselves incapable of managing their own private concerns? Do they desire us to appoint for them guardians over their pecuniary affairs, vested with extraordinary powers and privileges, by which they can control the whole labor and industry of the country? If so, it is evidence conclusive that they do not understand their own interests, or that they need a guardian in fact. It is called in the bill a savings institution, innocent in itself, say gentlemen, and can do no harm. That is but another name for a bank. It is in fact a bank. It is even worse than a bank, because it carries deception on its face. It is an enemy to the laboring portion of the community in disguise. It is a wolf in sheep's clothing. It is a snake in the grass. He could compare the difference between that bill and a bank charter to nothing more appropriate than the difference between a snake in the grass and an open, bold, and avowed enemy. The gentleman from Baltimore thinks there is no danger in it, if conducted by honest men. He (Mr. P.) knew nothing of the standing or character of the individuals named in the bill, nor did he care whether they were honest or dishonest; that would not change the principle. If honest, it was no reason why they should have conferred on them powers and privileges not granted to the rest of the community equally honest. If dishonest, this act would legalize their conduct. It would authorize them to swindle according to law. The very act itself would be to all the world, to the unsuspecting and confiding laborer, a certificate of honesty and good character. Were the members of the committee prepared to certify to their good character, and in consideration thereof pass a law enabling them to collect the hard earnings of the working men, all of their spare cash, into one large mass, and grow fat on the proceeds, without labor? Such would be the result. Because the individuals named in the bill, and those who might become members of the corporation, were honest, that was no reason why the industry of the country should be under their control, which was the inevitable result of all banks. He thanked the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] for a suggestion in relation to the manner in which a similar institution was once got up that came under his observation. Out of the whole number of president, directors, and company, there was not a solvent man among them. Their sole object was to get the money of the neighborhood under their control, and thereby provide some of themselves with a living without labor, as presidents, cashiers, and clerks, and enable others to live by speculating on the accommodations granted to themselves. Such disinterested patriotism and devotion to the interests of the poor, as gentlemen pretended actuated those who had applied for this charter, he had no confidence in. Instead of taking care of the hard earnings of the poor man, their object was to live on the industry of the country without labor, and make those who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow labor for them. That was the true character of the bill. Instead of a saving machine, it would, in all probability, turn out to be a swindling machine, as a similar institution in Baltimore did last winter, adverted to by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. FELDER.] When that institution blew up, nearly the whole of the funds were in the hands of a few of the directors, who purchased the certificates of deposit from the widow and the orphan, and those poor men for whose benefit the charter was granted, at forty or fifty per cent. below par, and paid them with the very money which they had induced them to place under their charge for safe keeping, and discharged their own debts to the institution with their certificates at par. Instead of a benefit, it would operate as a tax on the people of Alexandria. Such was the natural consequence of all such licensed monopolies. There is no limit as to the amount of capital, and the fact urged by those who support the bill, that the corporation have no express power to issue notes and bills, does not do away the main objections. The authority given to regulate the issuing certificates of deposit and the mode of transferring them, confers on the corporation indirectly all of the powers which are conferred by bank charters directly. He would not permit himself to be drawn into a discussion of the details of the bill at that late hour. It would not bear investigation. The more it was examined the worse it would appear. It was sufficient for him that it conferred on a body of men exclusive privileges; that it was such a legalized monopoly as he was opposed to in principle. He thought that the surplus money of the mechanics and laborers of Alexandria had better remain in their pockets, or be loaned to responsible private individuals, whose whole property was liable for the payment of the principal and interest, and not to an irresponsible corporation. If they place their money in an institution such as is proposed by this bill, a portion of it must necessarily stick to the hands of the officers and directors as it passes through the machine. They would never get it all back again. The institution would have to be sustained, and the officers supported, at their expense. He repeated that it was a bank in disguise, and of the most odious character, as would be discovered on examination, and calculated to deceive the people. He should vote for the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GILLET,] to strike out the enacting clause, and hoped that it would prevail. Mr. CHINN owed it to the applicants to defend their reputation. They were unimpeachable, and he believed their intention to be unexceptionable.

Mr. HARRIS expressed his conviction that the bill contained many defects.

The motion to strike out the enacting clause was agreed to.

The bill making appropriations for the support of the penitentiary for the year 1835 was then considered and laid aside.

REVOLUTIONARY BOUNTY LANDS.

The bill granting an additional quantity of land for the satisfaction of revolutionary bounty land warrants was taken up.

Mr. PARKER opposed the bill, and expressed a wish to express his sentiments at large on the subject. But, owing to the lateness of the hour, he moved that the committee rise and report progress on all the bills acted upon.

Mr. J. Y. MASON said, if the motion prevailed, the bill would be defeated, and he was perfectly willing to meet the gentleman's argument now. He hoped the committee would not rise.

Mr. POLK stated that there were now four or five hundred thousand acres of land needed to satisfy existing bounty land warrants.

After some remarks from Messrs. J. Y. MASON, VINTON, HUBBARD, CLAY, EVANS, and MERCER, principally upon the order of proceeding,

Mr. PARKER withdrew the motion, and proceeded to speak in opposition to the bill.

The committee then rose, and reported the above bills, with the exception of the last bill, and they were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 27.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, made the following report, which was read:

"The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred so much of the President's message as concerns our political relations with France, and the correspondence between the ministers of the two Governments, submits the following report:

"At an early period of the session the committee took into consideration the question of authorizing reprisals, and continued from time to time to discuss various motions and resolutions, submitted by its different members. They could, however, concur in no proposition; and, in that condition, a majority deemed it expedient to postpone their decision till further intelligence should be received from France. The committee had, within the week past, twice instructed its chairman to report resolutions, but the arrival of additional intelligence caused a suspension of these reports until an official communication should be received from the Executive. That communication places the relations between the two countries in a novel and interesting position. While there is satisfactory evidence that the French Government earnestly desires that the appropriation for indemnity should be made in pursuance of the stipulations of the treaty, and while there is reason to hope that the Chamber of Deputies will adopt that measure, and faithfully discharge the obligations of France to the United States, it is, on the other hand, to be feared that the conduct of that Government has placed us in a position at least embarrassing, even should it not produce an entire suspension of diplomatic intercourse between the two nations. In this new position of our relations, it is deemed expedient to dispense with further discussion on the subject of non-intercourse with and reprisals on the commerce of France, to which the attention of the committee had been directed, and to leave the question of our political relations with that Government to the next Congress, whose action will no doubt be governed by the course which France may deem it expedient to pursue. We are not yet informed what may have been the decision of the King of the French as to the dismissal of our minister, nor can we conjecture what may be the fate of the appropriation in the Chamber of Deputies.

"While the committee is unwilling to anticipate any but an amicable and favorable result in both cases, it must be recollected that the King and Chamber may decide adversely to the interests and harmony of the two nations. Such a decision on the part of France, however it may be regretted by the people of both countries, who have great and growing interests, commercial and political, to cherish, may lead to a result upon which the committee, while in doubt, and while a hope remains, will not enlarge.

"The committee is therefore of opinion that, at such a crisis, when events may occur which cannot be anticipated, and which may lead to important consequences in our external relations, it would not discharge its duty to the country if it did not express a firm resolution to insist on the full execution of the treaty of 1831, and if it did not recommend to the House a contingent preparation for any emergency which may grow out of our relations with France previous to the next meeting of Congress. It is a gratifying circumstance that our means are adequate to meet any exigency without recourse to loans or taxes. The bill now before the House authorizing the sale of our stock in the Bank of the United States would, if adopted, afford all the revenue necessary. The committee is of opinion that the whole, or a part, of the fund to be derived from that source should be appropriated for the purpose of arming our fortifications, and for making other military and naval preparations for the defence of the country, in case such expenditures should become necessary before the next meeting of Congress.

Relations with France.

[H. OF R.]

"The committee therefore submits the following resolutions for the consideration of the House:

"Resolved, That it would be incompatible with the rights and honor of the United States further to negotiate in relation to the treaty entered into by France, on the 4th of July, 1831, and that this House will insist upon its execution, as ratified by both Governments.

"Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the President's message as relates to commercial restrictions, or to reprisals, on the commerce of France.

"Resolved, That contingent preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France."

Mr. EDWARD EVERETT asked permission of the House to submit the views of the minority of the committee in a report. As it was somewhat long, he would not call for its reading at this time. The minority did not, he said, essentially differ in their views of the subject from the majority; but on one or two points they did not fully concur with the majority, and they had thought it proper to take a more full and historical view of the subject than had been taken by the majority.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that when he remarked yesterday that he had never heard of a report on the part of the minority of the committee, he had not the least idea that the paper now presented was the one referred to. Before the late intelligence was received it was proposed in the committee to move the printing of this document, but it was deferred at the time, and he thought the proposition had been dismissed. He added that the report had not been read by one of the six members who formed a majority of the committee.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS asked whether the report of the minority concluded with any resolutions.

Mr. E. EVERETT replied that it did not.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS said he would now propose the resolutions which he sent to the Chair yesterday.

The resolutions having been read, as printed in yesterday's debates,

Mr. ADAMS requested the Clerk to make a verbal alteration in them, so as to change the word "measures" to "measure," as he said it was written.

In order to be understood by the House and the nation, he thought proper, he said, to explain the manner in which the variations in the different copies of the resolutions, as printed in the newspapers this morning, occurred. His manuscript copy of the resolutions, as they were sent to the Chair, was taken for publication by the editors of the National Intelligencer. He was afterwards applied to for a copy by one of the reporters for the Globe, who expressed a strong desire to have it for publication. He therefore wrote a copy from memory, intending it to be verbatim and literal the same. Some few verbal variations had occurred, but none which affected the sense. He moved the resolutions as an amendment to those reported from the committee.

Mr. ARCHER moved that the report and resolutions be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and be made the order of the day for this day.

Mr. STEWART moved to add, "and printed."

Mr. PHILLIPS hoped the minority report would also be printed.

Mr. ARCHER modified his motion so as to embrace both reports. Finding, he said, that many around him preferred that to-morrow should be assigned for the consideration of the subject, he varied his motion so as to make the subject the order for that day.

The SPEAKER said it would make no difference which day was assigned, as the subject would take its regular station in the calendar, and could not be reached but by postponing all the orders preceding it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND suggested that this was the last day on which bills could be sent to the other House, without a vote of two thirds of both Houses.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested to the gentleman from Virginia, who, he was sure, he said, was as anxious as himself to have this subject acted on, the expediency of withdrawing his motion to commit to the Committee of the Whole, for the reason that, as this was the last day on which a bill could be sent to the other House, the bill referred to in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations must pass to-day.

Mr. ARCHER said he was unwilling to discuss any where else than in the Committee of the Whole a subject of so great magnitude. The House might decide to go instantly into Committee of the Whole, and take up the subject. He could not consent to withdraw his proposition.

Mr. BURGESS hoped, he said, that a question so deeply interesting to the whole country would be discussed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. If the resolutions of the committee passed, the bill referred to could then be taken up.

Mr. POLK rose to correct an error into which the gentleman from New York had fallen, in regard to the position of the bill for the sale of the stock of the Government in the United States Bank. The bill was not in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; it was in the House; and all the orders of the day had been postponed for the purpose of taking it up. But, since that time, other measures had taken precedence of it. He understood that the state of the business was this: the bills on their engrossment first came up, and next the bills in reference to the United States Bank. The third resolution of the committee should be acted on forthwith, to the end that the bill to sell the stock should be acted on to-day. He suggested the propriety of acting on the resolution forthwith. To commit the subject was to bury it.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS said it appeared to him that the course recommended by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ARCHER] was the only constitutional course. As the avowed object of the resolution was to make an appropriation of money, it ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole. The resolution proposed to spend the money of the nation; but its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was objected to, because, if it went there, the House could not be bound to pass it by the previous question. It was, in effect, a proposition to tax the people—to take seven millions of their money and appropriate it to certain purposes. The bill must be referred to the Committee of the Whole, if the resolution was passed. He now discovered that war with France was to be connected with the war with the bank. The two wars were to be united, each supporting the other. To prove that the subject should be committed to the Committee of the Whole, he read the following passages from the rules of the House:

"81. No sum or quantum of tax or duty, voted by a Committee of the Whole House, shall be increased in the House until the motion or proposition for such increase shall be first discussed and voted in a Committee of the Whole House; and so in respect to the time of its continuance.

"82. All proceedings touching appropriations of money shall be first discussed in a Committee of the Whole House."

Is this proceeding, asked Mr. A., one touching the appropriation of money or not? It was certainly a proceeding by which seven millions of the public money was to be taken and expended in a wind-mill war against France; in favor of which, he thanked God, there had yet been no expression of opinion on the part of this House. There were two things which were forced upon his attention in connexion with this subject. In the first place, it was evident that the question was to be managed on party grounds. The supporters of the administration were alone to be heard on the subject; and what they proposed was to be carried. The minority was to have no right to say any thing but "yea" or "nay" to the propositions of the leaders of the majority. In the next place, it was now, for the first time, disclosed that these two wars were to be blended together—the war with France and the war with the bank; one was to carry on the other, if either was too heavy to sustain itself. The proposition of the committee was the reverse of the principle assumed by the Senate, (he hoped it was not out of order to refer to the Senate,) which was the only principle on which we could go to war with France with honor and advantage; and this proposition, he reminded the House, was the result of an act of a minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which the House did not reprobate, as it ought, in his opinion, to have done—the act of displacing the regular chairman of the committee, and substituting another, who was chosen, to say the least of it, by his own vote. [The SPEAKER called the gentleman to order.] I say this, continued Mr. A., merely in illustration of the principle which has been assumed, and which, he thought, was extremely pernicious. It appeared to him that, according to imperative rules of the House, these resolutions could not be acted on by the House without a previous reference of them to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

In the Committee of the Whole the freedom of speech was practically secured. But what would be the course in the House? When the friends of the administration and the acting chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations thought the discussion had gone far enough, they would resort to the previous question. Next we were to be told that we must pass the bill to sell the stock immediately, or not at all. The bugle horn of the party will be sounded, and its friends will be told that they must pass the bill in order to support the administration. When all the liegemen of the administration have answered to their names, as they ought, according to the politics and morals of the party, the question will be put, and the bill passed. The war cry against the bank will be raised; and it will be proclaimed that what the people have in the bank amounts to nothing at all, and that they want to get rid of it. He concluded by repeating that the rules of the House rendered it necessary to commit the subject to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said: I trust, sir, that you and the House will pardon me if I do not respond to the gentleman from Massachusetts in the same temper or tone which he has himself used. He had too much respect, he said, for that gentleman and for himself to retort any of his imputations. He regretted that, on a subject on which unanimity was so desirable, there should have occurred any thing to awaken any personal feelings. It was a question on which the House ought to rise, above party considerations, to the high dignity of its legislative character; and he regretted that the gentleman from Massachusetts had so suddenly descended from the lofty elevation which at one time he had taken on this subject. He disclaimed all idea of connecting the bank with a war against France. The war with the bank was over.

As to the manner of his appointment to the head of the committee, the gentleman had stated what was not authorized by the fact. The gentleman did not mean, perhaps, to be understood, in declaring that he was placed in the chair of the committee by his own vote, as stating that he (Mr. C.) voted for himself—but his language would certainly bear that construction; and the gentleman was undoubtedly aware that such was not the fact. He had not the slightest desire to make this a party question, and he assured the House that any modification of either of the resolutions which would secure the unanimous vote of the House, would be assented to by him with pleasure. With regard to the expediency of making an appropriation to meet any emergency which might arise in the recess of Congress, there was, he believed, but one sentiment among the people of all parties.

He saw this opinion expressed in almost every paper, of whatever politics, which came from the North. The gentleman, he was persuaded, was mistaken in his declaration that this was a party question.

Mr. COULTER said the debate appeared likely to wander into a channel unpropitious to a calm decision of the question. He hoped the House would appreciate the delicacy of the situation in which it was now placed as the popular branch of the Legislature, and consider that the measures which they adopted might prejudice the interests and welfare of fourteen millions of souls. The House was unfortunately so situated that every step they took must have an important bearing on the relations of the two countries.

He therefore hoped that the subject would be approached in regular order, according to the rules of the House, and in the most calm and dispassionate manner. If (said Mr. C.) we do not allow our passions to interfere with our measures, there will be no danger of an unfortunate result, and he therefore hoped the House would take the usual course. The time allowed before the expiration of the session was too short to act on the subject with due deliberation, and he thought it would be better to leave every thing in relation to the subject to the people, or to the next Congress, which might be summoned, if necessary. At all events, this question, above all others, ought to be discussed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union more than any other subject ever presented to the House; it demanded the exercise of the functions of that committee. If it was in order, he would give notice that he would to-morrow move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on this subject. Perhaps, he said, by general consent, it might be agreed to assign to-morrow for the consideration of the subject.

Mr. MERCER expressed his approbation of the temper displayed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the hope that the House would imitate his example.

Mr. BURGESS rose, he said, to implore every one to lay aside every feeling and prejudice which might obscure the mental vision in the consideration of this momentous question. Let every one, he said, forget every thing but that they are Americans. He begged gentlemen to suffer the subject, according to the usual mode of proceeding, to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and not to place it in a condition unfavorable to a deliberate and sober discussion.

Mr. BRIGGS moved the suspension of the rule, in order to assign to-morrow for the consideration of the subject.

Mr. BEARDSLEY wished, he said, to call the attention of the House to the effect of going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The CHAIR said no discussion was in order.

Mr. PINCKNEY asked if it was in order to move to lay the whole subject on the table.

The CHAIR said there was a motion to suspend the rule pending.

Mr. ARCHER gave notice, that he, to-morrow at 12 o'clock, would move to suspend the rule, in order to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The object would be attained, if the subject was referred to that committee, by the notice he had given.

After some remarks from Mr. MARSHALL and the CHAIR, on the mode of proceeding,

Mr. BURGESS obtained leave to move that the House meet to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

Mr. EVANS moved an amendment, providing that the House, for the remainder of the session, meet at 10 o'clock; in which form the motion was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. BURGESS to suspend the rule was then agreed to.

Mr. COULTER now moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to-morrow at 11 o'clock, to take up and consider the reports and resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that they be printed.

Mr. McKENNA moved to amend the motion by substituting 1 o'clock to-day. He said there were many subjects before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union which were as important as this to his constituents and to the Union.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS desired leave to make some explanations in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMERON,] but it was objected to.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said the proposition was to refer the subject to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to be taken up to-morrow at 11 o'clock. He was in favor of the time fixed for the consideration of the subject, but he hoped the gentleman from Pennsylvania would not insist upon designating the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union as the place for considering it. He had no objection to as full and as ample a debate as the time would admit. But if we meant to have a vote on the subject, it ought to be kept in such a shape that the House could control it. Many gentlemen were ready and prepared to speak on the subject, and would occupy all the time till the morning of adjournment.

He would not go so far as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] formerly did, and say, when the Executive recommends, I will not deliberate, but act; but after some days of deliberation he hoped the House would be ready to act. To refer the subject to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union would put it beyond the power of the House ultimately to decide the question. He moved to strike out so much of the motion as proposed to commit the subject to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MERCER said it would be at any time in the power of the committee to rise and report the subject to the House. He regretted that the force of the considerations urged in favor of considering the subject in the Committee of the Whole was not felt.

Mr. STEWART hoped, he said, that the motion would be modified so as to conform to the suggestion of his colleague. If the House went into Committee of the Whole on the subject, it would consume the balance of the session, and defeat every other measure. To defer the subject till to-morrow would give one night for concocting speeches; but, by acting to-day, the question would be sooner decided, and with more unanimity. The course proposed would, he thought, be highly detrimental to the public interests, and produce discord on a subject on which the House ought to be unanimous. He would make one remark in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts. He argued that the subject must go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, because it involved an appropriation of money. But there was no appropriation in the resolution. He was clearly of opinion that we ought to act on the subject in the House to-day.

Mr. GREENELL replied. When he heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEWART] opposing with so much ardor the proposal to go into Committee of the Whole House, on a subject of such grave national importance, and to retain the discussion in the House, where the previous question might, at any moment, be sprung, and the debate arrested, he seemed to see an image of the Cumberland road dancing before the gentleman's imagination, and haunting him with fears for the fate of some grand scheme respecting that work. How well founded were the apprehensions which seemed equally to trouble the minds of other gentlemen, that the subject would be detained in Committee of the Whole until it was too late for any action by the House? Where was a case to be found that would justify such an apprehension? Was there an instance on record where great national measures had been smothered by being referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? There was none. He felt assured there was enough of good sense and of patriotic feeling among the members of this House to judge when discussion ought to cease, and when decisive action ought to be resorted to. Ought not a subject to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, which deeply affected the foreign relations of the country, and indirectly involved the appropriation of vast sums of money—a question which touched the revenue? Could the House determine otherwise, he should indeed be amazed. There was not the least danger that this subject would receive the action of the House, whatever might become of others, which, unless this debate should speedily be brought to a close, must, in all probability, be lost for this session, if not for ever.

Mr. WILDE demanded the yeas and nays on Mr. BEARDSLEY's amendment to strike out the reference to a Committee of the Whole, and they were ordered by the House.

The question being put, the vote was reported: Yeas 112, nays 110,

So it appeared that the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then agreed to.

But Mr. MINER, of Connecticut, stated that there had been an error in recording his vote; he had voted in the negative on the amendment, and his name had been recorded as in the affirmative.

Mr. BRIGGS thereupon moved that the record be corrected.

Mr. ANTHONY said that the names had been called over, and if any mistake had occurred it should have been corrected immediately; a vote had been taken since, and it was now too late.

Mr. MINER again declared that he had voted in the negative.

Mr. GAMBLE, of Georgia, said that examples were on record where the journal had been corrected in such a case, even on the day following.

Mr. WISE protested against any question's being put. He insisted on the right of the member to have his vote correctly recorded, whether the House gave leave or refused it; otherwise, a man would virtually be compelled to vote contrary to his own will.

Mr. BARRINGER remonstrated with warmth against having any question made in the case. What would be the condition of the House, could such a precedent be established? It would put the vote of every member of the House at the mercy of the Clerk, or of a majority. He had not the least idea of any improper conduct by the Clerk in this case, and hoped that officer would not so understand him; but he protested against the precedent. It was the right of every member to have his vote recorded as he had given it; and it was the duty of the Speaker to see that the journal was correctly kept. He protested against any question's being put to the House.

H. OF R.]

Writs of Error to the Supreme Court.

[FEB. 27, 1835.]

The journal was corrected by universal assent, without any formal vote; when the votes being summed up more deliberately, the result appeared to be: Yeas 110, nays 111.

So the amendment of Mr. BEARDSLEY was not agreed to.

And it was agreed that the vote which had followed the erroneous proclamation of the former decision, (viz: that agreeing to Mr. COULTER's motion as supposed to have been amended,) should be considered as a nullity, having been founded in a mistake.

The question, therefore, now recurred on agreeing to the resolution of Mr. COULTER, to commit.

Mr. LYTLE moved to reconsider the vote rejecting Mr. BEARDSLEY's amendment.

On this motion Mr. BEARDSLEY demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. EVANS, after some remarks on the tenacity of gentlemen in refusing a Committee of the Whole on so important a measure, moved to lay Mr. LYTLE's motion upon the table.

Mr. MERCER inquired whether that would not, if adopted, dispose of the whole subject.

The CHAIR deciding in the affirmative,

Mr. EVANS withdrew his motion.

The question of reconsideration was thereupon put, and decided, by yeas and nays, in the negative: Yeas 111, nays 113.

So the House refused to reconsider.

Mr. CLAY inquired whether, should the resolution of Mr. COULTER be laid upon the table, the reports of the majority and minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs would not come up to-morrow morning, as the unfinished business, and take precedence of all other business unfinished.

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative.

Mr. CLAY, after some remarks in opposition to a commitment of the subject to the Committee of the Whole, and the necessity of retaining it within the power of the House, moved to lay Mr. COULTER's resolution on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. E. EVERETT inquired whether this would not dispose of the whole subject.

The CHAIR replied that it would prevent any resolution of a similar kind from being made.

After some conversation on the point of order,

Mr. CLAY withdrew his motion; and, after a few other remarks against the commitment, resumed his seat.

Mr. REED said he would hazard the assertion that no subject of so grave importance would be maturely presented to the House had ever taken any other course than a reference to a Committee of the Whole House. Why should this? Because some gentlemen were in a great hurry for the passage of bills of far less moment. They feared that, if the subject once got into Committee of the Whole, it would be too much discussed. But was there no danger, on the other side, that if it did not go to committee it would not be enough discussed? He hoped a subject of such vast importance would be maturely considered and thoroughly investigated. No gentleman, he trusted, had a wish to prevent action of the House, even if it were in his power; but it would not be. The committee could at any time be discharged, and the House take the subject into its own hands.

Mr. SPEIGHT reminded Mr. REED of the cases of the force bill and the bill to recharter the Bank of the United States, neither of which was allowed to go to a Committee of the Whole. Mr. S. felt very indifferent, however, whether the subject was committed or not; he had no idea that any thing would be done at this session which would affect the national character either one way or the other.

Mr. REED said that those were bills of far less consequence than the subjects now pending.

Mr. BEARDSLEY moved a call of the House; but it was refused.

The question being then put on Mr. COULTER's resolution, to commit the message, papers, and resolution, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and considering it at eleven o'clock to-morrow, it was carried: Yeas 116, nays 107.

So the resolution was agreed to.

WRITS OF ERROR TO THE SUPREME COURT.

The bill authorizing a writ of error to the Supreme Court in cases of patent rights having been read,

Mr. BATES opposed the bill with earnestness, and referred to a combination of papermakers against an individual, who had made a valuable improvement in the manufacture of paper.

Mr. BRIGGS spoke in reply, and defended the bill, and contended against the patentee referred to by Mr. BATES, insisting that he had no just right to his patent; and yet would recover from five hundred thousand to a million of dollars from the papermakers, and yet they had no right of appeal to the Supreme Court. This bill went to secure them the right.

Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland, said he was unexpectedly called on to consider this bill, but he esteemed the principle involved in it too important to avoid its discussion, solely because of want of preparation.

The bill proposed to grant an appeal to an individual who felt aggrieved by the decision of one of the circuit courts on a contested patent right. If it was passed, this House would have disregarded the provisions of the judiciary law of 1789, without good cause. In the law of 1789, an attempt had been made to fix a boundary between the jurisdictions of the several courts established by the United States. In some cases, the decision of the circuit courts was final; in others, an appeal was granted to the Supreme Court. In all cases when the constitutionality of a law was questioned, the Supreme Court had jurisdiction by appeal; because he supposed the framers of our judiciary system thought questions of that character were of sufficient dignity to need all the knowledge and wisdom of the seven judges on the Supreme Court bench to revise and decide them finally. When the two branches of the national Legislature, with the sanction of the executive department, had passed a law, there appeared to be no propriety in permitting any court, inferior either in numbers or attainment to those who presided in the Supreme Court, to adjudge it to be null and void. In other cases, by the sum in controversy, suitors were empowered to ascertain when and where the right of appeal was withheld or granted. If the amount in controversy in any case pending upon the circuit court exceeded $2,000, then either of the parties had a right to appeal to the highest judicial tribunal. This bill attempted to suspend the law of 1789, by which the boundaries of the jurisdiction of these several courts were thus established. The constitutionality of the patent of law in this case has not been controverted, neither is it pretended that the amount in controversy exceeds $2,000. Why then should Congress interfere? The House cannot fail to see that this bill must be a precursor of numerous bills of the same character. If we refuse to permit the decision of our circuit court to be final in the construction of the patent law, then we must relieve against the decision of the same tribunals, where the true construction of the tariff laws was the matter in issue. In fact, the Committee on the Judiciary had before them a petition from Mr. Sarchet, of Philadelphia, a person well known for his efficient, persevering opposition to the tariff of 1828, asking from Congress a special law to enable him to appeal to the Supreme Court against the decision of the circuit court of Pennsylvania, by which he was compelled to pay duties to the United States on articles which he thought were not liable to pay duties to the Government. How could the committee, or the House, with propriety grant an appeal in this case, and withhold it from Sarchet? In his case, the amount in controversy did not exceed $10,000; yet the decision thereon was a rule of conduct for all other persons importing articles of a character such as he had introduced into the country, and thereby thousands of persons and tens of thousands of property might, and possibly would, be affected. He had been opposed to a special law for the old patriotic blacksmith, and he was, for these reasons, opposed to interfering in those cases where the numbers of parties alone gave consequence to this petition. The member from Massachusetts [Mr. BATES] might be forced from the straight line by the clamors of unreasonable constituents, but he would not, and he hoped the House would not, be driven from safe moorings by any such impulses. He was for a general rule, applicable to all, and if the House thought proper to revise the judiciary law of 1789, he was willing to inquire into the expediency of providing that appeals should be granted from the decisions of the circuit court in cases where the amount in controversy was less than $2,000. But, until the general law was changed, he was disposed to enforce it against all parties, unless some very grievous inconvenience had been shown to exist. In this case he saw no great hardship. The party petitioning had enjoyed the benefit of a trial by jury of his own neighbors, and the privilege of a hearing before two talented and enlightened judges of his vicinage, in a contest with a stranger to both tribunals, and he did not think there was much cause to complain.

Mr. WISE moved to lay the bill on the table; which was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 63, nays 61.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House next proceeded to consider the resolutions submitted by Mr. GILMAN, relative to amendments to the constitution of the United States.

And the question being on the amendment moved by Mr. GILMAN thereto, (reviving a free election in case of the death of one of the candidates,)

Mr. G. said that, with a view to the accommodation of gentlemen who felt much interest in the discussion of the resolutions, he would for the present withdraw his amendment.

The question then recurring on the first resolution, which is as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following amendments to the constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the constitution, to wit:

1st. No person who shall have been elected President of the United States shall be again eligible to that office:

Mr. GORHAM said that, from the aspect of the House, he could scarcely believe that one of the most fundamentally important measures that could be proposed to it was under consideration. He had been one of the select committee to whom the subject had been referred; they had had it frequently before them, and, after comparing their respective views, had found it utterly impossible to agree on any conclusion. They had, therefore, determined to ask to be discharged from its consideration; and Mr. G. had been greatly astonished, after the chairman [Mr. GILMAN] had reported that request, to hear him in the same breath move the resolutions in his own name. He put it to gentlemen, whether any good consequence could possibly result from a discussion of such a question at such a period of the session. Would any decision by the House under such circumstances be received by the country as the sound, deliberate expression of its judgment on a great and fundamental question of constitutional law? He regretted to interfere with the wishes of gentlemen, but he was constrained to move that the resolutions be laid on the table.

On this question the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PATTON moved a call of the House.

Mr. BRIGGS moved an adjournment.

The yeas and nays were ordered on this motion, and being taken, stood: Yeas 38, nays 126.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. PATTON now withdrew his motion for a call, but Mr. GILLET immediately renewed it, and demanded the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them.

The question being put on a call of the House, it was negatived.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved an adjournment, and demanded the yeas and nays, but they were refused, and the motion to adjourn was rejected.

The motion of Mr. GORHAM to lay the resolutions on the table then coming up, the yeas and nays were taken, and resulted as follows: Yeas 40, nays 127.

The question recurring on the resolutions, they were read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following amendments to the constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the constitution, to wit:

1st. No person who shall have been elected President of the United States shall be again eligible to that office.

2d. Hereafter, the President and Vice President of the United States shall be chosen by the people of the respective States, in the manner following:

On the first Monday and succeeding Tuesday and Wednesday in the month of August, 1836, and the same days in every four years thereafter, an election shall be held for President and Vice President of the United States, at such places and in such manner as elections are held by the laws of each State for members of the most numerous branch of the Legislature thereof. And the citizens of each State who possess the qualifications of electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature shall then and there vote for President and Vice President of the United States, one of whom shall not be an inhabitant of the same State with themselves. And the superintendents or persons holding elections in each election district shall immediately thereafter make returns thereof to the Governor of the State.

And it shall be the duty of the Governor, together with such other persons as shall be appointed by the authority of each State, to ascertain the result of said returns, and the person receiving the greatest number of votes for President, and the one receiving the greatest number of votes for Vice President, shall be holden to have received the whole number of votes which the State shall be entitled to give for President and Vice President; which fact shall immediately be certified by the Governor, and sent to the seat of Government of the United States, to each of the Senators in Congress from such State, to the President of the Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The places and manner of holding such elections, of canvassing the votes, making the returns thereof, and ascertaining their result, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof. But Congress may, at any time, make or alter such regulations. Congress shall have the power of altering the times of holding the elections; but they shall be held on the same days throughout the United States, and of altering the time hereinafterwards prescribed for the assembling of Congress every fourth year. The Congress of the United States shall be in session on the second Monday in October, in the year 1836, and on the same day in every fourth year thereafter; and the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, shall, as soon as convenient and practicable, proceed to open all the certificates and returns, and the electoral votes of the States shall be thereupon counted. The person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of votes given. But if no person shall have such majority, or if the person having the majority of the whole number of votes given shall have died before the counting of the votes, then a second election shall be held on the first Monday and succeeding Tuesday and Wednesday, in the month of December then next ensuing, which shall be confined to the persons having the two highest number of votes at the preceding election. But if two or more persons have the highest and an equal number of votes, then the person having the highest number of votes: Provided, however, if, in the first election, there were but two persons voted for, and the person receiving the highest number of votes shall have died before the counting of the votes, then, in the second election, the choice shall not be confined to the person previously voted for, but any person may be voted for who may be otherwise qualified by the constitution to be President of the United States; which second election shall be conducted, the returns made, the votes counted, and the result of the election in each State certified by the Governor, in the same manner as in its first; and the final result of the election shall be ascertained in the same manner as the first, and at such time as shall be fixed by law or resolution of Congress; and the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be President; but if two or more persons shall have received an equal and the highest number of votes at the second election, or if the person who shall have received the majority of the whole number of votes given at the second election shall have died before the counting of the votes, then the House of Representatives shall choose one of the remaining number of the persons voted for, for President, in the manner now prescribed by the constitution. But if there shall have been but two persons voted for in the second election, and the person who shall have received the highest number of votes shall have died before the counting of the votes, the Vice President then in office shall be President for the next succeeding term. The person having the greatest number of votes for Vice President, at the first election, shall be Vice President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of votes given: and if no person shall have received such majority, or if the person who shall have received the majority of the whole number of votes given shall have died before the counting of the votes, then, of the persons having the two highest number of votes, the Senate shall choose one for Vice President; but if two or more persons have the highest and an equal number of votes, then the Senate shall choose a Vice President from the persons having the highest number of votes; but if there shall have been but two persons voted for, and the person who shall have received the highest number of votes shall have died before the counting of the votes, then the remaining person shall be Vice President; or if all the persons voted for shall have died before the counting of the votes, then the Senate shall choose one of their own body for Vice President.

4th. No Senator or Representative shall be appointed to any civil office, place, or emolument, under the authority of the United States during the time for which he was elected, and for six months afterwards.

Mr. H. EVERETT said he should vote in favor of the first and third, but against the second of the resolutions. He was in favor of giving the election of President to the people, but not by joint ballot; if it were amended so as to allow of voting by districts, he should be in favor of the resolutions. The amendments proposed in the first and third resolutions had been recommended by the present Executive in 1829, and in every annual message since, until the present year. The questions were not new either to the Legislature or to the people. He did not doubt the mind of every gentleman was made up respecting them; and as he felt confident of having the unanimous vote of the friends of the administration, there could be no impropriety in moving the previous question, which he did, upon the whole of the resolutions, and asked that the question might be taken separately on each.

The motion for the previous question was now seconded: Ayes 56, noes not counted.

The question recurring on the first resolution in order,

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved an adjournment, and called for the yeas and nays; which were taken and resulted as follows: Yeas 59, nays 112.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question again recurring on the first resolution,

Mr. PLUMMER, of Mississippi, said that, in order rightly to understand a subject touching organic law, it was sometimes necessary to go back to first principles. In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth, [Mr. PAXTON here called to order.] and God made man in his own image—

Mr. PEYTON, Mr. EVANS, and Mr. WISE, here called Mr. PLUMMER to order.

The SPEAKER said he had been waiting to see how the gentleman was about to connect what he had said with the subject before the House. Irrelevant remarks were certainly out of order.

[The noise in the House was very great; and a general sensation pervaded the House.]

Mr. PLUMMER resumed. He regretted that his remarks should have occasioned any excitement in the House. He had not often troubled the House; having risen but once or twice this session, and then the House had refused to grant him any special favor. On one occasion, however, the House had almost unanimously voted that they preferred hearing him speak to granting the motion he had submitted.

Here the calls to order were renewed. The confusion increased. The CHAIR said the gentleman must confine himself to the subject before the House.

Mr. PLUMMER resumed. The subject before the House was a proposition to change an organic law of the land; to alter that sacred instrument which had been handed down to us by our patriotic fathers; and for which they had pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. If this was too sacred a subject on which to make a scriptural quotation, he should like to know on what subject it would be proper to quote that sacred book. As he remarked when he commenced, it was proper in discussing subjects of this nature to refer to first principles. "So God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him."

[Cries of "Order! Order," were now renewed from various quarters.]

Mr. WISE said he had called the gentleman to order, and he would explain why. There were different ways of defeating measures. [Cries of order!] and there was no man who could not do something to defeat them.

FEB. 27, 1835.]

Amendments to the Constitution.

[H. OF R.]

[Here Mr. WISE was called to order by various voices.]

The CHAIR said the gentleman from Virginia must state his point of order.

Mr. WISE said that he was just about to state it; and he should state it in his own way. [Cries of order.] One way to defeat a measure to which a member was opposed was to speak it to death. [Here Mr. WISE was loudly called to order, and much confusion prevailed in the hall.] He said he was stating his point of order, and should not be called down. What he wanted to ask of the Chair was, whether a measure might thus be attempted to be defeated by actual profanity.

Mr. EVANS said he also had called the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. PLUMMER] to order, but on a different ground from that just stated. He considered the remarks of the gentleman as wholly irrelevant and impertinent to the subject before the House, and such as ought not to be allowed. He hoped the House would determine the question of order.

The CHAIR said that the course of remark in which the gentleman had indulged seemed to be out of order; but the Chair had been waiting to see in what way he intended to connect them with the subject under discussion. So far as they were irrelevant to that subject, they were certainly not in order.

Mr. PLUMMER inquired whether he might be permitted to explain.

[Cries of no! no! order! take your seat! order!]

Mr. ARCHER said that the rules of the House directed that, when a member was called to order by the Chair, he must take his seat, and could not proceed without the permission of the House.

Mr. PLUMMER asked if he could explain.

[Order! no! no! sit down!]

Mr. ARCHER asked that the question might be put, and the sense of the House taken on allowing the gentleman to proceed.

Mr. PLUMMER inquired whether he might not be allowed to explain.

[Great noise and confusion.]

Mr. LOVE said that he hoped the gentleman from Mississippi would be allowed to proceed. He felt assured that the gentleman's own good sense and regard to propriety would restrain him from going into a course of remark irrelevant to the subject, or disrespectful to the House. Let us hear him.

Mr. PLUMMER asked if the House would hear his explanation. It was usual to permit members, when called to order to explain.

The SPEAKER said that he felt reluctant to refuse the gentleman liberty to explain. He presumed the House would consent to an explanation.

The House appearing to acquiesce,

Mr. PLUMMER said that he had not been aware that he was out of order in the remarks he had made. The proposition before the House was to amend the constitution of the United States; and his object had been to go back to show the origin of Government, and thence to proceed to the origin of our own Government; and he had quoted the Holy Scriptures to show the origin of man as well as of Government, [great laughter.] It had been far from his intention to keep the subject off by speaking from the point. There had been nothing like a concerted plan, as the gentleman from Virginia seemed to insinuate; and so far he pronounced the remarks of that gentleman untrue. There was nothing like a plan to defeat the measure; and he was opposed to having the gag-law forced upon him in the discussion of a great constitutional question. Here Mr. P. was again called to order.

Mr. ANTHONY then demanded the yeas and nays on the question of allowing Mr. PLUMMER to proceed. This was too important a question, he said, to be passed over. He wanted to know whether the mouths of gentlemen on that floor were to be gagged in this way.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken, resulted as follows: Yeas 136, nays 39.

So the House determined that Mr. PLUMMER should be permitted to proceed.

Mr. PLUMMER said that he had prepared himself to discuss the constitutional question to the best of his abilities. He had never enjoyed the benefit of a classical education, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] had, nor was it expected by the House that he should deliver as classical a speech as that gentleman could. But he had prepared himself as well as he was able, and had availed himself of the views of gentlemen much better qualified to discuss such a question than he could pretend to be, and he had followed the example of those gentlemen in consulting the best written arguments to which he could obtain access; and he had believed that he was going to deliver a speech which he could afford to get printed in a pamphlet form, and which would be very acceptable among his constituents.

It occasioned him great regret that any gentleman should suspect him of a design to intrude upon the time of the House at such a moment as this, or to sport with the feelings of the House or of any member of it, or to permit himself to be used as a tool by any man or set of men whatever. He assured gentlemen that he was utterly incapable of any such course. It was very true that he had intended, in the speech he wished to deliver, to make an avowal of his political creed, and a full exposition of the principles of the working-men of Mississippi, perhaps, which might have given offence to some one of the two or three or more parties into which the House was divided. He had, however, felt but little confidence in his capacity to address the House. Indeed, he believed that he had had too little confidence in himself, and had put too low an estimate on his own powers, since he had now learned, by the vote just taken, that he was much more popular with the House than he had thought himself to be. In gratitude for that vote, and with the purpose of showing that his object had not been to speak against time, or to defeat the measure by a side-wipe, he should content himself by having the manuscript of the speech he had prepared printed, for the use of his constituents, and yielding the floor to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] who was so much better calculated to make a display than he was.

Mr. EVANS then addressed the House. He had felt a strong repugnance to claim their attention, notwithstanding the importance of the subject, in consequence of the short time remaining of the session. He was averse to changes in the constitution, and the resolutions he deemed objectionable. There was but one which he could feel disposed to countenance; and that was the proposition to restrict the presidential term to six years. There was a generally pervading sentiment among the people of this country, in favor of that project, and he might be induced to yield to it his assent, though he did not esteem it of essential importance. He was utterly opposed to all the remainder. First, they recognised the plurality system of elections, while various States adhered to the majority mode, and held the other most unsafe and impolitic. It would be deemed extremely unjust in the latter to ask or compel the former to abandon their views and adopt the majority system. Again, they abolished the district system, which would destroy the influence and power of the smaller States. A majority of one vote, in the largest State, might control all of her forty electors, and cause them to be thrown for an individual. Had the last election been conducted on the district system, it would have been seen to have been a much more closely contested one than it had been supposed to be. Mr. E. said, if this resolution was so modified as to give prevalence to the district system of electing, he did not know but he might be induced to go for it. The third resolution he considered decidedly the best of the three, though even for this he could see no urgent necessity. He had been anxious to have these resolutions calmly deliberated upon by the House, and had thrown no obstacles in the way of their discussion. If he could not vote for them himself, he would not bar the opinions of others. It would require two thirds of the House to sanction them, and in their custody he believed they could safely be reposed.

Mr. BOULDIN said that, considering the immense amount of business before the House, and the short time for calm reflection on such an important topic, he should feel impelled to vote against all three of the resolutions. But, in doing so, he wished to be distinctly understood that he expressed no opinion on their merits or expediency.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved that the House adjourn. The question was taken by yeas and nays, and carried: Ayes 96, noes 71.

So, at half past eight o'clock, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. MASON, of Virginia, in the chair,) and the committee proceeded to consider the following resolutions, which were read:

"Resolved, That it would be incompatible with the rights and honor of the United States, further to negotiate in relation to the treaty entered into by France on the 4th of July, 1831, and that this House will insist upon its execution, as ratified by both Governments.

"Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the President's message as relates to commercial restrictions, or to reprisals, on the commerce of France.

"Resolved, That contingent preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France."

The following resolutions, offered by Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts, as a substitute for the above resolutions, were also read:

"1. Resolved, That the rights of the citizens of the United States to indemnity from the Government of France, stipulated by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 4th of July, 1831, ought in no event to be sacrificed, abandoned, or impaired, by any consent or acquiescence of the Government of the United States.

"2. Resolved, That if it be, in the opinion of the President of the United States, compatible with the honor and interest of the United States, during the interval until the next session of Congress, to resume the negotiations between the United States and France, he be requested so to do.

"3. Resolved, That no legislative measure of a hostile character or tendency towards the French nation is necessary or expedient at this time."

Mr. CAMBRELENG said (when the reporter was able to hear his voice above the general conversation in the House) that, in order to procure the unanimity which was so desirable on this question, he would be perfectly content to vote for any modification of the first resolution which the House would unite upon. For the same purpose he would willingly dispense with the last resolution altogether; because, when the bill making appropriations for fortifications came up, he would make a motion which would be more efficient than a merely declaratory resolution. He wished, moreover, to disconnect the subject from that of the Bank of the United States, and he assured the gentleman from Massachusetts that the object of the committee in referring to the sale of the bank stock of the United States, as a resource in case of war, was to show to the country and to France that we were able, if driven to it, to support a war without an immediate resort to loans, and not, as that gentleman supposed, any poor, miserable spite against the bank. His object in offering to assent to these modifications was, in part, to avoid a long debate, and to secure unanimity of action on the subject.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS said he was desirous that the resolutions offered should be considered separately. The resolutions presented by the gentleman who acts as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations proposed a system of measures dependent on each other. His own resolutions were also connected together, and dependent one upon another. It might be that the committee would prefer to adopt a part of his resolutions, and a part of those of the gentleman from New York. He wished, therefore, that the question might be taken on each resolution separately, and that the first question taken might be on the substitution of his first resolution for the first resolution proposed by the gentleman.

[The CHAIR suggested that, under a rule of the House, the question on striking out and inserting was not divisible, and that the object of the gentleman would be best attained by withdrawing two of the resolutions and offering the other.]

Mr. ADAMS resumed. It was, of course, he said, to him a matter of entire indifference how the object was attained. The resolutions offered by the gentleman from New York might, perhaps, prove to be more acceptable to the committee than his own, and he did not wish to force the committee to take a vote on either of the propositions as a whole. He therefore moved that the first resolution of the gentleman be stricken out, and the first resolution offered by himself be inserted.

Mr. A. said he would state, in a few words, his objections to the resolution of the gentleman from New York, and the reasons which induced him to prefer the resolution which he had proposed as a substitute for it. He should say very little of what he had wished to say, and what he believed it might be of public advantage to say, if there was time for the purpose; but should confine himself to a very few remarks, indeed. Sir, said Mr. A., the resolution reported by the gentleman from New York begins by a declaration that it "will be incompatible with the rights and honor of the United States further to negotiate in relation to the treaty entered into by France on the 4th of July, 1831, and that this House will insist upon its execution, as ratified by both Governments."

Sir, I object to both parts, and to the whole substance of this resolution. The situation of the two countries towards each other is not such as to make proper a declaration that we will not negotiate with France. This arises from a principle of national law. When a nation; in the midst of a controversy with another, says we will no longer negotiate, the only alternative compatible with its honor and interests is war. It is not proper, therefore, that this House should declare that there should be no further negotiation. Sir, negotiation implies no concession. My resolutions are so drawn as to declare that there shall be no concession on our part upon this point. My resolutions declare that the rights of the citizens of the United States to indemnity from the French Government, stipulated by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 4th of July, 1831, ought, in no event, to be sacrificed, abandoned, or impaired, by any consent or acquiescence of the Government of the United States. Here the ground is taken, that the United States will take nothing but an absolute fulfilment of the treaty. In that determination (said Mr. A.) I, for one, am willing to adhere; and I hope the House is willing to adhere. I have no hesitation in saying that if, together with negotiation, this determination is not sufficient to preserve the peace of the country, I, for one, am willing to take the hazard of war. I believe the interest and honor of the country are at stake upon the question. Let not gentlemen believe that the question is the same now that it was before the treaty was made. It was not a question whether our citizens were entitled to indemnity, and whether they should receive it or not; but it was a question whether France should be held or not to the fulfilment of the treaty. This is a totally different question from that which was presented before the conclusion of the treaty. Before that time the claims were unsettled, and uncertain in amount. They were admitted by a treaty which was itself a compromise, and a most liberal compromise on our part. The President himself tells us that the indemnity provided by the treaty is not adequate to the satisfaction of the just claims of our countrymen.

The indemnity was stipulated by that department of the French Government, which was authorized to pledge the faith of the nation to its payment. The question is no longer whether indemnity is due, or to what amount; but the question is, whether we will suffer a nation to violate its engagements to us, entered into under a solemn treaty. Where would we be, if we did not take the ground to compel France to do—what? Justice, justice. There is no question of countervailing claims, by way of offset; none of amount involved. The only question is, whether we shall hold France to the fulfilment of her engagements. What will be the consequence if we give up the treaty? if we consent to any compromise or concession? Every nation in the world will violate its engagements with us. The pledges of nations to us would become as idle words, and they will set them and your resentment at defiance whenever they please. The subject, as it was presented to Congress by the President, at the commencement of the session, was entirely different, in its aspect, from the subject as it now stands. The President, in presenting the subject, then recommended, in the event of the rejection of the appropriation necessary to carry the treaty into effect by the Chambers, a resort to reprisals on French property. Sir, I have said in this House that, whatever might be thought of the prudence of that recommendation, the general sense of mankind would approve its spirit: and I say it now, that will be the sense of mankind in regard to the course proposed by the Chief Magistrate, both now and to all posterity. It was supposed by many, from this declaration, that I was in favor of the measure, though I explicitly declared at the time that I was not. I considered the measure recommended as imprudent, and, if I had been of his councils at the time, I would have advised him against it. But there was no injustice in it. There was nothing in it unwarranted by the laws of nations, and I do not know that he did not take better counsel than I should have given him. I do not know that I may not be obliged to recall my opinion even of the imprudence of the measure. I do not know, none of us yet know, what may be its effect. Some suppose that it may have the effect of preventing the Government of France from fulfilling the stipulations of the treaty, and others suppose that it will expedite and secure their fulfilment.

It may be that what I deem imprudent, was only bold; and, in the public and private intercourse of men with one another, there are numberless examples where boldness is itself the profoundest prudence. The great master of human nature well knew this when he said,

"rashness

(And praised be rashness for it) lets us know
Our indiscretion sometimes serves us well
When our deep plots do fail."

At this time there is a great struggle between the two parties into which we are divided, on the question to whom the credit of the appropriation will be due, if it be made. I find in a paper friendly to the administration, (the Globe) a letter of congratulation on the prospect opened for the adjustment of the question. The writer says:

"The opposition seems confounded this morning, and even the most desperate in their ranks say the President has had the good fortune to take the right course in this matter. Chance has had no hand in it, my friend; it is parcel of his great, fair, and clear course."

So says the Globe. What says a print of an opposite political character—the National Intelligencer:

"The complexion of the news from France is more and more favorable to the preservation of peaceful relations between that country and this; which, as we believe it to be now sincerely the desire of the discreet men of all parties in this country, will, we are persuaded, be universally acceptable to our readers."

"The latest date of papers which had reached France from America at the last accounts, was the 25th of December. The report of the Foreign Relations Committee of our Senate was made on the 6th January, and it was definitively acted upon on the 14th of the same month. We scarcely entertain a doubt that, on the arrival in Paris of authentic accounts of those proceedings, the bill of indemnity will be promptly acted upon, and the treaty carried into full effect."

Well, sir, continued Mr. ADAMS, which of the two parties is to have the glory of the appropriation, if it be made? For my own part, sir, if it be made, I am willing that the glory of obtaining it should be distributed between the two parties in the proportions justly due to them. I approve the spirit of the President; and I applaud the prudence of the Senate. The compound of both, each tempering the other, may possibly prevail upon the French Chambers to make the appropriation which it is their duty to make; but to whomsoever the palm of this glory may be due, I can claim no part of it.

In independence placing all my glory;

While Tories call me whig, and Whigs a Tory.

Yet, sir, I cannot, said Mr. ADAMS, but express my regret that this House, for which I feel and have the deepest reason to feel the most perfect respect, and, I will add, affection—cannot, whichever of the two parties may have the merit, claim or receive for ourselves any share of it. It will be awarded either to the bold, intrepid spirit of the President, or to the cooling damper of the Senate; leaving to this House and its members neither part nor lot in the transaction, but to clap their hands in honor of the glorious prudence of the Senate, or join in shouts of hosanna to the dauntless and triumphant valor of the President. Sir, I have for five or six weeks been imploring the House to take up the subject; and I think, if it had been taken up, we, too, would have had a share in the glory of the successful termination of the question. But here we are, on one of the last days of the session, and if we act at all, we must act before Wednesday, when this Congress expires. This was the reason why he objected to another part of the resolution of the gentleman from New York: that "this House will insist upon its execution, as ratified by both Governments," is the language of the resolution.

Sir, upon what can this House insist? In four days it will be numbered with the dead, and this hall will be the property of its successors. What can this House do in regard to the concerns of a Government four thousand miles off. Our successors will constitute a different House, to whom, for their two years, this hall will belong. In the dissolution of this House our country will sustain heavy losses: from New York, from Pennsylvania, Georgia, Ohio, and other States, including my own, the voices will no more be heard of men of as pure hearts and bright intellects (though he did not always agree with them in opinion) as existed any where in this nation. How do we know what our successors will "insist" upon? My resolution expresses the opinion of this House that the rights of the nation, stipulated by the treaty of July, 1831, ought in no event to be sacrificed, abandoned, or impaired, by any consent or acquiescence of the Government of the United States. This is an opinion which the House is competent to give. It will be the more weighty for being one of the last acts of the House before its dissolution. It will sustain the President in his inflexible adherence to the rights, interest, and honor of the nation, while the next resolution which I propose will convey to him the opinion of the House as to the most expedient course for preserving the peace of the nation, without abandonment or compromise of its rights.

It is therefore, sir, said Mr. A., that I object to the resolutions, as reported, on these two grounds: first, that they foreclose all negotiation; and, secondly, that they assert the power of this House to act on the subject, when, as every one knows, this House is in its expiring agonies. I will say a word more as to the propriety of the resolutions offered by me. The second of them does not only not discountenance the idea of a negotiation, but expressly recommends it by requesting the President, if in his opinion it be compatible with the honor and interest of the United States, during the interval before the next session of Congress, to resume the negotiations with France. I adhere to the negotiation as much as to our rights. Cut off all negotiation! Why, sir, it must not be done, even in war. Negotiation is the only means by which peace can be preserved while it lasts, or restored when it is lost.

I ask and desire the President to revive the negotiation, if he deems it compatible with the national honor and interests. Let me say, sir, with that official respect which is due to the Chief Magistrate, and with the sentiment at the bottom of my heart, that one of my reasons for proposing this resolution is, that the President has expressed himself, in my opinion, too unfavorably to the continuance of a negotiation. I thought so in regard to his message at the commencement of the session. I thought the declaration in that message, that further negotiation was out of the question, was not well advised—negotiation should never be discontinued until war is flagrant, nor repelled even when it is flagrant. But circumstances have since occurred which make it still more necessary for this House to give an opinion in favor of negotiation. In the midst of the excitement which naturally resulted from the menace of reprisals, the King of the French expressed no dissatisfaction with that proposition, but with the language used to his minister—because it was intimated to the minister that the King had not done what he had promised to do. The message stated that the King was pledged to bring the subject before the Chamber in time to enable the present Congress to receive the result, and had not fulfilled that pledge. The King took fire at this reproach, and not at the threat of reprisals. Admiral de Rigny writes a letter to Mr. Livingston on this subject, in which he says not one word about the threat of reprisals.

It appears, from the letter to Mr. L., that the dissatisfaction is confined entirely to the intimation that the King had not been as good as his word, and that is the reason given in the letter for the recall of the French minister. I must say it is a shabby reason for such a movement; for it risks, upon the gratification of a petty pique, the peace of the two nations. That, then, was the ground on which the King recalled his minister. But, at the same time, as if alarmed at the consequence of the step, he informs Mr. Livingston that his passports are ready, if he thinks proper to apply for them. There was much craft in that procedure. He did not dare to order the American minister to leave the country, for it would have imposed on him the responsibility of a rupture.

Mr. Livingston's final determination was right. I was, said Mr. ADAMS, alarmed when I saw the statement that Mr. Livingston had taken his passports, and intended to leave France. It would have enabled France to say you gave the provocation. A minister should always be at his post, as immovable as the god Terminus, unless by an order from his own chief or from him to whom he is accredited. Had Mr. Livingston taken his passports, and war had ensued, it would have put on him the responsibility of the rupture. The two nations were like two boys in the street, who confronted each other with clenched fists, and both saying "strike me if you dare!" Such was the case with nations, that, after much blood had been spilt in their quarrels, they began to inquire who struck the first blow. So, if we get into a war with France, after spending millions of treasure and shedding oceans of blood, we shall at last come to inquire who struck the first blow.

And all this for a personal altercation and affront between the President of the United States and the King of the French.

"Quicquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi."

I do not wish to step off from the vantage ground which we now have in this matter. Let our rights be maintained to the last drop of our blood; but do not let us say that we will have no negotiation. I wish the House to say that the negotiation should be renewed, if it should be deemed by the President compatible with the public interest and honor. He knew no reason why the House should not pass this resolution, except the fear of taking a different course from that which the President has recommended. I do not (said Mr. A.) entirely approve of the order given by the President for the return of Mr. Livingston, in the event of the rejection of the bill of appropriation. It places the country in a most awkward and unfavorable position; because, by recalling the minister, it takes a course which, according to the usage of nations, may be construed by the French Government as an act of hostility, and as entitling France to the first blow.

We should therefore be left defenceless all over the ocean for many months, at least until Congress could be convened and take measures for the defence of the country, while they were left unrestrained to take any measures of hostility they pleased. Mr. Livingston, in one of his letters to the Secretary of State, intimated that a state of things might occur in which, after the rejection of the appropriation, France would anticipate our reprisals, by striking a blow at our commerce and our ships of war in the Mediterranean. If Mr. Livingston with his whole legation was ordered to return to the United States, to manifest our sense of the injustice of France no alternative would remain but war. It was doing what the King of France was afraid to do, giving occasion for instant war. I should have been better satisfied if the President had given, in the event of the rejection of the bill, the order which he gives in case the bill be passed. Why he gives an order for Mr. Livingston to leave France for Holland, in case the appropriation be made, I am at a loss to imagine. Why should we not receive the appropriation if it be made?

Relations with France.

[H. OF R.]

Why should the minister leave his post at the moment when France was doing all which we require of her? I do wish (said Mr. A.) that the order to retire into Holland, instead of the order of recall, had been given in the event of the rejection of the law of appropriation. A recall of the minister in so signal a manner as by sending out a frigate to bring him and his whole legation home, is an act of such decided defiance, that the first act of hostility may be immediately committed by France; and, in the temper kindling up in this controversy, who knows but men who begin a quarrel by breaking a treaty, might seize in their own ports the very ship sent to bring your minister home? I will not (said Mr. A.) further trespass on the time of the House. My heart is full of this subject, but I forbear from any farther expression of my views and feelings in regard to it.

After Mr. ADAMS concluded,

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, (formerly chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs,) rose in reply; and, after adverting to his own situation as an old member of the House, and to the interest felt by the portion of the Union which he represented in the question now under discussion, promised, in as brief a manner as possible, to present his views and opinions in relation to it.

He had thought, when he first read the resolutions which had been moved in the form of an amendment by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that they were an improvement on those of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] He regretted to discover, however, from a more attentive examination, and the remarks which had just fallen from that honorable gentleman, that he had been mistaken, and that there was, in reality, no substantial diversity of import between the plans they respectively recommended. The gentleman from Massachusetts, indeed, in the speech he had now addressed to the House, as well as in his second resolution, had dilated much on the anxiety he felt, (and justly felt, as Mr. A. thought,) that negotiation with the French Government should not be broken off, as was proposed by the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, at the head of the committee, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] But why was the gentleman thus anxious? For the manifest reason, that if, by a resolution of Congress, all negotiation should be inhibited, whatever disposition there might be on the part of the French Government to come to terms, how could they effect it? Did not all who heard him perfectly well know that, when once negotiation had been thus broken off, the principle of national pride would prevent that Government from making us any proposals, even if it were ever so well disposed to do so? All diplomatic intercourse being broken off, there would remain no channel through which its good feelings, if they did exist, could be intimated to us. What! after we, by a formal concurrent act of all the members of our Government, had declared it to be our peremptory will that negotiation should not be continued, did any one suppose that, were every member of the French Executive, and of the Chambers, ever so thoroughly convinced that we were in the right and they in the wrong, France would tender to us any offers of reparation? It would be futile to expect it.

The first resolution of the gentleman from New York declared against further negotiation; the first of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that we would accept of nothing short of the complete fulfilment of the treaty: on which basis, however, he is willing to admit, nay, is anxious to keep open the door of negotiation. Now, where, said Mr. ARCHER, is the real difference of these propositions, that one should be held up as a substitute for the other, and our time employed in deliberation between them? The former was indeed consistent with itself. The latter admitting, and even invoking, a continuance of negotiation, yet precludes the sole ground and subject of it, by preliminary and peremptory inhibition. After declaring that we will have nothing but our full demand, without abatement of a tittle, why talk of negotiation? Ask the President to continue it! Continue it! to what end? Negotiate! on what subject? Was there any other in relation to which our opinion was required, but that of the treaty and its stipulations, which were to remain unalterable by any negotiation? What Mr. A. meant, he said, to illustrate, was, that those two schemes of proceeding, between which our decision was invoked as something different, came identically to the same result—were not similar merely, but the same thing. And, what was far more important, that either was a very bad thing; that was to say, a preclusion, would be, if adopted, the only avenue to the restoration of harmonious relations with this country and France.

But this, Mr. A. said, was not all. It could not be designed to stop with the mere breaking off of diplomatic relations and intercourse with France. This would be absurd. Something further must be done, or the money stipulated by the treaty (the subject of disagreement and rupture of relations) would be lost! It were as well lost by quiet acquiescence in the rejection of the treaty as in this mode! What, then, was to be done? What was to follow this inhibition of negotiation? In what measure or result was it to eventuate? Unless the loss of the money was to be submitted to in this mode, there could be but one of two successive and supplemental results; and these were interruption of peace, or interruption of trade, between the countries. Reprisals, that is to say, war in some form; or the interdiction of commercial intercourse in some form or extent. Mr. A. said he would take a glance at the character of these alternatives, and the influence which the adoption of either was likely to exert on our condition and affairs.

He would take the worst first—war: for a resort to reprisals every body knew would be war, and in the form most calculated to aggravate and provoke, in which it could be commenced. What was the state of our preparedness for war, he would now inquire. If we were prepared, he would not boast. If we were not, his should not be the hand to draw away the veil, and expose the deficiency. But no matter what might be the amplitude of our preparedness, had gentlemen adequately considered the character and resources of the power with which we were to be engaged in conflict? He had taken some pains, as was his duty, since this matter had engaged so much attention, to inform himself on this subject. This he had been enabled to do from very good sources, and he would therefore take on himself to give the committee some view of the maritime and military resources of France. She was a power with which war was certainly not to be considered as any light game. Three hundred vessels, of various classes, and comprehending every class, composed the military marine of France. Forty-four were of the line, if his information was accurate, about forty frigates, and inferior vessels of all kinds and denominations, and a prodigious marine force employed in these vessels. He had it from various and undoubted sources of information, that a higher degree of attention had been paid since the last peace by the Government of France, not only to the restoration, and enlargement of its maritime force, but to the object of rendering it effective, than perhaps had been done by any other power. He had made it his business, since room had first been presented for apprehension of war, to seek information from every naval officer of ours, he had met with, on the subject, and he had a concurrent account from all, that the solicitude of France to improve her system of naval discipline, and to perfect it by a rigorous practice, had been most extraordinary. These brave men, never disposed to overrate any form of danger, but prompt to render justice, even to what might become rival arms, all concurred that the encounter of no Power could be more formidable than that of France on the ocean.

But what was the land military force of France? Not fewer than 400,000. The late war had not passed away so long, but that we retained a lively recollection of its harassments. Not our maritime cities only were exposed—scarce a pig or our poultry were safe in the large region made accessible by the ocean or our streams. Great Britain had a military force not amounting to a third, he believed, of that of France. This force had demands on it for the maintenance of her settlements, extending as widely as the globe. There was no region in which it was not required that this force should be distributed. If with this force, so unequal from proper amount and from dispersion, Great Britain was able to harass so much our maritime frontier, what was the annoyance we might anticipate from the 300 vessels and the 400,000 troops of France? He did not speak of our power to repel aggression in any form, from any quarter. That he would be the last person to bring into controversy. But that was not the question. We ought to measure aggression, when apprehended, however great our capacity to repel it. But the question was, on the propriety and policy of incurring it. And, in this view, the magnitude of the probable aggressing force formed an essential element of consideration. It might be a necessity, or a duty, to disregard this magnitude, but it was no less a duty of sober-minded men to consider it.

But another weighty consideration was to be added: when, how, was this war, if it came, to end? France could not subdue us—we could not subdue France. Gentlemen were disposed to refuse all negotiation to prevent war; but they must have negotiation before they could put a stop to it. Would the two nations be better prepared to negotiate, when feelings had been exacerbated by conflicts and losses on the ocean, by descents and desolation on the land? When oceans of blood had been shed, and millions of money sacrificed, would the parties be in any better circumstances to negotiate than they were at the present day?

But he would dismiss this part of the subject, which he had only been regarding as one alternative. He would suppose that we were to have no war; although, if he had understood the gentleman from Massachusetts aright, this Government had already not declared, but made war. He understood that gentleman to say distinctly that the withdrawal of our minister from the court of France was war.

[Mr. ADAMS here rose to explain. The President had not yet given the order: he had made it to rest upon a mere contingency. What he had said was, that, when such an order should be given, it would be the last act preceding war, and would in effect be equivalent to a declaration of war.]

Mr. ARCHER resumed. The only difference between his statement and that of the gentleman, as now explained, was that the withdrawal of our minister, which was tantamount to a declaration of war, had not been made positive, but only contingent, and had been suspended on a contingency not unlikely to occur.

But he should pass over the subject of war, and would suppose that the suspension of diplomatic intercourse was to be followed by a commercial non-intercourse, the second of the alternatives; and what would be the character of that course of policy? Would honorable members adopt this alternative without first reflecting maturely on the advantages and value of the trade now subsisting between the two nations? Had they considered its amount? Our exports to the French dominions during the last year amounted to $14,000,000, in round numbers, while our imports amounted to little less than that sum. This was the direct trade that must be sacrificed—a trade to the value of fourteen millions out and fourteen millions in. But was that all? No. Our total exports exceeded $100,000,000, and if we should plunge into a war with a great maritime Power, would not the whole of this vast export trade be put at once to the utmost hazard? Exposed to the absolute certainty of great losses? No. He was wrong. This destruction would not fall upon it; but why not? To the answer to this question he invoked the special attention of gentlemen from the Northern and Eastern States, States which owned the navigation of this country. He would tell them why: because England and Holland possessed a large commercial marine, and the moment non-intercourse was declared, that instant the transfer would take place of our whole export trade from American shipping to that of those great commercial and maritime States. Yes, our trade would have one alternative for escape, and one only, and that was the annihilation of all our navigation. He put it to gentlemen from the Northern and Eastern States to choose between these two alternatives—no trade or no navigation. One or the other must be the result.

Mr. A. said he spoke with warmth, possibly with vehemence; but it was because he believed that one of the greatest interests of his country might be involved in the deliberations of this day. His own State, indeed, was as little interested in this question as almost any other in the Union, of the same trade and population. How our exports went abroad was of comparatively little moment to her. Her citizens would probably not have to pay even an augmented insurance. What they had to export, would seek the secure transport of British bottoms. But in the event of either alternative, of war or non-intercourse, where should we have to look for that crowd of masts which now were seen bristling into forests in the ports of New England and New York? How many would continue to have American owners?

Our ships, indeed, would not rot; they would still traverse the ocean in safety, as they had heretofore done; but they would bear at their mast-head, not the gallant stripes and stars which had waved victorious in so many a contest, but the emblem of the British lion. This, indeed, might be the resource to which the South would direct its view, but how would it affect the North and the East? Mr. A. did not stand there to legislate for the South alone. He represented New England while he represented Virginia; and it was alike his duty and his honor to protect the interests and consult the security of his entire country.

Having now stated the alternative presented to the country, in case all negotiation be discontinued, viz: the annihilation of our trade, or war with our ancient friends and earliest ally, he proceeded to inquire why this state of things was to be encountered. What was the consideration held out to us? For what must all these ties of interest and of sympathy, which had, for so many years, bound the two nations together, be at once ruptured, and all the blessings of peace and mutual intercourse put to hazard? He was almost ashamed to utter the reply to these inquiries. It was for the sake of five millions of dollars due to a portion of our citizens—an old debt long since considered desperate by its owners, and much of it transferred years ago from the original claimants for two or three shillings in the pound, to insurance offices and speculators. Yes, it was for such a debt that all the high responsibilities to which he had alluded were to be incurred? We were invoked to enter into a contest which would put our Government in the attitude of a sheriff or a marshal who backed a writ! He insisted that, in this view, such an execution ought, on motion, to be quashed: because France did not refuse payment of the debt; she disputed only as to its amount. She was ready and willing to pay three millions of the five. It was, then, for this contemptible balance of two millions of dollars that Congress was invoked to plunge the country into the vortex of enormous commercial sacrifices or war. Now, Mr. A. would take it upon himself to assert, if war were to follow, that there was not to be found in all the records of history, blotted and smeared as those pages were with blood, (indeed they contained little else,) a single case where a war, involving such extensive and calamitous consequences, had ever been incurred for a cause so widely, so immeasurably, disproportionate to the effects which were to follow it. Should such a result occur, we should certainly have a peculiarity in the annals of our Republic, to gratify the overboiling zeal of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] for blows. But, save in the annals of romance—the records of such contests as those of Sir Lucius O'Trigger, who went to war not to end misunderstanding, but to prevent it—this war would have no parallel in the whole compass of civilized life.

Relations with France.

And the House were invited to risk the provocation of a war such as this, comprising, he had almost said, the ridicule of a mock with the tragic seriousness of real war, in what name? In the revered, the sacred name of the national honor. Mr. A. would make no professions of readiness to sustain the honor of his country, any more than to vindicate his own; he should leave that to be inferred from his actions; he chose that the readiness of the country to defend its honor should rest upon the same ground. Let it rest, not in the zeal with which it was affirmed, but in the evidence of history; not on legislative resolves, but in deeds. He was willing to put that question on the evidence afforded by the last war.

But, if that were insufficient evidence, he might mount yet higher; he might resort to the record of the contest for our independence—none brighter in the multifarious annals of the world's history—to the high and isolated fact, that those States, when in their colonial condition, with all the bonds of filial and colonial dependence and attachment—all the near ties of consanguinity and common origin bound about their arms, and, what was more, around their hearts—entered into a war with the greatest Power in the world, and that Power their mother country, for what was then thought by many a vision, an abstraction, but with them was a question of honor as well as liberty. These were the records to which we might point, and point securely, to vindicate the national honor from requiring these small and meagre resolves to authenticate it. But was there, after all, any question of national honor involved in the present case—so far, he meant, as things had yet gone? Mr. A. said he perfectly well knew the floods, the storms, the tempests of denunciation to which he exposed himself when he asserted the negative. But he should not hold himself worthy the name of a defender of the national honor, (a large part of which lay in courage,) did he shrink on that account from the assertion of truth. He knew that, in taking such ground, and encountering such a hazard, he should have at least one esteemed and honored coadjutor and friend, honored in the region from whence he came, esteemed wherever else he was known, [Mr. GILMAN,] who would stand by his side, nor quit it through fear of imputation. He declared his conviction that no question of national honor was thus far involved, or was threatened with being compromised.

In what did national honor consist? In intemperate language—in menace? No. But he would tell angry gentlemen in what it did consist. National honor consisted, first, in doing justice to all, alike to the humblest and the weakest, as the most powerful and exalted; secondly, in exacting justice. If it was not true of valor, that the better part of it was discretion, it was neither true of honor more than valor, in its highest exercise, that either rejected discretion. Valor did not require, if a giant struck, even unjustly, that you should rush to be trampled in the dust; nor honor, that you should discard all care of other and higher interests when the satisfaction of a just claim was withheld. But in what was this idea, that the national honor was put at hazard, in fact founded? How did such a thought occur in a mere matter of account and settlement of money claims? It was founded in the notion that the French Government had broken faith with us. Now, unpopular as it might be, and as he knew it to be, he should nevertheless affirm that, as yet, such was not the fact, however politic might be such an accusation. He affirmed that the Government of France had not violated its pledged faith in refusing to appropriate the money necessary to carry out treaty with that Power into effect. Let him put a case for illustration. Suppose, under our own constitution, which conferred the treaty-making power on the President and the Senate jointly, that the President alone, without consulting the Senate at all, should take it upon him to ratify a treaty with some foreign nation. Could that nation justly charge ours with a breach of the public faith, should the Houses of Congress afterwards refuse to do the things stipulated in the treaty?

The French constitution did, indeed, confer upon the executive branch of the French Government the power to make certain class of treaties; but it was a well-known rule of construction, that when certain powers were affirmatively, and in express terms, conferred by an article of organic law, all other powers included in the same category, but not expressed, remained with the granting party, namely, with the people. This rule was so perfectly well understood and admitted that, when certain powers were omitted in the constitution either of France or of this country, they must be held to be reserved, and as effectually denied as if they had been in terms excluded. Now, what did our own constitution say? He wished the House to mark this with care. It contained no such limited grant as was made in that of France with respect to treaties; its language was positive and unqualified in the grant of the treaty-making power. But what had been the uniform construction put upon it by the party long denounced as the republican party in this country? What had they declared, over and over again, and put upon record as the republican doctrine? Was it not this: that when a treaty had been concluded by the Executive (in the exercise of an unrestricted power) on behalf of the United States, and it required for its fulfilment the appropriation of money, such a treaty, however ratified, however constitutionally made, was nevertheless inchoate and incomplete until Congress should have resolved to comply with its stipulations? Who did not know that this was our own doctrine respecting our own treaties? But, throwing the constitution aside, Mr. A. contended that, were the constitution silent, such a power must reside in Congress in the nature of things. It was inherent in that part of the Government which represented more immediately the popular action. He challenged contradiction when he asserted, that in no case of popular Government, the representative body, the exponent of the action guaranteed to the people, had been divested of such a power.

Suppose, then, that our situation in respect to France had been reversed; suppose that we were called upon to pay an indemnity to the French people; suppose the French Government should come to the House, and present a treaty signed and formally ratified by the President, and the House should determine that the sum was too great, or that nothing was due, and should refuse to appropriate the money, would not gentlemen be astonished that, because of such a constitutional act by that House of Congress, the French should complain that the faith of the nation had been violated?

Mr. A. insisted that, had we no constitutional provision whatever, so far as respects granting away the people's money, the Executive could not, in a free Government, have the exclusive control. No; the voice of the people themselves must enter into the bargain. Humble as he was, his consent, as a Representative of a portion of the American people, must first be asked before a single dollar could be taken out of the treasury and sent to a foreign nation. Was it possible that he could be called upon to vindicate, at this late day, a doctrine so long established and so often confirmed? Let that doctrine be denied, let the safeguards which the constitution had thrown around the treasure of the nation be removed, and what would be the consequence? No matter how the tax-laying branch of the Government might pile up money, exacted from the sweat and toil of the people, the Executive might shovel it off as fast, and faster, than they could accumulate it. They, who were the people's representatives, their guardians, their trustees, must stand by with folded hands, and could not raise a finger, nor interpose a remonstrating word, to stop the expenditure! For one, he had rather that these five millions, or five hundred millions, were sacrificed, than that such a dogma should once be established and submitted to as a part of our system of public administration. But did not the assertion, that France had broken faith with us, go in effect the whole length of such a doctrine? The executive branch of the French Government had manifested the utmost zeal and anxiety to have the treaty executed. The only cause of delay was the deliberation of the Chambers. Mr. A. was astonished to hear the reproachful language which had been heaped upon the executive organ of that Government, by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, in that House, and at such a moment. Even had the reproaches been merited, which he believed them not to be, he would no more have thought of resorting at such a time to reproaches than to reprisals.

Mr. A. here said that he had been informed, within a few moments, that advices had just been received going to strengthen the belief that the issue in the Chambers was likely to be favorable. If such were the fact, did it not go to strengthen the argument for rejecting the first proposition moved by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG.] When authorized to expect an amicable result, ought we at the same time to assume a menacing attitude? Surely not. But the resolutions, both of the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Massachusetts, went, the one formally, and the other in effect, to declare that there should be no more negotiation. Was this a declaration with which to meet the auspices of a friendly settlement of the dispute? The French ministry recommended to the Chambers the payment of the money; and what was it proposed to declare? Why, in substance, by implication, that we have no expectations from the good faith of the French nation, and that menace was the only means to move them to do justice. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] had spoken something about acting from fear; at least he so understood him to say.

[Mr. ADAMS. I did—your whole argument is fear.] Yes, resumed Mr. A., it is, I own, the fear of covering the ocean with plunder and with blood; for what? For the sake of two millions of dollars; or else, for some phantom notion of national honor which has sprung up in the brain of the gentleman from Massachusetts. My argument is fear, I hope an honorable fear, of producing by rash legislation a result so much to be deprecated.

If we were to prohibit all negotiation, suppose the treaty should be rejected, how was any accommodation ever to be effected? We declared our claims to be just; and, so far from having got more than was our due, as had been intimated by the gentleman who had concluded the treaty—

[Here Mr. CAMBRELENG interposed, and inquired of Mr. ARCHER what was the nature and amount of the intelligence just received, to which that gentleman had referred. He had himself received none.]

Mr. ARCHER replied that the project of law, for the payment of the American claims, had been referred by the Chambers to the Bureau, or standing committee of that body. Such was the intelligence he had received as having just arrived. If so, it went to show at least that the Chambers had not determined to reject the law. The argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts was for negotiation; but to what purpose, while at the same moment the same gentleman barred up the door to every thing like negotiation, by declaring that we will be satisfied with nothing but the treaty? Mr. A. said that, if he had been rightly informed, and he had not a doubt of the fact, France owed us not only these five millions, but a much larger amount, and, should the treaty again be opened, the strong probability was, that our citizens, instead of getting less, would get much more.

There was another resort. Suppose the treaty should be rejected by the Chambers, might we not, as the only mode to prevent a final rupture with our old friends and earliest ally, accept a proposition that the dispute should be referred to the arbitration of a third Power? And would not the people of the United States think it extraordinary if Congress should refuse such a course, for the sake of getting our two millions of dollars? Such a course had already been adopted in other cases. Great and important and very delicate interests of this nation had been submitted to the mediation of friendly Powers? Had not a question been so submitted which touched even the alienation of our territory? which raised the question of soil or no soil? Were gentlemen willing to submit a question like that, and would they refuse this petty question of two millions of dollars? Let him not be misunderstood. He did not say that we ought to offer the French Government further negotiation. He thought we ought not. What he insisted upon was, that we ought to wait before we acted. He was not for bating a single tittle of our claims. On the contrary, he was for claiming more. The accepting of five millions was a compromise. Had not the long list of our claims undergone, in the Chambers, a system of classification, and were not all the classes rejected saving two, and these the smallest in amount? Had we been indemnified for a single vessel swept from the ocean under the principle asserted in the Berlin and Milan decrees? or that of Rambouillet? No! The concessions made had been on grounds different from the recognition of the invalidity of the principle of those decrees. We had a fair claim to assert now, if the treaty were to be opened, for the seizures at sea, coming within this principle, made antecedently to the engagement to revoke the decrees. It was the seizures in contravention of this engagement, and the vessels burnt at sea, that the allowance obtained by the treaty seems to have been designed to cover. Though we might get no more by negotiation, any fair arbitration would give us more. What, then, had we to fear from negotiation or from arbitration? Nothing. At all events, he desired, if we must lose our claims, and must have a war with France, to have the knowledge that no effort of discretion or moderation had been wanting on our part, to avert such a calamity. If we must fight, he at least wanted to go into battle with clean hands, and with a heart conscious of rectitude. Mr. A. said that he believed these claims never would have been in jeopardy but from the rashness of our own Government. He had no quarrel with the personal indulgence of speech by the President in his message, which had been so highly lauded by the gentleman from Massachusetts. If the President thought that his country had been treated with indignity, it was creditable to him to express resentment; and such a spirit might readily be pardoned, even should it err a little on the side of excess. But Mr. A. could not go with him in the indulgence of such a spirit to the detriment of the country. He looked to the consequences. Those consequences might fall heavily on his country.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had very appropriately quoted the words of the poet: "Quicquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi." These (among these) Achivi were his constituents, and he had no idea that they should unnecessarily or improperly plectuntur. Whatever might be the feelings of some gentlemen, he, for one, was not prepared to offer up the interests of his country a victim to the "spirit" of the President. Far be it from him to offer up her smallest limb in such oblation. Such, however, must be the probable results of the policy recommended to us, of defiance and irritation. Mr. A. heard the gentleman's sentiments echoed every where, in the hall and out of it. Wherever he went, he heard people praising the spirit of the President. Every where he heard men boasting that the President had a regard for the honor of the country. The torrents of blood that would be shed, the loss of property, the waste of human blessings and life, these things must not be looked at. And why? Because the autocrat has had his high spirit awakened. And what was the House to show? What spirit were they to display? No spirit at all, but a spirit of submission to his will! A feeling that would lead them to throw the commerce of their country, in the best view, at his feet, by way of applauding the "spirit" of the hero. The House, if they pleased, might do this, very possibly, though he did not say they would. He knew not what to expect in these days, nor on what to calculate. He could only answer for his own conduct, which, in a matter like this, it was no merit in a Representative of the "old and untiered dominion" to do. Other instances had occurred, in which injuries to the public interest, when acknowledged, were yet triumphantly vindicated, by assigning them to the personal virtues of the President. Mr. A. said he could assent to no such principle of vindication of public acts. He must say of this doctrine, too, that it was as new among us as it was portentous. And if an exemplification were to be required, in disposing of the great subject under consideration, he must "take the responsibility" of recording his inflexible dissent, now and for ever.

Mr. A. concluded by submitting the following resolution:

Resolved, That, in the just expectation that the Government of France will have made provision, or will make provision, for carrying into effect the stipulations of the treaty of indemnity with that Government, of the 4th of July, 1831, this House will forbear, at the present time, to adopt any measure in relation to that subject.

After Mr. A. had taken his seat,

Mr. PICKENS rose, and said he was opposed to the resolutions offered by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and also to the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS;] and he was decidedly in favor of that submitted by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARNOLD;] although not aware of its purport until read from the chair.

I am (said Mr. P.) opposed to both the first classes of resolutions, because they are calculated to commit this House unnecessarily; and, if France should pay the indemnity, as we have reason to hope, then they make a show of spirit and courage when there can be no necessity for it. This, sir, is a part beneath the magnanimity and dignity of this nation to play. And if France should not pay the indemnity stipulated, it will then be time enough for us to take our course according to the circumstances of the case, and meet the issue presented. Those who, in "piping times of peace," are found in the front ranks loudly clamoring for war, are generally, in moments of imminent peril, found choosing "discretion, as the better part of valor."

Sir, as this is a subject which, in its progress, may involve questions of the most momentous concern to the interests of this confederacy, I desire to throw out a few positions which I, for one, will feel it my duty to assume and maintain under almost any circumstances that may arise. And here let me say, Mr. Chairman, that it is with deep regret I have witnessed a feeling in this House utterly unworthy of the occasion. Is there no question but what must be made to turn upon party grounds? Are the watch-words to be thrown out, and the rally called, not to save the liberties of the Republic, but for the vile and infamous purpose of sacrificing all that is venerable and virtuous in the institutions of freedom, and making of them a burnt offering, the sweet savor whereof shall rise as incense to the new idols of our creation? I entreat gentlemen to pause in this reckless career of mad ambition. I have not been long enough a member of this House to partake deeply of the bitterness that has been excited by party conflicts upon this floor. I trust and hope that, on a subject of such vast importance, not to ourselves, but to the people of this great and growing nation, we will suppress every unworthy emotion of the heart, and merge all in one common feeling for our country, "our whole country, and nothing but our country."

I have heard much declamation upon national honor; and pray what is it? Is national honor the honor of a duellist, who may fight upon a point of etiquette, where he may suppose his dignity involved? When the acts of a man devolve upon himself alone, he may take any course to which his freak or passion may prompt him; but when the consequences of his acts are confined not to himself alone, but visit in their effects the remotest circles of society, and disturb the peace and happiness of millions, then it is that he should pause, and deliberate in coolness; then it is that he has no right to separate his own peculiar notions of honor from the solid and substantial interests of those who have so deep concern in what he is about to do.

The code of national honor, as it has been applied to the intercourse of European Governments, may be perfectly suitable to their circumstances. Those who ride over an enslaved people by the laws of legitimacy, and those who look up to rulers whose heads glitter with crowns and diadems, may talk about national honor, and appeal to arms to vindicate an imaginary right, or avenge an imaginary wrong; but, in a Government of republican institutions, where sacred trusts are reposed in us, to be exercised conscientiously, under the constitution, for the benefit of the people of these States, we have no right to separate national honor from sound national interests.

Mr. Chairman, I propose, in the first place, to discuss the question of national rights, as involved in this matter. I do not hesitate to say that the violation of our national rights by the imperial decrees of Berlin and Milan, would have justified an immediate appeal to arms. But instead of appealing at that time to arms, we properly chose, from expediency, to rely upon negotiation. And let us look for a moment into that negotiation. We find that instead of receiving indemnity for injuries done to the property of our citizens under those decrees, they are, as far as France is concerned, expressly excluded. The injuries for which the French Government acknowledge indemnity due, are ranged under four classifications:

1st. Vessels seized before the Berlin and Milan decrees were known; that is, within eighty days after their publication.

2d. Vessels seized after the 1st November, 1810, the date of the revocation of those decrees.

3d. Vessels seized, after having been promised protection, in certain ports of Spain, in possession of the French armies, and afterwards sold at Bayonne.

4th. Vessels burnt or sunk by French squadrons, to prevent discovery.

These are the classes of wrongs for which they acknowledge indemnity due; and it will be seen from their enumeration, that they expressly exclude the violation of our national rights, and the rights of our citizens, under the Berlin and Milan decrees. These classifications are the basis upon which the treaty was negotiated; and, so far as our national rights are involved, we are not maintaining them by maintaining this treaty. And the ground upon which the French Government justifies these odious decrees is, that, by our previously submitting to the British orders in council, we had virtually sacrificed our independence, and were no longer to be regarded as a neutral or independent Power. Now, I will not say that if the indemnity promised in the treaty should be paid, those of our citizens who have claims for losses under those decrees cannot, from the negotiation, come in and take pro rata. That, sir, will be an after question for consideration in the distribution of the funds. My opinion is, that they ought, in equity, to take rateably. But what I mean to advance is this, that under the present state of the affair, we should not consider we are sustaining our violated rights under those decrees, so far as the French Government is concerned.

However, the argument may be retorted on me, that the violation of our rights under each and every one of those admitted classifications would have justified a war. A justifiable war is a very difficult case to be made, if critically examined in all its bearings. But admit the position, that there was full justification for such an appeal in the cases in question; and I say in reply, that the treaty itself acknowledges the violations and promises indemnity. What more, as far as national rights are involved, could you gain by war? If we should engage in a bloody conflict for fifty years, it could result in nothing more favorable to our national rights than a treaty of peace, acknowledging that they had wronged us. And have we not the acknowledgment already, in the treaty and indemnity proposed? Do you expect proud, warlike France to acknowledge more at the point of the bayonet than she has already acknowledged in the treaty? Sir, then, so far as national rights are involved, we have nothing to gain by war. As to the question of national faith on the part of France, as involved in this inchoate treaty, I will consider that point in the course of my remarks.

We have then so far narrowed down the practical question to one on the simple payment of money. The wit of man cannot avoid the conclusion that this was the simple and only question. How and by whom it has been recently made more complicated, I propose to show before I conclude. Sir, then the original question growing out of the negotiation and the treaty was nothing more nor less than the non-payment of $5,000,000. And here I agree with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ACHER,] that there is not in the history of the civilized world an instance on record of a nation going to war to compel the payment of money. It will make a new state of things for one nation to issue a feri facias, in the form of modern war, against another, and call upon the high sheriff of the land to summon the army and the navy, not to fight the battles of defence and glory, but for the ignoble purpose of levying upon towns, and cities, and islands, and fleets of commerce, for plunder and murder.

I have shown, as far as national rights are involved, that you can gain nothing by war which is not already acknowledged by the treaty. Let us look, then, as to the probability of obtaining the money stipulated in the indemnity by war. Do you expect to compel the payment? Will France do that by compulsion which she may refuse to do of her own accord? She is too distant and powerful in defence for successful invasion. You may seize upon her West India possessions, but it will cost more blood and treasure than five times the amount you contend for. And if you should obtain possession, the revenue of this nation could not maintain you in it, and the profit would not cover the cost. Sir, I know the power and the gallantry of our navy. I know our tremendous resources, from the most adventurous and hardy commercial marine in the world. I know the certain triumphs we would acquire in a contest with France; but, sir, to make those triumphs go down to posterity, commanding their sympathy and admiration, you must first clearly obtain the moral sanction of the world. You must first make the cause just, defensive, and glorious.

You go to war to compel the payment of money; and will you compel France to acknowledge, before the world, that her faith and honor have been tarnished, and plead forgiveness, by offering the indemnity demanded, with the sword drawn over? Sir, you must first lay her low in the dust and ashes at your feet. You must first plant the stars and the stripes in triumph upon the walls of Paris, with your army of six thousand men, surrounded by four hundred thousand. Sir, it is folly; it is worse than folly—it is madness.

Involve this country in war to compel the payment of money, and, as you say, to sustain the faith violated by the refusal to pass the indemnity promised in the treaty, and pray what then will be our position? Our national honor will then be committed and pledged to gain the objects for which you make war. Can you gain them? Do you expect that haughty and powerful nation that once conquered the continent of Europe to proclaim in a treaty of peace her national degradation? You will then put her upon her dignity and honor never to acknowledge what your dignity and honor will then demand that she should acknowledge. We go into this war to collect $5,000,000, and come out of it with a debt of $150,000,000, and a very plausible claim from the claimants under the indemnity, against your Government, too. Is this wisdom, or is it folly?

But I am told the faith of France is pledged in this treaty, and that we are bound to maintain it. I desire to avoid no issue, and will therefore discuss this point. Let it be understood that I do not stand here as the apologist of France. No, sir! I scorn to assume that position. If we are to have war, present a clearly justifiable cause, and I would as soon go to war with her as any other Power in Christendom. But I will state the facts in relation to this matter, which ought to be considered by this House, in making up their opinion as to national faith. I choose, then, to call this an inchoate treaty; that is, a treaty to which the Government of France has never yet fully pledged its faith. I have looked into the charter under which the present Government is constituted; and I find that there are two provisions bearing upon this subject; one in relation to the powers of the King, and one in relation to the powers of the Chambers. In the 13th article, the power is given to the King, in these words: "to make treaties of peace and alliances of commerce." The 40th article is in these words: "No tax can be established nor imposed, if it has not been consented to by the two Chambers, and sanctioned by the King." As to the last article, a quibble might be raised, that it gave the power to the Chambers to impose and establish taxes, but did not give them power over the disbursement or appropriations. But this would indeed make a solemn mockery of their liberties, to say that they had power to impose taxes, while other departments of the Government might be unlimited in their appropriations. The power of imposing, without the power over appropriations, would be no check in practical operation.

Relations with France.

[H. OF R.]

The King has power "to make treaties of peace and alliances of commerce." And although it is not expressly laid down, yet it is clear from all the rules of legal construction, that treaties for indemnity, whose leading feature and objects are to raise and appropriate money, are not, and cannot be, ranged under treaties "of peace or alliances of commerce." If the broad general term of "treaty," or "all treaties" had been used, then there might be some doubt. But the words "of peace and alliances of commerce" limit the word "treaties," and give it a specific meaning and a defined limitation. But there is one consideration that puts this matter beyond all cavil. All parties in France agree that the right of the Chambers to pass upon indemnities is unqualified. They must be allowed to construe their own constitution.

The ministry and the opposition all agree upon this point. Sir, further, we were not deceived or misled in this matter. The ministers who negotiated this treaty with Mr. Rives distinctly announced to him that the Chambers would have to pass upon it. Under the despatch of the 18th September, 1830, Mr. Rives reports that the French Minister of Foreign Affairs said that he (the French minister) believed our claims would encounter much less opposition with the Government (meaning the King and his ministers) than with the Chambers; that he had thought of the organization of a commission to examine the subject, consisting of members of both Chambers, as the best means of preparing those bodies for an ultimate decision; and that he should submit the proposition at an early day to the council." In the despatch of 28th April, 1831, Mr. Rives says the French minister "spoke of the intrinsic difficulty of all money questions in a representative Government." In the same despatch, Mr. Rives says that the President of the Council of Ministers (Mr. Perrier) said, "he felt all the importance of good relations, &c., but that there would be great difficulty in reconciling the Chamber of Deputies to an additional charge on the "enfeebled resources of the State," &c. Again, in despatch of 7th May, 1831, Mr. Rives reports the French minister to say "that the offer he (the minister) had just made, was one of extreme liberality; that it would subject the ministers to severe responsibility before the Chambers; that he had already been warned from various quarters that he would be held to a strict account for his settlement of this affair." In the same despatch, Mr. Rives reports the President of the Council to say to him, "that it was particularly hard that the burden of their adjustment should now, &c.; and that it was certainly not the interest of either country to make an arrangement which the legislative authority here (in France) might refuse to carry into execution." In another despatch of 29th May, 1831, Mr. Rives again says that the President of the Council then said "that but for the Chambers there would be less difficulty in arranging this question, but that he apprehended a very serious opposition to it on their part, which might even more seriously," &c. But why make further quotations? It is beyond all doubt, that both and all parties in France admit the unqualified right of the Chambers to pass upon indemnities, and that our minister was not deceived upon this point, but that he was informed of it over and over again. The faith of one branch of the Government was pledged, and for what? Not that the indemnity should be absolutely paid, but that it should be presented to the Chambers, and that their influence should be used to press its passage.

Now, can we say that the faith of the Government of France is pledged unqualifiedly, in all its branches? The Chambers claim, and are acknowledged to have, the right to pass upon the indemnity. And is this not a principle to be maintained by every people who have claims to freedom? Analyze it, and it is the great principle that no taxes shall be raised or appropriations made but by those who pay them, or by their representatives. This is a principle consecrated by all that is glorious in the bloody struggles for Anglo-Saxon liberty. And shall we, who claim our descent from the English, be the first to break down this great barrier raised around enlightened freedom?

I will not say that it is an admitted doctrine in this country, that a treaty involving indemnity is not complete until it has passed this House. I know that it is one of the disputed doctrines between the federal and old republican parties. In all treaties not involving appropriations, it is clear the treaty-making power is complete, unless the independence of the nation should be manifestly sacrificed, and then a question above all constitutions would arise. But I, for one, shall never admit the doctrine that the faith of this Government is fully pledged to a treaty, involving payment of money, until it has passed this House. And whoever should negotiate such a treaty, would be bound to announce to the opposite party our powers under the constitution precisely as the French ministers did to Mr. Rives. Any other doctrine might give to two branches of this Government, without our concurrence, the power to plunge this nation into bankruptcy and ruin.

Let us now look into the circumstances under which this treaty has been passed upon. I say, then, that it never has been but once fully and fairly presented to the Chambers. As to its not being presented at their meeting in July last, it is manifest that they then assembled merely for the purposes of organizing under their forms; and that, as the minister says to Mr. Livingston, "it was a Chamber for 1535." I therefore consider this circumstance as nothing. But what were the circumstances under which the Chambers voted when they did act upon this indemnity? At the close of a long and able debate, an objection was raised just before taking the vote. It was this: that part of the indemnity had actually already been paid by the Spanish treaty, commonly called the Florida treaty; that $2,000,000 had been thus paid. And how was this objection met? To say the least of it, in a very ignorant and confused manner. The ministers were not prepared upon this point as they ought to have been; for it is manifest that no part could have been paid under that treaty. There was, before this late objection was raised, every probability that the indemnity would pass. But owing to the feeble manner in which this objection was met and explained, it was then lost by a majority of eight. Suppose we were in this House placed precisely under such circumstances. Suppose that at the close of a session we were called on, after a long debate, to vote an indemnity of $5,000,000, and just before taking the vote, men of distinction were to raise the objection that $2,000,000 had been paid by a former treaty, and it were asserted with great boldness, and some show of plausibility; and suppose those in favor of the appropriation were to meet the objection in a confused and ignorant manner, would we not reject it? As guardians of the public purse, we would be extremely reluctant to vote away money to a foreign Power, except on the clearest and most indisputable grounds. I know that our grounds are clear beyond all controversy, but they were not so made as to satisfy the Chambers at the time. Ought not all these circumstances to have been considered and respected in our intercourse with France on this subject.

Again, the present King of France rules not by the regular laws of legitimacy, but by virtue of a revolution. We know that the Carlists, the Bonapartists, and the Republicans, are bitter in their opposition to his reign, and would rejoice to see him overthrown. We know that even here cases might arise, in times of great party excitement, where men might be prompted to thwart a measure because it was an administration measure, and vica versa. And are we not to believe that there are many in the Chambers who would embarrass a measure, because it was an embarrassment to the King? Does it require any extravagance of credulity to believe that the rejection of the indemnity, so far, has been owing to these causes, rather than to a settled determination not to do us justice? Was it not the course of wisdom and prudence respectfully to have pressed the matter and waited events? Was it not true dignity?

The President has chosen, by inference, to impeach the honor and sincerity of the King in his course. He has also chosen to fix the time when the indemnity must be passed, and intimidated beyond all doubt, pretty clearly, what should be done if it were not passed at the session he chose to specify. Sir, it is not my place, and it would not become me, to call in question the motives of those in power to this course. On the contrary, I am willing to accord to them, for the present, the most patriotic intentions. I am willing, for argument, to say that they thought this was the best course to secure the passage of the indemnity.

It is too apparent, from the whole correspondence, that the President has been acting in this matter in collusion with his minister at Paris to some purpose; whether for good effect or evil, let events speak. Mr. Livingston says, "I know the fact," that if the message assumes such and such a tone, "showing a strong national feeling," &c. &c., it will produce a good effect on the Chambers, &c. How did he "know" it? Were the ministers then plying him to urge a strong message to drive the Chambers? I forbear to press this matter, for obvious reasons. But what does this minister now say, who but a short time since said he "knew the fact?" In his letter of the 11th of January, 1835, he says, "the contents of the message being known, caused the greatest sensation, (in Paris,) which as yet is, I think, unfavorable; the few members of the opposition who would have voted for the execution of the treaty now declaring that they cannot do it under a threat of reprisals." Again, he says, in the same letter, "I ought not to conceal from you that the excitement is at present very great; that their pride is deeply wounded by what they call an attempt to coerce them, by threats, to the payment of a sum which they persist in declaring not to be due." The minister then enters into an undignified and contemptible comment upon different newspapers, utterly unworthy of his position. And as to the charge of want of sincerity and good faith made upon the King, I, sir, disdain to say any thing, only that Mr. Livingston himself admits that the King and the ministers have done all they could, and were sincerely desirous, no doubt, of passing the indemnity.

We seem to have acted towards France as if she had habitually violated her faith with us. We seem to have acted towards her as if the President's name had as much power, and would create as much servile trembling in Paris as it does amongst those reptiles who crawl in the dust around his feet here. Sir, to say the east, there has been full as much of wanton indelicacy in the course pursued as there has been of wisdom and true dignity. When was it, heretofore, that France had ever violated her plighted faith towards us? Was nothing due to our ancient friendship? Was nothing due to the recollection of those days of our Revolution, when France, gallant France, bore to our standard her treasure and her blood, to vindicate our honor and our liberties? Cold must be that heart that has so soon forgotten the day when her lily with our own flag waved together, in union and in triumph, along the lines of Yorktown. Was this the nation in whose national faith and justice it became us to place no further reliance?

Mr. Chairman, the only difficulty of any moment that has been thrown into this matter has been from the course the Executive has thought proper to pursue. No man, six months ago, could have supposed it possible for a war to grow out of our relations with France. And when gentlemen now declaim about national honor, it is nothing more nor less than the honor and consistency of the Executive. It is the collateral questions and issues which he and his minister in France have made by their course, that have created the excitement under which we are to be dragged into a war, not to vindicate national honor, but their consistency and their dignity.

I do not take counsel from my fears; but, sir, it is the part of practical wisdom, in contemplating events that may arise, to look at the present state of things as well as the past, and calculate the effects to be produced. Twenty years since we came out of a war with a large national debt—an indirect system of taxation was adopted to pay this debt. Out of this state of things grew what has been called the restrictive system, by which a whole section of country, from the Potomac to the Mississippi, was virtually made tributary to other and more powerful sections of this confederacy. The debt has been paid off—the system has been broken down for the present—and that whole section is now just emerging from the ruin and desolation you had scattered over it. Every thing with us seems now to smile and prosper under the munificent blessings of a kind Providence—our commerce, just rising as it were from the shackles that have been thrown around her, is spreading her sails to the four winds of heaven, searching out the remotest quarters of the habitable globe, bearing comfort and happiness to the human family, and transporting back upon her expanded and exuberant bosom peace and plenty, to bless and to gladden the land that cherishes and loves her. This, sir, is our situation. And are we now to be thrown back, and made tributary colonies for the next half century? Sir, I say it from mature reflection, that the question of war will be to the South a question approaching one of self-preservation. Look at other sections. Where will be those interests engaged in navigation and commerce, technically speaking? They will be laid low in ruin, and England will become the reservoir of the wealth of the world. They will be thrown back a half century, and our commerce and navigation will never again be able to compete with England upon the ocean. Look at the interior West, that was advanced so rapidly during the last war by the appropriations and expenditures of this Government, to sustain our armies and operations along the frontiers. In this new war expenditures would be along the seacoast entirely, and the interior West, drained by direct taxation, would have no disbursement returning, and scarcely an opportunity to acquire glory. Whilst these are some of the interests involved, I will touch, for a moment, upon other interests, and it is in no invidious spirit that I do it; for I will say that there is no country in the world but where there are some interests that would be benefited in a pecuniary point of view by war. All those who look to a national debt as a national blessing—all those who look to the protection arising from high restrictive measures upon commerce, well know and feel that the most effectual protection to their pecuniary interests is to involve the country in a foreign war.

Sir, I entreat the gentlemen from the South to look at this matter. I would not wantonly injure the feelings of any set of men upon this floor. I appreciate that pride, I will say, if you please, that honorable pride, which prompts gentlemen to feel attachment to those they have acted with through party conflicts of deep excitement. It is hard to shake off these feelings of the heart, that too often bias the dictates of the head. But I trust, in a question of so much importance, that may finally commit our country into a war, that there will be no hesitation, if necessary, between the sacrifice of the consistency and pride of the Executive and the sacrifice of the peace and interests of the nation.

It is a remarkable fact in the history of England for the last century, that almost all her wars have in reality been waged to sustain the party in power at home. Whatever other pretexts she may have made, it will be seen that what has really carried her into the measure was to sustain the party at home and maintain their power. I trust this system is not to be transferred to us; and I call upon gentlemen, under the solemnity of the oaths they have taken, under the fidelity due to their constituents, to discard, for once, in the consideration of the subject-matter involved, all feelings that have been erected, all collateral questions that have been thrown around it, by the wanton indiscretion of executive conduct.

Mr. Chairman, let it not be supposed that I would shrink from a war because of the sacrifice of interest it would bring upon any particular sections of this confederacy. No, sir! Show me a just cause for war; show me the case of our national territory invaded, and jurisdiction usurped over it; show me a case where the rights of any considerable portion of our citizens have been cruelly trampled over; show me a case of our national flag habitually insulted; show me a case of our seamen dragged into foreign vessels, and compelled to fight the battles of crowned heads; show me a case of justifiable war, and I, for one, will raise the star-spangled banner, and call upon my country to rally around it, although the consequences should lay the land, from the Potomac to the Mississippi, in one universal and smoking ruin. But tell me not that this is the case. Tell me not that the miserable questions raised here are justifiable causes of war. Tell me not that, for the pitiful and contemptible sum of five millions of dollars, I am to involve the country in ruin. Sir, as to national honor, it would be dishonorable and disgraceful to the dignity of a great nation to be involved in war for any such cause. We would deserve the contempt of the world. There is scarcely any war that can be honorable but a defensive war for great national rights. There is no other war that should command the sympathy of the enlightened world.

I am astonished to hear gentlemen maintain that reprisals will not lead to war. I know that, according to Vattel and Puffendorf, technically speaking, reprisals are not war. But, sir, what are national reprisals but national robbery? There is no instance where they do not lead to war, except when a nation against whom they are issued is destitute of the spirit or the power to defend herself. All the wars between England and France have been preceded by marque and reprisal. You may seize the ships of France, and she may seize yours. Your fleets may meet hers upon the ocean, and their decks may be drenched in the blood of our seamen. You may darken the coast with the smoke of your cannon, and call it reprisals, and not war; but it will be difficult for the ingenuity of man to prove it to be peace. I repeat, in conclusion, that I am opposed to any resolutions that will commit this House: because, if France pays the indemnity, it will then be a show of courage when there was no necessity; and if she does not pass the indemnity, we can then act according to the circumstances presented, and the issue tendered. This, in my opinion, is the course of true dignity and true honor. It is our duty, as far as we can, to heal over the wounds that have been made, instead of tearing them wider open.

Mr. PATTON addressed the House at considerable length, in reply to Messrs. ARCHER and PICKENS, and gave the views which had governed him in relation to this subject, both in the Committee on Foreign Affairs (of which he was a member) and in the House. He did not fully concur in all points with either of the series of resolutions. Mr. P. read a resolution which he had prepared on the subject, with a view of offering it to the House. It would be seen that it was declarative of the validity of our claim, and preserved the principles advocated by the gentleman from Massachusetts. It was also, he thought, couched in as strong terms as that gentleman should require.

Mr. BOULDIN, of Virginia, said he had but few remarks to make on the subject. He said it was not his intention, nor had it been his habit, to trespass long on the time of the House. He wished to hear what were the views of every member, and supposed that every member wished to understand the opinion and feelings of every one on the floor upon a subject of such magnitude. He would not at any time trespass on the patience of the House, much less would he at this time, looking to the magnitude of this question and the great quantity of other business that must be done in the short time left of this session.

He thought there was but one question before this House and the nation, in relation to this subject, that was required to be answered at this time: the question whether this debt, secured by this treaty to be paid, should be abandoned or insisted on. Other questions had been suggested in France and this country, but no other question had been made here. The President had advised measures, under certain contingencies. But no other question had been raised, by the constituted authorities of either country, but this: Shall the treaty be abandoned or not? He considered this as a very material question to be decided. The debates in the French Chamber of Deputies showed that much reliance was placed on the belief that this country would not insist, in the last resort, on the payment of this money. It was, in his opinion, a very natural inquiry, and was the anxious inquiry of this country and France. He said it was fit that we should answer to it. If we abandoned the claim, there was an end of it. If we did not, the mode and time of asserting our rights was with ourselves. He said he had listened with much pleasure and interest to his colleague, [Mr. ARCHER,] and had been at a loss to determine what was the conclusion, of which he several times spoke, that he would come to. He said he understood him at last to come to the conclusion that the treaty was not obligatory.

For this he gives two reasons. First, that until the vote of the Chambers was had, making appropriations for the payment, the treaty was not final. Upon this point he would say nothing. His colleague [Mr. PATTON] had answered that fully—perfectly. Indeed, the gentleman's argument on that point, if it proved any thing, would prove that there was no obligation on the part of the Government to pay any officer for services already rendered, until this House shall vote an appropriation. Secondly, my colleague [Mr. ARCHER] thought we had been too precipitate—too hasty. What did he think hasty—rather, what did he think reasonable time to negotiate? A quarter of a century he thought not long enough. Would he say how long would be long enough? Would 125 years be long enough? Mr. B. said he was willing, if we had been hasty, to withdraw—negotiate again. But before he entered again into a settlement, he wished to know how long would do. It was not a claim of our Government—which, he said, he wished might live for ever. It was the claim of individuals, most of whom were dead and gone, and most of their descendants likewise. If we wait much longer, we shall also be dead and gone, and then he supposed there would be a close of the matter. Mr. B's colleague said, if we had waited, we would have got much more. He said he wished to be serious, and was so. But his colleague had reminded him of a case (he would not call names) that he knew of. An old gentleman had a daughter who remained single till she was more than forty-five, when she then thought proper to marry, and did so. Her father, objecting to the match, said, if Peggy had not been in such a hurry, she might have done very well.

The gentleman asks if we really would go to war for five millions of dollars. Many a suit is brought, where the cost is more than the demand. Will a man fight if you spit in his face? Suppose the case of my colleague; but the case is not supposable; yet, if it were supposable, should a man spit in the face of my colleague, would he wash his face, and say it was not worth resenting? In such a case, it would generally be cheapest to say, with most of us, that we would wash it off; and our faces would be cleaner than they were before; in almost every case it would be best, but for one thing—the next neighbor standing by, and seeing we had submitted to that, would do another and a worse thing. We were reminded in the French Chambers that we had taken from others; why not from them?

He said that he agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts, that his colleague's argument was made up of fear. Did his colleague read the debate in the French Chamber, and did he not see that most of the opposition there relied mainly on the fact that we were a money-loving, money-getting people, and would never spend $150,000,000 to get five. He knew that it was all a fetch, (he asked his colleague's pardon.) He knew there was no fear in him. The French and his colleague, he thought, were both mistaken. He said he heard with pleasure and pride, for his country and his colleague, when he spoke of our commerce covering with unnumbered millions every sea. He asked if we obtained that commerce, or the protection of it, by fear; by arguments such as his colleague had advanced? We had a name in the world as a nation, of which every American was proud. We had a respect in the eye of all nations, which had not failed to be acknowledged by them. Did we acquire this by arguments and practices bottomed on considerations of fear? When we were acquiring this, did we show to the world that we regarded more our personal security than our rights and our honor? Did we then consider whether our ducks or our barns were in danger on our seacoast? Far from it. Did the gentleman himself—and he says he thinks the nation's honor is his own honor, and would defend and maintain them both by the same means—when he was acquiring that respect and esteem which he so securely maintains in the bosom of his friends and his colleagues, act from feelings and arguments such as those now advanced by him? When we receive an injury, and resent it, if we get a bloody nose, your adversary is likely to get one too. It is well for both to value this.

Did the gentleman read the debates in the French Chambers? Are not his the very same arguments put into our mouths there? If we refuse to defend our rights, and bring the whole to a calculation of dollars and cents, will not all the world deal with us accordingly? We have exacted from other nations payment, and received it, for similar injuries. We persuaded them we would enforce our claims to justice, and they believed it. If now, after all that, when it comes to the trial, and we have liquidated the claim, and taken the bond, and payment is refused, we do not cause our rights to be respected, what may we expect? Why, that those who have been compelled to pay will say, you bullied us out of it; but when it came to the point with the French, you gave it up; therefore, to be equal, you must pay us back with interest. If you do not, we'll go on the high seas, and we will shoot your ducks; we will burn your barns, and do worse than the French would have done.

He said he would repeat the question, shall we give up the money, or insist on the payment of it? It is no uncommon case, after a dealing of twenty years' standing, upon settlement and bond taken, if any thing is said about suit for the money, the statute of limitations, usury, gambling, extortion, or some other plea, or bill of injunction, is threatened. But the creditor has only to decide whether he will give up the debt or not. A man talks and shuffles with you for twenty-five years, and at last gives his bond; waits four or five years, and, when you call on him for the money, proposes to settle again; draws some nice distinction, admitting the obligation of treaties and bonds, and the authorities of agents to make settlements, but denying the obligation to pay the money. Sir, is not this trifling with a man? Sir, (said Mr. B.,) no more negotiation about this debt; I had rather give up the debt than negotiate again.

Sir, when that same France was ground into the dust, (justly or unjustly,) for peace sake, for love's sake, for gratitude, for past kindness, if not friendship, we forbore, and said to her, "we will not press you now; others we will compel to pay, we said by our actions, but you we will not urge just now; we will settle with you in your own time." And she has settled in her own time, and taken her own time of payment. Much was said in those debates in the French Chamber of Deputies about friendship and gratitude, &c. They seem to think that the fable of the husbandman and the viper would apply to us. He had found a viper frozen, and taken him to his bosom, and warmed him into life; the ungrateful viper then bit his benefactor. They speak of us as foundlings; as some child that had been cast away by his mother; or, being lost, they had found it! Sir, they sit in their Chamber, and we sit here. I wish to have no words of abuse with them. I, like my colleague, [Mr. ACHER,] do not like to hear abuse, or to give it. I wish you distinctly, Mr. Chairman, to understand that I do not deal in abuse towards any individual, or any nation; I want to hear no abuse; and I have heard fully as much praise of foreign nations as I want to hear. As much has been said about love, and affection, and gratitude, ay, and obligations, too, between us and the French, as there is any truth in. I want to hear no more about love, and friendship, and gratitude. All I want to hear, and, I am persuaded, all the nation wishes to hear at this time, is, whether we mean to hold on upon the treaty, or give it up. If, then, we give it up, all is done. If we do not, what then follows, sir? I do not know. That is not the point before us. It is not what the French wish to know, or have the right to require us to tell them. With the greatest possible respect for the feelings and opinions of others, I think it is pusillanimous to be always settling, settling, and resetting.

I do not think it would be dishonorable to give up the debt. I never heard that it was humiliating to give up a debt. The creditor has the right to do it, and no one has the right to complain but the debtor; and I never heard of his taking exceptions. But it is childish to be always settling and unsettling and threatening. I would rather give up the whole of it, if it be, as the gentleman supposes, ten times as much, than to be always disputing and quarrelling about it. Perhaps the most dignified position we could assume would be to give it up, and pay our citizens their claims to that amount. It is certainly the cheapest. If the nation is willing I should be willing; I believe my constituents would be. I believe they know the wisdom and necessity of attending to their interest as well as their honor. But I believe they would be willing, if all were willing, to give up the claim, rather than break the peace between the two nations. Perhaps, if we were to return them their bond, and say we have been settling for twenty-five years, and you now refuse to pay, after settling, even one tenth of what you really owed us, we will hereafter have just as much to do with you as suits our inclinations, and no more than we can well avoid. This might be thought the most independent course by all the world. I know but one objection to this. The claim did not originate in contract, but in violence; and for peace, love, gratitude, and friendship, we have agreed to take money as a satisfaction. I have no idea that such will be the course, and do not mean to advise it; nor do I much fear that war will be the consequence of insisting on a compliance with the treaty. I think the only material question we have to respond to is the question before stated. Will we give up the money or not? I think any of the resolutions answer sufficiently except those of my colleague, [Mr. ARCHER,] who seems to think we could make something by a new settlement. I cannot agree to that. If they will not comply with this settlement, they would not, certainly, if we brought them more in debt.

I like rather the resolutions of the highly respected and very distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] I have no objection even to his second resolution; to give the President discretion to negotiate further with France, if he should think the honor of the nation would not be, in any manner, compromised or sacrificed. If we do not think the President has acted with entire prudence, (and I am not unwilling to admit that I think he has not,) and if some of us do not love him as well as we might, and have not all the confidence that others have, still he is the only organ through which we can constitutionally treat with any nation, in peace or in war. It seems admitted by all, unless it might be the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that we ought to have some means in peace to preserve peace, and in war to make peace. This second resolution, therefore, seems distinctly to say to all the world, that, however we may differ in degree of personal regard for, or confidence in, the President, still he is our President, and we mean to sustain our own honor and our own institutions through him, the only constitutional organ for that purpose. Let France see she has no ground to hope to profit by our party divisions.

In saying this, and agreeing to this resolution, I cannot feel what my colleague [Mr. ARCHER] says we must feel—crouching, yielding, bending the knee, to the President—or to the French Chambers, which seems to me to be more plausible. Simply to say, we will expect the money to be paid, and that we will take our own time and means to obtain it, seems to me to be neither yielding, nor submitting, nor crouching, to France, or the President, or any body in the world. Whether the advice given by the President will be taken, is for after consideration. We have no time to deliberate or act on it now. Whether his message has been prudent or imprudent, wise or unwise, will be determined, like most other things, by the event. Obstinacy, if the thing turn out well, would be firmness; if it turned out ill, it would still be called obstinacy. That which would be rashness, if it turn out ill, would be boldness, nay, wisdom itself, if the event be fortunate.

No, sir, (said Mr. B.,) I feel not crouching or humiliation for myself or my country, in this course. I have no severe strictures to make, nor do I think it necessary to add any thing to what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has said in relation to the Chief Magistrate. Mr. Chairman, I have said at least four times as much as I at first intended, and will ask pardon of the committee for having detained them so long, and say no more.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that at the commencement of the debate he had, to avoid discussion, stated that, if we were to remain at peace with France, he thought the less we said upon the subject the better. He sincerely hoped and expected that the relations between the two countries would not be disturbed; but gentlemen had discussed the question as if we were now on the eve of war. Before he sat down, he should propose some modifications of the resolutions, which he hoped would meet the concurrence of the House on all sides. He would cheerfully submit them without further debate, but for the extraordinary argument of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCHER,] who had addressed the House at length, and which rendered a reply indispensably necessary.

Before he proceeded to reply to the gentleman from Virginia, he would explain as to the resolution proposed by the committee. That part of it relating to negotiation he had not proposed—on the other hand, he had himself doubts of the propriety of interfering with the duties of the Executive. But there were members who would not vote for the resolution without that portion relating to further negotiation, and as the minority of the committee would not vote with him for a modification, he was compelled to report that or none. He hoped, however, that in the House we should have better success.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCHER,] and he believed the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] had both alluded to the right of the Chamber to refuse the appropriation. It had been stated that Mr. Rives was perfectly aware, when making the treaty, that the question must be submitted to the Chamber, and that, therefore, it could not be complete till it had received its sanction.

On this point, very great injustice had been done that distinguished gentleman, (Mr. Rives,) not only here, but elsewhere. In a document laid upon our tables—a document to which he was not permitted otherwise to refer—he meant the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate—manifest injustice had been done to our late minister to France. In that report it is stated that Mr. Rives was aware that the treaty must be submitted to the Chamber; and, to sustain that position, the report goes from Mr. Rives's letter to the Secretary of State, detailing a conversation with the French minister, or that portion of it relating to what the letter said upon this subject. But, by an extraordinary oversight, the committee had suppressed the next paragraph in the same letter—a suppression which had been most successfully exposed by an opposition editor.

In that suppressed paragraph, Mr. Rives says to the Secretary of State, that, in reply to the French minister, he repelled the idea that the Chamber had any thing to do with the treaty-making power; that that power, by the French constitution, was in the King exclusively, and that the French minister assented to the propriety of his suggestions. It is (said Mr. C.) extraordinary, sir, that so pregnant a paragraph should have escaped the attention of the committee of the Senate, following as it did the passage quoted in their report. Mr. Rives never disputed the power of the Chamber to reject an appropriation, but the right of the Chamber is another question. If it be a right, sir, it is one never to be exercised but in the case of a gross and palpable usurpation on the part of the King. It is one never to be exercised on a paltry question of a few millions of francs, but only in great emergencies, involving the question of peace or war. If it be in any sense a right, I trust it is one which will never be enforced in this House; for it is at best but a right to violate the public faith, and to abrogate the solemn obligations of a treaty: a right to disgrace your country.

Relations with France.

The gentleman from Virginia thought it extraordinary that we should go to war upon a question of claims. In all the history of war he had never known one for a cause like this. I had not expected such a declaration from a gentleman of his intelligence.

[Mr. ALCORN said he did not mean to be so understood.]

What, sir, was our war, which we made, though not declared, against France in 1798? Was it not for her depredations on our commerce? What was the war against England, in 1812, but for her captures under her orders in council? If we make war for spoils on our commerce, are we not authorized to do so, when, after five-and-twenty years' negotiation, a treaty, founded upon such wrongs, is violated? Wrong, too, which would have compelled us to meet the decrees of France with a declaration of war, had we not been, in 1812, forced to decide whether we should declare war against France or England; for both had violated our national rights, and the law of nations. France had not only violated public law, but the obligations of the treaty of 1800. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ALCORN] has given us a fallacious argument to alarm our fears, of the consequences to result from encountering so formidable a naval Power as France is at this time. Such opinions from so respectable a source are calculated to make an erroneous impression both at home and abroad. The gentleman has furnished us with a statistical table of the number of ships of war of each class belonging to the French navy. The naval power of a nation is not, sir, to be measured by the number of its vessels of war—it is a fallacious standard. It must be measured by the foundation on which naval power rests, the extent and character of its commercial marine. No nation possesses so powerful and effective a commercial marine as the United States, animated and invigorated, as it is, by the spirit of freedom.

The gentleman from Virginia may deceive himself, but France knows our naval strength, and England too; and if our national rights are maintained here, as they ought to be, in a spirit corresponding with the extent of our naval resources, neither France nor England will ever be willing to engage in a war with us. But, according to the argument of the gentleman, we are to be overwhelmed with some thirty or forty ships of the line. Sir, the ten thousand mariners whom we have now engaged in the whale trade—that “dreadful trade”—are alone sufficient to sweep from the ocean the whole naval power of France. Our mariners employed in the fisheries on our coast and on the banks, are able of themselves to contend successfully with any naval power existing. The naval resources of France may be great in ships and in her gallant officers—whose daring bravery no nation will dispute—but ships and officers are powerless without a well-disciplined and extensive commercial marine; and nations the most commercial must ever be the most powerful on the ocean. In a war with us, France can derive no aid from her army, though it were equal to that formidable force which crossed the Niemen in 1812. The war, if there be one, will be on the ocean. We have the materials ready for an immense navy: we have a commercial marine, always ready to avenge our wrongs, and we could put afloat in twelve months a naval force with which no nation could successfully contend. I do not say this, sir, because I anticipate war with France. Heaven forbid that the peace between the two nations should ever be disturbed—both nations have every motive to cherish it, and I am sure it never will be sacrificed for five-and-twenty millions of francs. But, sir, the extraordinary statements of the gentleman from Virginia have compelled me to dissipate the unfounded apprehensions they were calculated to excite, and which might do us an injury abroad. We have nothing to fear from any nation, come the contest when it may.

The gentleman has referred to the opinions expressed by our officers as to the great superiority and discipline of the French navy at the present time. Modesty, sir, is the characteristic of a brave man. Our officers will never underrate those who are, or those who may be, their antagonists. But the opinions of our officers can never sweep away our commercial marine, and, while we have that, we shall never concede superiority to any naval Power. France has, too, another powerful motive for not willingly engaging in a war with us. If she should attempt to interrupt the commerce between this country and Great Britain, or to interfere with British vessels trading between the United States and any part of the world—if she should venture to trespass on her neutrality, England would soon be a party in the war.

We mean, sir, to have no war with France. We mean to avoid it. To do so effectually, we must meet the crisis fearlessly, and maintain our national rights with dignity. Adopt that as your rule of conduct in your relations with foreign nations, and you will command the respect of the world, and, together with our isolated position, avoid war for a century to come. France, sir, will herself respect us the more for maintaining our rights with spirit and firmness. Gentlemen who entertained a different opinion must pardon him for totally dissenting from the policy adopted by the Senate. A persuasive tone is not the one which will ever obtain indemnity from any nation. The tone of the message, justly responded to by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] is that which has commanded the respect of France, as it ought to have done, and the applause of nations. France respects us because we respect ourselves. For the first time, the French Chamber is awakened to the true character of the question. Hitherto it has been frittered away, trifled with, and lost sight of, amidst the struggle for power among the various parties in that body: they never looked abroad. Now, it has become a great national question, in which the honor and welfare of the nation is involved, and the measure will no longer be sacrificed to gratify the spirit of party.

If it be defeated, it will be because both Houses did not, at an early period of the session, respond to the tone of the message, not by adopting measures of reprisal at once, but by doing what we are now about to do, exhibiting a firm determination to sustain the rights and honor of the nation, should the obligations of the treaty be not fulfilled. But, sir, I believe the appropriation will have been, or will be, made. The composition of the Chambers differs from this body and the House of Commons. The privilege of voting in France is limited to 160,000 voters; and the Deputies represent more fully the commercial and manufacturing interests of France, thus having a deep interest in the question. It is essentially a body representing the cities and towns of France. Such representatives will surely not sacrifice the great interests of their constituents to gratify party revenge, and in a case where France is clearly in the wrong. But, whatever France may do, let us do our duty; and without desiring or anticipating the worst, let us be prepared for it.

I regret, sir, that I have been compelled to engage in this debate, contrary to my wish or design; for I anticipate and sincerely desire nothing but peace between the two great nations. I will now, sir, adopt, in the form of a resolution, a sentiment which I found this morning in the report of the minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Had such a resolution been proposed in the committee, by either of the gentlemen who signed that document, it would have been, with perhaps one exception, unanimously supported. We were always ready to declare that "the treaty of the 4th July, 1831, should be maintained, and its execution insisted on at all hazards." I unite with them most cordially in the sentiment; and I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will accept it as a substitute for his. The first and third resolutions will then be abandoned; and I trust that this resolution, with the second, will be adopted with unanimity.

The resolution was then read, and, being adopted by Mr. ADAMS as a modification of his own resolution, was placed in the order of proceedings, in lieu of the amendment originally offered by Mr. ADAMS. It is as follows:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831, should be maintained, and its execution insisted on at all hazards.

Mr. BURGESS contended that the House should do nothing which was calculated to throw embarrassment in the way of an amicable adjustment of the question. This House was on the eve of a political dissolution. It could do nothing efficient. It might pass resolutions; but if war was necessary, it did not possess the power, or could not at this late period carry out such a measure. Under the circumstances, he thought the members of this House should not throw any embarrassment in the way of their successors. He was pleased with the last resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELLE,] in some respects. It contained no threat, and every individual in the land would insist upon having the treaty carried into effect as it was; no person would submit to a reduction of the sum, and it might with propriety be insisted that it should be increased.

Mr. B. was sorry that the question of war had been discussed upon this occasion. He referred to the maritime force and power of the two nations, and the detriment to the commerce of the United States which would result from such a war. He thought the House should be extremely cautious in its action upon a question which might result in war. He adverted to the ground of dispute with France. It involved a question of money only, and no case could be cited where a Christian nation had went to war merely for plunder. He insisted that there was much more cause for war on account of the bad faith and treatment which had originated our claims against France, than in a refusal to pay the sum of money which was stipulated to be paid us. He thought that, after the United States passed over the insults of France, we should be deeply and ingloriously disgraced by going to war, merely because France would not pay a sum of money for accumulated wrongs.

Mr. B. entered, at some length, into a history of the difficulties with France, and contended that there existed no just cause of war. The present aspect of the controversy seemed to him to be a mere question of etiquette between the President and the French King, and the foreign minister of this Government and the Minister of State of France.

In conclusion, Mr. B. said the House might pass any resolution it chose. He should not object, unless it was implied that if France did not pay the money we would go to war. The resolution before the House declared the treaty should be maintained at all hazards. There were but few things which should be maintained at all hazards. What were they? Was a mere question of money one? Certainly not. He viewed such a declaration on our part tantamount to saying that we would demand this sum, if refused, through war. France would be cowardly, indeed, if she should pay the money under such circumstances.

Mr. COULTER said that he had been much gratified by the declaration of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. CAMBRELLE,] that he would, on behalf of the majority of the committee, abandon the third resolution which they had reported, and agree to a modification of the first. That declaration opened the way to greater unanimity, and would enable him to coalesce with the majority of the committee. He regretted, however, that the chairman had alluded to occurrences in the committee. It was very true that the minority report had not been read in committee; but it was freely stated at the last meeting, indeed, long before, that such a paper had been prepared; it had been offered in the House, and whilst the majority, who had decided on their own course, expressed no wish to have it read, there seemed to be no propriety in officiously obtruding it upon their attention. The opinions and views of the minority were well known in the committee, having been frequently stated during the winter. He felt assured that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] had not withheld the paper from the committee out of any spirit of unkindness; on the contrary, it was from a just sense of propriety and delicacy. Mr. C. said that he had voted in committee against the first resolution, because, in his opinion, it interfered too authoritatively with the executive functions. The constitution had repositied in that department, exclusively, the management of negotiations with foreign Powers. He could not, therefore, as a member of that House, consent to say that negotiation ought to cease at any particular period. That was a matter within the executive discretion, for which it alone was responsible. He thought it ought to be left there. Many minor points, incidental to the treaty, might require negotiation; and, for aught he knew, negotiation might, in some form, be useful and indispensable even towards the execution of the treaty. On that point, therefore, he thought the House should not express an opinion. The third resolution of the committee was bottomed on the supposition that a rupture with the French nation was about to take place. In this point of view, he thought the resolution amounted to nothing. It was a mere abstract declaration that the country ought to be put into a state of defence. It manned no fort, put no ship in commission. Assuming, as an authorized contingency, that war with France was unavoidable, or even probable, he would have gone much further. He would vote specific sums, for specific purposes of defence; he would vote for requisition of soldiers, and every kind of suitable preparation. But, in his judgment, neither the House nor the nation was authorized to make any such supposition.

It would be thought to be unwise now to act upon the basis of such a supposition. The third resolution could do no actual good here, and might prejudice us abroad, by creating or increasing irritation. He was extremely glad, therefore, at the spirit manifested by the chairman of the committee; and, as he had extracted the closing sentence of the minority report, and agreed to submit it as a resolution, in substitution of those reported by the committee, he would vote for it readily and cheerfully, and he trusted it would be the harbinger of almost entire unanimity. I, for one, do not fear the results which spring up before the imagination of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BURGESS,] arrayed in such guise of terror. The resolution, as now proposed, will not commit the House, or any member of it, in favor of war. It will rather prevent it. Let us look for a moment at the circumstances in which we are placed. The treaty was concluded in July, 1831. It was ratified by this country, and laws passed in pursuance of it early in 1832. Since that time, France has been enjoying the large immunities and strong discriminations in favor of her commerce afforded by the treaty. To this part, at least, the Chamber of Deputies have never objected. They have tacitly acquiesced in it, whilst their constituents and people were reaping the golden fruits of the rich harvest. Here we instituted a commission to distribute the five millions among our citizens who were robbed of their property twenty-five years ago; and, as we relied upon the faith of modern treaties, and the honor of France, our own citizens have been put to the trouble and expense of maintaining and exhibiting their claims before this tribunal of our own establishment. But when the first instalment became due, the French King dishonored the draft of our Government, and the public honor of our country was protested by brokers in Paris. We bore this without a murmur. At length the Chamber of Deputies took up the subject, and, after full debate, they resolved, a year ago, in the face of France and the world, that they would not pay the money. A new Chamber has been twice in session since, and we have waited, long and patiently, to see whether an awakened sense of public honor and national faith would not induce a tardy compliance with the treaty. But, sir, this House must be dissolved, and we mingling again with our constituents, before this question will be resolved to us. Any active measure is now out of the question; indeed, in my opinion, not necessary. But can this House separate without expressing an opinion to our constituents, to France, and to Europe, on the subject? Such an opinion the minority of the committee have fully expressed. There are two ways in which the peace of the country may be prejudiced. The one by a rash, impetuous, passionate, revengeful course of conduct; the other by a tame, quiescent, passive, pusillanimous submission to every affront. I would avoid both of these extremes, as equally fatal. This House, which is the immediate representatives of the people, ought to meet the crisis. I would not go one step in advance of the circumstances in which we are placed, from any feeling of pride; I would not lag one step behind them from any feeling of fear. I would meet the occasion. In my opinion, that demands from us an assertion that we will maintain this treaty.

It is not the language of boasting or pride, but the tone of self-respect and conscious national dignity and right. We cannot negotiate with the Chamber of Deputies. The French constitution declares that "the King is the supreme head of the State, declares war, makes treaties of peace, commerce, and alliance." But if we could appeal from the King to the Chambers, and transfer the negotiation to the legislative hall, what would be our language? Our minister would say, Gentlemen, we have the highest possible evidence that you owe us five millions; we have a solemn treaty acknowledging the fact. It is signed by the hand of your citizen King, and acknowledged by his ministers; it is verified by the broad seal of France, consecrated by the memory of St. Louis, of Henry the Fourth, and of Bonaparte. We ask no more; you can pay no less. If you will not fulfil this treaty, consecrated by national law, national honor, and national justice, it is useless to make any contract with you. If you are faithless to this, you may be faithless to all. This language would be unpleasant for them to hear; but it proves that new negotiation would be improper, for it is the only language that any American minister would dare to hold. It seems to us that we must maintain this treaty or be dishonored in the eyes of our citizens and of civilized Europe. A firm but temperate assertion of our resolution can give no just offence, after our long patience and moderation. If, now, when the question is put to us, we decide in the negative, it would seem to invite contumelious and cavalier treatment. The other branch of the Legislature, though not exactly in the same form, have expressed the same resolve in a manner full and adequate. Indeed, if I had any doubts on this subject, they have been all removed by the manner in which gentlemen opposed to the modified resolution have expressed themselves in relation to the army and navy of France, and her capacity for military enterprise. In a just cause, such considerations as these are of no more weight in the public mind than a feather in the blue sky. It is not possible, however, that an enlightened nation will make war upon us because we tell her firmly that we will insist upon the payment of what she has so solemnly acknowledged to be due. I have no fear, therefore, that she will, in the first instance, do any thing more than refuse to pay us. We do, in fact, know what is the disposition of the King, with whom resides the power of making war. It seems he is disposed to no such alternative. What, then, will be the result, if the French refuse to execute the treaty? Are gentlemen prepared to decide by their votes, to-day, that America will do nothing in that event? Or are they prepared to resolve that they will leave all to the grace and good pleasure of the French Chambers, lest, in saying any thing at all, we might offend their pride? I cannot believe that such are the dispositions of any gentleman here; yet, perhaps, we may so act that history would infer or impute them.

For my part, I am free to declare that, if the French Chambers shall again resolve not to execute the treaty, we cannot longer hold communion with the country, unless we are willing to give up our claim to be considered as a sovereign, independent, equal member of the family of nations. The first and most probable action on our part would be to withhold from her the courtesies and civilities which mark the intercourse between civilized nations. We should be justified in considering her as banned and barred from out the family of civilized nations, who acknowledge the law of the sea and the law of the land. The next step would be to withhold from her those strong discriminations in favor of her commerce, and the last tariff law, as well as in the treaty. Finally, we might declare and enforce a total non-intercourse with her. All these measures would be peaceful; and every commercial man knows how much the more severely she would suffer under such a state of things. But if she chose to make such peaceful measures of undoubted right the cause of war, why, let it come. With all its evils, it is better than national degradation. True, she was once our friend and ally. But when our fathers resolved to hold Great Britain as they held the rest of mankind, "enemies in war, in peace friends," how many hearts were there to which the green sward of old England, the brown heath of Caledonia, and the daisy-sprinkled carpet of the Emerald isle, were dear as the home of their fathers, and the scene of their highest recollections, both national and individual! The lily of France has changed its hue since it was borne by the side of our eagle. And, from 1793 till 1811, we were almost the passive recipients of contumelies, indignities, and wrongs. I wish not, however, to recall the recollections of those days. I have never had but one opinion as to the indefeasible justice of these claims, and the nature of the outrages for which the treaty made us indemnity. I fondly hope that the sense of civilized Europe, so clearly expressed, will bring a moral influence on the Chambers, more powerful than mere factious intrigues, and that they will execute the treaty. The gay, generous, and noble-spirited French, will never consent that the honor of the nation shall suffer the withering blight of broken faith; or that the escutcheon of her citizen

King, so lately crowned by their voices, shall be stained by the foul blot which a refusal to execute the treaty would make upon it.

Mr. CHILTON moved to amend the amendment of Mr. ADAMS, by striking out the words "at all hazards."

The CHAIR pronounced it not to be in order, as there was already an amendment to that amendment pending.

Mr. CHILTON hoped Mr. ADAMS would accept the amendment as a modification; it would secure many votes in favor of his proposition, which, if those words were retained, would be given against it.

Mr. ADAMS said he would not accept the modification; what he had already done in that way, by accepting the amendment proposed to him by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] he had done cheerfully, with a view to harmony, and, if possible, unanimity. Although he was willing to vote for the resolution as thus modified, yet he should still prefer that he had at first offered; as it had in it less of harshness, and less of reference to consequences which might follow. He had considered the three resolutions as different parts of one and the same system of measures. He had proposed to declare that we should stand upon our rights, and in no event cannot give them up.

The resolution had been explained and commented on by his friend from Virginia [Mr. PATTON] in a manner much more able and satisfactory than he could himself have done; and though he was willing to take the modification, yet if it did not suit the views of the House as well, he hoped he should not be called obstinate if he should still ask the House to take the question on the resolution in the form in which he had at first offered it.

Mr. E. EVERETT, advertent to the lateness of the hour, (it was now near dark,) proposed a recess till seven o'clock. He understood an express had just arrived with more recent intelligence from France than had yet been received; he presumed every gentleman would wish to have the benefit of the latest light to guide him. He therefore moved that the committee do now rise.

The motion prevailed: Ayes 87, noes 83.

The committee therefore rose and reported progress.

Mr. EVERETT now moved for a recess till seven o'clock; but, before any question could be taken,

The CHAIR laid before the House the following communication from the honorable Mr. EWING, of Indiana:

WASHINGTON CITY, Feb. 28, 1835.

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

SIR: My situation compels me to apologize to the House, and, through you, to my constituents, for my absence from my seat. While on my way to my boarding house, after the adjournment on the evening of the 26th instant. I was waylaid and assaulted in the most outrageous and dastardly manner, by John F. Lane, a Lieutenant in the army, and son of the honorable A. Lane, of Indiana, for no other known cause than for words spoken in debate some weeks since, in reply to his father, on the floor of the House of Representatives.

I had but a casual acquaintance with the person who committed this outrage, and no intercourse whatever to lead to this assault. A blow from an iron cane, with a leaden head, accompanied the first notice of his intention to attack me, and was repeated by several others with a violence which, I regret to say, at this important and pressing period of the session, has entirely disabled me from taking my seat.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JOHN EWING.

Mr. HIESTER moved to lay the communication on the table.

Mr. MAY said he understood that the President of the United States had ordered an inquiry into this subject.

Mr. HIESTER, at the request of several members, withdrew his motion.

Mr. BOULDIN doubted the propriety of instituting an inquiry on the part of the House, if one was already progressing in another quarter.

Mr. KINNARD rose to a question of order. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOULDIN] was speaking of an inquiry, when none was demanded by his colleague. He had, in his letter, done what he had a perfect right to do—apologized to the House and his constituents for his absence at this interesting period of the session. He had assigned the cause which prevented his attendance. But he asked no inquiry; nor did he ask or desire the protection of the House. Mr. K. would say for his colleague that he was prepared and willing, on fair terms, with an equal and honorable antagonist, to protect and defend himself. Mr. K. would leave to other members of more experience than himself to propose such measures as might ensure to the constituents of a member his services on this floor, if, in the estimation of the House, there had been a breach of its privileges, and of the rights of one of its members.

Mr. HANNEGAN offered a resolution for the appointment of a select committee of seven members, to investigate the facts of the alleged assault, and that the same be reported to the House.

Mr. BRIGGS demanded the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolution; which were ordered.

Mr. CLAYTON moved an adjournment.

On this motion Mr. MERCER asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CLAYTON withdrew the motion.

Mr. C. P. WHITE renewed it.

Mr. WISE demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 42, nays 156.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HIESTER renewed the motion to lay the resolution and communication on the table; negatived: Yeas 67, nays 128.

A debate of some length and much animation ensued, on the adoption of the resolution. It was opposed by Mr. POLK, and advocated by Messrs. HARDIN, HANNEGAN, and EVANS; when

Mr. STEWART moved the previous question; which was seconded, and agreed to.

The question being on the adoption of the resolution, Mr. REED demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 127, nays 63.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the House again go into committee on the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. RENCHER moved an adjournment; which was carried: Yeas 114, nays not counted.

So the House adjourned.

MONDAY, MARCH 2.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The petition of sundry citizens of Mississippi, presented by Mr. PLUMMER on the 16th ultimo, praying for the passage of a law granting to each native citizen of the United States, not already a landholder, and who is not worth five hundred dollars, one hundred and sixty acres of land, on condition of settlement and continued cultivation for the period of five years, being under consideration.

Mr. PLUMMER remarked that he was pregnant with sundry speeches, on various subjects, and among them was one that he considered applicable to the subject—matter of the petition under consideration. A recurrence to first principles he deemed necessary to a correct understanding of the land question, as well as the proposition to amend the constitution of the United States. At the risk of again being charged with profanity, he would therefore refer to the same passages of scripture that he attempted to read on Friday last, as applicable to this subject. As it was the last day but one of the session, he would only make a few remarks, and withhold the main body of the speech, with the understanding that he should be allowed to have it printed at full length, as though delivered on that floor. The following are the passages of scripture referred to:

"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth; and God said, let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear. And it was so.

"And God said, let us make man in our image, after our likeness; and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.

"So God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them.

"And God blessed them; and God said unto them, be fruitful and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it."

The Lord placed man, formed of the dust of the earth, in a garden, and commanded him to cultivate it. After the fall of man we are informed of the existence of Cain and Abel, the first a tiller of the ground, and the latter a keeper of sheep. When Abraham and Lot, who settled in the south of Egypt, became so rich in cattle that the country was not sufficient to support both of their herds, they separated themselves one from the other: Lot chose the plain of Jordan, while Abraham dwelt in the land of Canaan. Hence we learn from holy writ that there was no such thing as landed property in the early periods of the history of the world. Although a man had a natural right to occupy as much of the earth as was necessary for the sustenance of his flocks and herds, and "subdued it," in obedience to the divine command, he had no right to locate in perpetuity, as his property, any portion of it. The great Creator of the universe did not open a land office for the issuance of patents and title deeds to the sons and daughters of Adam, but he gave it to them as their inheritance. Landed property did not exist in the days of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as will be inferred from the contentions which frequently arose among the herdsmen of those patriarchs of old. In that age of the world it was not admitted that land could be claimed as property. As the inhabitants of the earth increased and advanced in civilization, and began to obtain their living more by cultivating the earth than by hunting and feeding their flocks and herds, the idea of landed property first took its origin, from the impracticability of separating the improvement made by cultivation from the earth itself upon which that improvement was made. The value of the natural earth became swallowed up in the much greater value of the improvements. In this way the original common right of all became eventually absorbed in the cultivated right of each individual member of the community.

There was sound reason, and, in fact, absolute necessity, in this mode of changing the common right of the original proprietors of the soil into particular rights of individuals, which consists in the fact that man, in a natural state, subsisting by hunting and grazing, requires a much greater extent of country to range over to procure the means of support, than would enable him to sustain himself by cultivating the earth. When, therefore, the country became densely populated, there was a necessity for changing the original order of things; because, without the aid of agriculture and other arts and sciences of civilized life, the whole number of inhabitants could not have been sustained and supported. The great leading object of all Governments, formed by civilized societies, is, and ought to be, the protection, the welfare, the prosperity, and happiness of man. It has been doubted whether civilization has contributed more to the happiness or misery of mankind. He never had any doubts on the subject himself until he was made to doubt by facts which came under his own observation and knowledge, and which cannot be disputed. He had reference to the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians. When he first became acquainted with them, a few years ago, they were a contented and happy people, in their natural and primitive state. Like the tribes of Israel, they held their country in common, each family occupying as much ground as was necessary for the women and children to raise their own corn, while the youthful warrior went forth to the chase, exultingly pursuing the deer as they bounded over the hills, and penetrating the cane-brakes in pursuit of the bear. This is the present happy condition of those Choctaws who have gone to the country assigned them in the regions of the far West. But a portion of them, who considered themselves sufficiently educated to live under the laws of the whites, and enjoy the blessings of civilization, were promised protection in the country of their fathers, and had guarantied to them, by treaty, as much land as they could cultivate. By the 14th article of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit creek, those who chose to remain and become citizens had secured to them six hundred and forty acres of land, on condition that they would remain. They did remain. They have lost their right now to remove at the expense of the Government. They are unable to join their tribe west of the river. If they ever should go, they have lost many of their rights as Choctaws, and forfeited all claim to any portion of the annuities. Their land, in many cases, has been sold from under them by this civilized Government, and their families driven from their homes and camps without the means of subsistence, in a state of wretchedness and want. The subject is, however, before the House, under the charge of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who, no doubt, will do their duty. He only adverted to the situation of these Indians for the purpose of proving, what he was almost afraid to assert for fear of touching the sensibility of gentlemen, that a natural and primitive (he would not say savage) state is more conducive to the general happiness of man than a state of civilization with a bad system and a mal-administration of laws. This is the condition of a portion of the American people. The condition of a man who has not been so fortunate as to inherit an estate from his ancestors, here in this boasted land of liberty, is worse than if he had been born before civilization began, or his lot been cast among the aborigines of our own country. Among the Indians, every man is born to property. He is a joint proprietor of the soil with the rest of his tribe, and has an equal participation with them in its natural productions. It is a principle laid down by political writers, and admitted by every one in theory, that the condition of a person born in a state of civilization ought not to be worse than one born among savages and barbarians. The petitioners represent that many of the sons of the patriots of the Revolution, throughout the United States, those who served in the late war, and against the Indians, and who have on many occasions devoted their time, expended their money, and periled their lives in defence of their country, are now too poor to purchase a home for their wives and children. Is not the condition of these men worse than it would have been if they had been born before civilization began, or among the Indians of our own country? I think I have shown that it is. In a state of nature all men are equal in rights, but not in power. The weak cannot protect themselves against the strong. The object of civilized Governments is therefore for the purpose of securing to each and every member of society that equality of rights which he was entitled to in a state of nature. The laws of every well-regulated Government tend to that point. How is it with our land laws? Do they protect that equality of rights inherent in man, or do they give the man of wealth an opportunity of acquiring a freehold in the soil which they deny to a poor man? Under the wise and humane provisions of our laws, we act as the giver, and not the guardian, of rights, for which society was formed. We give land to our citizens in proportion to their personal property, and withhold it entirely from him who has none. A man who is not born with an inheritance of one hundred dollars more than is necessary to satisfy his hunger and clothe his nakedness, is deprived of that equality of rights guaranteed to him by the laws of nature and of nature's God. He is made by the laws of the country to bow submission to his fellow-man, and become the hireling, the vassal, the slave, of his more wealthy neighbor. He had not time to enlarge on the subject, but he must be permitted to assert that this inequality of rights created by our land laws was a blot upon our statute book, a stain upon our national character, and an insult to the offended majesty of Him who gave the earth to man as his inheritance, and commanded him to cultivate it. As well might Congress pass a law against that part of the Divine command which required man to "be fruitful and multiply," as against that portion which required him to "subdue" or cultivate the earth. Our Government is the only nation on earth that ever adopted the policy of holding up its waste and unappropriated lands as a source of revenue, unless for the time being, when its treasury had become exhausted by foreign or intestine wars. Our poor citizens are in a worse condition than they were under the arbitrary power of Spain, or the Crown of Great Britain. Those Governments gave to their transatlantic subjects as much land as they could cultivate, requiring of them no other consideration than settlement and cultivation, in addition to the expense of surveying.

The petitioners advert to the liberal course of policy pursued by other Governments in relation to their waste and unappropriated lands. They acknowledge their obligations to the general Government for the favors extended to the settlers on the public domain, in the many pre-emption and other laws which it has passed for their benefit, but they take a more liberal, expanded, and statesmanlike view of the subject, and ask the passage of a law granting to every native-born citizen of the United States, who is not already a landholder and is not worth five hundred dollars, one hundred and sixty acres of land, on condition of settlement and continued cultivation for the period of five years. It is not a local question, but one which affects the whole of the people, and is co-extensive with the Union. They highly approve of the several acts of Congress making grants of land to that distinguished patriot and friend of liberty, Gilbert Motier de Lafayette, and also to the brave exiles from Poland, who sought an asylum in our country, and express the hope that, in these United States, where all our citizens are soldiers, all defenders of the liberties of their country, the Government, holding extensive tracts of waste lands, will no longer permit any one of her native citizens to be left without a spot of ground which he can call his own. They state the fact that a neighboring Government (the Mexican Republic) is holding out inducements to emigrants, by offering donations of lands to actual settlers, and that many of our most valued citizens who have periled their lives in defence of those rights and liberties which they inherited from their fathers, will be compelled to seek there, in a distant land, a home which they cannot obtain here. Strange policy, indeed, for the United States to pursue, is that which receives with open arms, protects and provides with homes, the exiles of a distant nation, while it, in effect, drives by its laws our own citizen soldiers to seek a home under the protecting hand of a foreign Government. They advert to the payment of the national debt as a propitious period for the adoption of a more liberal policy on the subject of the public lands.

One of the arguments in favor of holding up the lands at a high price, as a source of revenue, urged by the politicians of the country, was, that they were pledged for the payment of the national debt. The national debt is at length paid. That glorious event, so gratifying to every true American, which has been so long looked to with hope and expectation by the people of the Union, has at length arrived, and can no longer be urged as a pretext to keep a portion of our most valued citizens in a state of abject slavery and bondage. He would not at that time permit himself to go into a discussion of the land question. His views on that subject are already known to the country. He could not, however, permit this occasion to pass without asserting the rights of the people of this country to their natural inheritance. He did not ask on the part of the poor man a grant of land sufficient to support his family as a charity, but he claimed it at the hands of the Government as a right. The Government is not the giver but the protector and guardian of the natural rights of the people. If the right of every man to as much land as he can cultivate does not exist in law, it is not because it does not exist in fact, but because it has been usurped and taken from him by the legislators of the land. A compliance with the prayer of the petitioners would, therefore, not be a creation of a right, but only the acknowledgment, by law, of a pre-existing right; a right, as he had shown, coeval with the existence of man.

WEST POINT ACADEMY.

The report and bill from the select committee on the West Point Academy were taken up, the question being on the motion to recommit and print.

Mr. GARLAND moved to lay the whole subject on the table, but withdrew it.

Mr. MANN called for the reading of the report.

Mr. WILDE renewed the motion to lay on the table, and withdrew it.

After a conversation on a point of order, Mr. HALL, of North Carolina, spoke in opposition to the printing of the report, on the ground that, in consequence of the irregular mode in which the committee conducted the business, the report was not entitled to be considered as the report of a committee.

Mr. J. Y. MASON rose to a point of order. He contended that it was not in order to discuss the proceedings of a committee.

The CHAIR overruled the objection.

Mr. HALL proceeded to review the course of the committee, and argued from it that the report was not entitled to the sanction of the House. Before he had concluded,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the House proceed to the orders of the day; which was agreed to.

RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the report and resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on the subject of the relations with France.

Relations with France.

[MARCH 2, 1835.]

On this motion Mr. WILDE asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Ayes 104, nays 92.

So the motion prevailed.

The report and resolutions being before the House,

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS said he had, on Saturday, accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ANCHER,] as a modification of his first resolution; but, he begged to state, that he wished a direct vote upon his resolution, if the amendment of Mr. ANCHER should be rejected.

Some conversation ensued upon the question before the House; and after an explanation from Mr. MASON, of Virginia, who was in the chair in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on Saturday,

The SPEAKER informed the House that the question would be on the amendment of Mr. ANCHER first, which is as follows:

“Resolved, That in the just expectation that the Government of France will have made provision, or will make provision, for carrying into effect the stipulations of the treaty of indemnity with that Government of the 4th of July, 1831, this House will forbear at the present time to adopt any measure in relation to that subject.”

Mr. E. EVERETT, was entitled to the floor, and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: When the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union rose last Saturday, it was on my motion. I wished, at the late hour of the day at which we had arrived, to take a short recess, and, returning in the evening, dispose of the question, finally, before the House should adjourn. Circumstances occurred, after the committee rose, which are in the recollection of the House, and which defeated this purpose. It was my intention, had the House resumed the discussion on Saturday evening, to have said a few words on the form in which the question had been placed by the last movement of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and this still seems my duty, under the circumstances of the case. I did not, but for this, purpose to enter into the debate. To do so, at this stage of the session, is grievously to offend against the public service. I have had an opportunity, in another form, to submit the general views entertained of the question by two of my colleagues on the committee and myself, to the House and the country. Sir, there is another reason for not debating this question. It is next to impossible to do so, on any side of the House, without saying what had better not be said. I think it must have crossed the mind of every gentleman on the floor, that there has not been a speech made which did not contain some sentiment which might prejudice the public interest at home or abroad. I cannot hope to avoid the same danger.

But the gentleman from New York, by detaching a portion of a sentence from the concluding paragraph of the minority report, and submitting it to the House in the form of a resolution, has compelled me to make some explanations of the purport of the sentiment expressed in that extracted sentence, to prevent the misconceptions of which it has been, and may still be, the subject. These explanations shall be as brief as possible.

Sir, this subject came before the Committee on Foreign Affairs at the commencement of the session, under the reference of the President's message, in which he recommended, that in case no appropriation should be made by the French Chambers, at their present session, to execute the treaty, reprisals should be authorized against the commerce of France. A proposition to that effect was distinctly submitted to the committee, at an early period, by its late chairman, Mr. Wayne. I thought the recommendation and the measure in the highest degree inexpedient, and equally so, whether they were to be adopted or not; for if the measure was to be adopted, this previous notice might naturally have the effect of putting the other party on his guard, and leading him to anticipate it. The committee, by a very large majority, six to three, rejected that measure, and it was publicly known that they had done so, on the day on which the resolution of the Senate was adopted, or the day after.

But, still more effectually to counteract the unfavorable operation of the recommendation, I wished the committee and my colleagues of the minority were of the same mind, to report their non-concurrence in the President's recommendation to the House. But to prevent such a course from operating in the slightest degree to the injury of the American cause, or implying the remotest purpose to abandon the treaty, I wished the resolution, declaring it as the sense of the House that reprisals were inexpedient, to be accompanied by a report, which should effectually preclude any such inference. Such a report I prepared, but the committee was pleased to intrust the duty of making its reports to the far abler hands of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMERON,] which may account for my not obtruding on them the views I took on the subject. But the majority of the committee, while they steadily rejected the proposed measure of reprisals, as steadily declined reporting to the House; and thus the session has passed off, and no report been made, till at the last moment, when we are unquestionably less prepared to act on it than ever before; when the utmost we know is, that very important movements are going on of which we know nothing; we are called upon, not to consider—there is no time for that but to dispose of the question—on the resolutions now submitted.

These resolutions were offered in the committee on the 20th of February, little over a week ago. The gentleman from New York, if I understood him across the House, said the minority of the committee would vote neither one way nor the other, and that he could not tell whether we are for or against them. I regret these disorderly allusions to the doings of the committee. They are of very recent introduction, in reference to that committee, and, the House will bear me witness, never resorted to by me but in self-defence. Sir, I never for a moment concealed my opinions on the resolution, by silence, or in any other way. I uniformly and distinctly said that I was utterly opposed to the first part of the resolution, which went to close the door on negotiation. I as distinctly said that I approved the sentiment of the second portion of the resolution, viz: that the treaty was to be insisted on; but I thought and said that I doubted the expediency of submitting a resolution to the House. I was at a great loss as to the proper language for such a resolution as it would be wise to adopt; but I had not decided that I would vote for no resolution whatever, although it was my prevailing opinion that this, upon the whole, was the safer course. Accordingly, in preparing our minority report, where, of course, we had full opportunity unembarrassed to present the subject to the House in the form which we thought best, my colleagues and myself forbore to offer any resolutions to the House. But the majority insisted on reporting resolutions, and adopted those which are before the House, as, in their opinion, the resolutions likely to unite the greatest number of voices. These the chairman thought it expedient to submit, without an exposition of the case.

The minority, therefore, had nothing left but to pursue their own course, and submit their views of this great subject to the House and the people. In doing this, four things were to be attended to; first, to state their dissent from the proposed measure of reprisals; a most important point, which, if justice was to be done to the views of the minority, should have been extracted from their report, in conjunction with its closing sentence. This dissent, however, is stated by us in the mildest terms possible towards our colleagues, who were disposed to adopt the President's recommendation. The second point was to set forth the origin and justice of the claims, and the obligation of the treaty, in reply to a portion of the arguments against it in the French Chambers. Those arguments have been scattered by the House through the country, by the publication of ten thousand copies of the pamphlet which contains them. The minority thought that some counter statements on so grave a subject ought to go out to the people, who are just beginning to discuss it, to show that, in standing on the treaty, we stand on a basis of truth and justice. Thus far there was no difficulty. The third point was one of delicacy. It was the degree to which the recent diplomatic collisions varied the state of the question. This is one of the topics which I had in my mind, when I said it was next to impossible freely to canvass the question, without saying something which had better not be said. I will not, in repeating it, disregard my own caution. I will only say the majority thought the question to be greatly affected by these diplomatic collisions; the minority thought otherwise. This opinion is intimated with great moderation in the minority report. I would still adhere to the language of prudence on this subject; but I will say to this House that I deem it the most important office which Congress has to perform on this question, to keep the great controversy on its original basis and merits. There is difficulty enough in it. Do not let it be aggravated by a diplomatic controversy, recent, superinduced, and personal. Let not "factitious subjects of collision," as Mr. Livingston justly calls them, in writing to the Count de Rigny, be substituted for the main question of the execution of the treaty. But I will not go into this matter. I have an opinion, a very decided one, in reference to it; but I will only repeat, what is stated in the report of the minority, that in our judgment the occurrences connected with the interruption of the usual diplomatic intercourse between the two countries, (as far as they have been communicated to us, which is but imperfectly,) do not admit the interference of Congress. From these premises, we came to our fourth proposition, that nothing ought to be done at this session of Congress, although we avowed our willingness, if any measures were deemed necessary in the ordinary course of legislation, for the public defence and safety, to co-operate in their passage. Our reference was to bills before this House or the other, or their committees, for the repair and armament of the fortifications. The confidential friends of the Executive, who compose the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means in this House, thought it expedient at the beginning of the session to follow up the recommendation of reprisals, (a hostile if not a warlike measure,) with a reduction to one half of the usual amount of the ordinary appropriations for fortifications; and I was for one prepared to support the amendments moved in the Senate to the bills of this House to supply this singular omission.

Relations with France.

And, with this exposition of their views, the minority deemed it expedient to stop, consigning the whole subject, in all its human bearings, to the consideration of the people and the deliberations of the next Congress. But to prevent the misconception of their views, toward which they thought they perceived some tendency, they added, as a closing sentiment, the words which the gentleman from New York has detached from their context, and offered as a resolution.

Sir, these words contain my opinion, my feeling, my judgment; but they are not my resolution. I did not draught them nor offer them as a resolution. In the hands of the gentleman from New York, and in the use to which he puts them, they are open to some objection; for a resolution they are not, entirely in parliamentary style. But they appear to suit the gentleman from New York for that purpose; he adopted them two days ago; declared they met the unanimous approbation of the majority of the committee, and he still adheres to them.

A motion has been made to strike out the words "at all hazards," which, if the sentence passes as a resolution would, I think, be an improvement in the phraseology, though not changing the sense; for I take it when a man says he insists on a thing, he does not mean that he insists on it, if nobody makes objection, but if his right is disputed he will give it up. And when a nation insists, I do not understand that the meaning is that she insists so long as things go smoothly, but if any one encroaches she will step back. No, sir, I take it that to insist is precisely to claim your right, at whatever hazard. To stand or fall by it. For this reason, though the qualification is naturally enough introduced for the purpose of emphasis in a discussion, I think it better omitted in a resolution.

With this change, the resolution will stand, that the treaty ought to be maintained and its execution insisted upon. Ought it not, sir? Is there any dissentient voice? Is there any man here who thinks that the treaty ought not to be maintained, that its execution ought not to be insisted on? Of course not. There may be difference of opinion as to the expediency of expressing that sentiment by way of resolution; there can be none as to the sentiment itself. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ALEXANDER] has moved an amendment to the effect that the House, entertaining a just expectation that the treaty will be complied with, forbears, at the present time, to adopt any measure.

[Mr. BAKER here intimated to Mr. E. that those words had been since omitted by Mr. ALEXANDER.]

A very judicious change; for certainly those expressions, "forbears," and at "the present time," were liable to all the objections which would apply to the adoption, at this moment, of a resolution relative to the measures which would be resorted to, when the just expectation, now entertained, should be disappointed, and forbearance cease to be a duty.

But what is the course of the policy we would recommend, in saying that the treaty should be maintained, and its execution insisted on? for if this proposition is to be submitted to the House, it is proper that its import should not be mistaken.

First, then, let me say what the course recommended is not, neither in its letter nor its spirit. It is not that the execution of the treaty is to be enforced at all hazards. We say nothing about that, positively or negatively. What a man will insist on he knows; what he will enforce is beyond the grasp of human foresight. But the treaty is to be maintained, and its execution insisted on: never abandoned; never compromised; steadily pursued, by such a course of policy as shall be thought best adapted to effect the object. What is that course of policy? It is, in the first place, to abstain from every thing irritating and minatory. The question is necessarily beset with some grave difficulties. Great care, as I have already observed, should be taken to exclude from it "all factitious" subjects of collision.

Then, instead of shutting the door of negotiation, we would keep it wide open to the last. How else is the difficulty to be remedied? Look at Mr. Livingston's last despatch. Awkwardly situated as he was, doubtful whether he had been dismissed by the French Government, he yet tells Mr. Forsyth that he will endeavor to obtain an explanation from the minister relative to the omission of interest in the projet de loi. And what is this but negotiation? When the first resolution was in the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I objected to it on this ground: I said then, as my distinguished colleague [Mr. ADAMS] said the other day, that I would not pass a resolution not to negotiate, not even flagrante bello. No, sir, not though burning, blazing war was raging from Georgia to Maine, and over all the ocean. Is it to burn for ever? How is it to be extinguished? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ANCHER] asks how you can negotiate, if you first resolve you will insist on the treaty? I answer, negotiate on that basis. Negotiation does not imply that every thing is subject to be surrendered. Our commissioners in 1782 negotiated on the immovable basis of the recognition of the independence of the United States.

But suppose the negotiation fails. What would I do then? That question it is not possible, nor, if possible, either necessary or expedient to answer. Who can foresee, define, the future? We must be governed by circumstances; and the only thing of which there can be no doubt, is that, in the language of the resolution, we could still maintain the treaty, and insist upon its execution. For simple non-execution I would not go to war. I would, among other alternatives, try the experiment of commercial restrictions. I would do away the discriminations now existing in favor of some branches of French commerce; and thus bring the question home to the manufacturers, merchants, and agricultural interest in France. I had as lief trust the starving weavers of Lyons to negotiate for me, as the most skillful of our diplomates. I believe they would plead our cause successfully. Mr. Livingston is of the same opinion. He says in his letter of the 11th of January, "Should Congress propose commercial restriction or determine to wait to the end of the session before they act, this will be considered as a vote against reprisals; and then the law will be proposed, and I think carried." Yes, sir, Mr. Livingston, after having received the message, built his hopes of the execution of the treaty by France, on the expectation that Congress would reject the President's recommendation of reprisals and adopt commercial restrictions. But, in ordering these restrictions, it would be expedient to adopt such only as would not interfere with the treaty of 1831.

But should this measure fail, what other could be resorted to? A non-intercourse has been proposed as a milder, and probably more efficacious measure than hostilities. Memorials to that effect, from the quarter of the country I have the honor in part to represent, are before the House. It is within the competence of the United States, by giving six months' notice, to relinquish the convention of 1822, and thus disembarass these measures of all question of right, under existing compacts.

And if this course should fail, what should then be done? Sir, I know not. I go no further in indicating a practicable course; others may, who are wiser. Into that dark and inauspicious condition of things, which will arise, should every measure suggested fail, I presume not to penetrate. I will not try to lift the veil that hangs over the future. There are great and eventual crises in the affairs of all nations, but it is wantonness to sport with predictions of the form, the time, and the causes of their occurrence. This I will only say, that, in my present judgment, the mere non-execution of a treaty, unaccompanied with affront, insult, outrage, or any other circumstance touching the character of the nation, will not probably be thought, by the country or by Congress, a necessary cause of war. But I leave that question to those who will have to decide it. I would not shun my share of responsibility, did it devolve upon me; but it does not.

Another day, sir, will close my humble career in this place. If, before leaving it, in all probability never to return; if on parting, most certainly never to meet again, from many respected, and some whom I may call beloved associates, I might use the privilege of one who, faithful to his political friends, has yet never designedly assumed the character of a violent opponent, not wandered far from the path of moderate counsels; if from the bottom of a heart, which (if I know it) bears no malice, political or personal, to any human being, I might utter one word of farewell to my esteemed associates who will still occupy these seats, and of appeal to those who will come to fill our vacant places; that word should be, in the name of Heaven, to preserve the peace of the country. I do not address this to the minority, to my political friends, the only part of the House to whom I could, in strict propriety, offer a suggestion. We, sir, in the present division of parties, can do nothing, borne down, I will not say trampled down, as we are by numbers, on this floor; without the control of a single committee, and with no means to exercise an influence in the country but by the fearless utterance of the truth. But I speak to the majority; to the leaders of the majority; men whom I could name, here and elsewhere, did not delicacy forbid; men whose talents I respect; whose motives I will not impugn; and to whom, without a shade of envy, I wish the happy enjoyment of their honors; I say to them, in the name of Heaven, preserve the peace of the country. They can do it; it is in their hands; and I declare on my conscience, I believe the next twelve months are hanging over them, full of consequences more momentous than are ordinarily brought about in an age. I adjure them by all they value, by their love of honest fame, as they prize the good opinion of good men, as they cherish the welfare of their families and the public interest—I implore them to preserve the peace of the country. I beseech them to manage this great question with firmness, resolutely, but gently, patiently, wisely; and if they would not deserve the execrations of honest men, to the end of time, to exclude from it every thought and calculation of partisan policy.

Sir, if I might go farther, if I thought my humble voice would reach the President of the United States, a voice which, if it never flattered him, never vilified him, nor ever withheld from him the meed of praise to which his services are entitled, I would say to him, I adjure you, sir, to use your tremendous power to preserve the peace of the country. Our institutions are popular—democratic; but at this moment, and on this question, (I say it not invidiously, but because it is true) the President of the United States exercises a greater power than any King or Emperor that ever filled a throne; ten times the power of the King of the French, who appears, in some degree, as a party opposed to the President in this painful controversy. Let me adjure the President to exercise his vast power to preserve the peace of the country. Let the last years of his eventful life, already crowned with a singular variety of success and honor, be signalized by the glories of a war, not gallantly braved but honorably avoided. Let him add to his laurels, one more precious than all, the olive wreath of bloodless triumph, victoria sine clade—a continued peace and all its blessings. I too, sir, with my distinguished colleague, [Mr. ADAMS,] admire the President's spirit. But spirit is not all that is wanted for the conduct of great affairs. There must be prudence, there must be moderation, there must be wisdom. Nobody doubts the President's spirit. Would to God he would carry the country through this crisis in such a manner as to gain the praise of a masterly discretion, a heroic forbearance; and enable us, his opponents, to say,

Relations with France.

[H. OF R.]

"———'tis much he dares;
And to that dauntless temper of his mind,
He hath a wisdom, that doth guide his valor
To act in safety."

Sir, if the President will so temper his policy, on this occasion, as to carry this country honorably through the controversy, without a war—and I think it can be done—he will draw down upon his head the blessings of men, whose voices have never mingled with the incense of his flatterers; and his name, in the eyes of all mankind and of an impartial posterity, will appear fairer and brighter than when he came out from the blazing lines of New Orleans, in all the freshness of his victory and its honors.

Let the President pursue this policy, in this temper, and he will carry the people along with him, whatever may betide. As one of the humblest of her sons, I engage for New England. The public mind, I think, is entirely sound on this question. The people are anxious: it is natural. There is a vast property afloat; our merchants have connexions with every accessible port on the habitable globe. There are two entire capitals, not less than a hundred millions each, in transit. These are great interests. The people do not want war—do not want war with France—do not want war for five millions of dollars. Neither do they want the rights of the country sacrificed or abandoned; and less than all, do they wish to submit to affront or outrage. I will answer for the merchants of Massachusetts; give them a just and necessary cause, and they will say to you as John Hancock did in 1775, when asked his opinion in Congress, on the expediency of destroying Boston, then in the hands of the enemy: "My property, my all is there, and if the public good requires it, I give it for my country." This spirit is as strong now as ever, in town and in country. But the people are not blind to the dreadful evils of war. It is, at best, a dire calamity. They do not wish to plunge into it. They look to their Government to do its duty firmly, but prudently; and they look to France to do her duty. The burden of remaining at peace does not rest exclusively on us. It rests equally on the other party. France, her King, her ministers, her Chambers, and leading men, have a great responsibility to bear. The great original wrong—the plunder of our commerce—was on the part of France. The first wrong step since the treaty was hers, in refusing to execute it. France has placed herself eminently, signally, in the wrong. There, sir, for Heaven's sake, let us keep her. So long as we stand on that vantage ground, we cannot be shaken. The moment we quit it, half our strength is lost. Let us keep in the right, and I believe we shall keep at peace; and if that hope fails, we shall go as one man to the contest.

When Mr. EVERETT had concluded,

Mr. ALLEN, of Ohio, rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker: However much I may be disinclined to yield to the general reasoning of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVANSTON] who has this moment resumed his seat, I may very truly reiterate his concluding remarks. I, too, am on the eve of political dissolution; and it is with the last breath of a very brief public life that I am to pronounce a vote upon a question the decision of which must immediately influence the character, and may remotely affect the independence, of the nation. This question, sir, is one of no frequent occurrence; arising, as it does, out of the delicate complexity of our foreign relations, its novelty must excite the curiosity of other countries scarcely less than its magnitude awakens the feelings of our own. Upon such a question, it seems to me that the opinion of this House should not go forth imbedded only in the dumb record of a formal vote; but the constitutional necessity of closing the session to-morrow must, of course, limit discussion, and compel all who participate in it to submit but an imperfect outline of their views, unaccompanied by the customary illustrations of elaborated argument. And yet, sir, I am not certain that this restraint is much to be regretted. For, should the action of this body result, as I trust it will, in a declaration of its stern determination to maintain the national honor, it will require but little reasoning to justify its course in the impartial judgment of the world. And if, upon the other hand, we should shrink in servile terror from the imaginary dangers of such a declaration, we shall find in no fortress that argument can erect a secure refuge from the cold contempt of mankind.

Sir, the incidental and promiscuous discussion which this subject has already undergone discloses in this House a most extraordinary ambiguity of feeling and miscellaneous mixture of contradictory opinions. Were the claims of our citizens upon the French Government for spoliation just? All admit it. Has France become bound to the United States, by treaty, to indemnify those citizens, through their Government? No man denies it. Have three years elapsed since the ratification of the treaty; and is the indemnity yet unpaid? It is conceded. Ought the United States to insist upon the faithful execution of the treaty by France? From all quarters the reply is, yes. Such are the questions, and such the answers of all. And yet, many of those who thus express themselves as individuals and as members upon this floor, conclude by telling us that this House, which represents the interests, the will, and purposes of the nation, ought not, as such, to declare these facts in the form of a resolution—ought not to declare them, because the door of negotiation should not be closed—because such a declaration might wound the royal sensibility of the King of the French—because a rupture between the two countries might be the result, and war follow as the ultimate consequence. To these potential reasons the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ALEXANDER] has added another: that France is great and strong, that we are small and feeble, and that we must therefore submit. Yes, sir, submit to the violation of national faith, to the infraction of treaties, and to the dishonor of our country, and that, too, not only without resistance, but without even the last poor privilege of subdued imbecility—the hopeless privilege of complaint. We are to acquiesce in sullen submission to our fate, in being rudely spurned from within the pale of the law of nations; and, thus degraded, we are to ask the world to fix the standard of our national honor upon the basis of our national degradation.

In order to give force to these arguments, the subject under discussion has been treated as a proposition of immediate hostilities. Gentlemen have assumed, first, that we are about to declare war; and, secondly, that victory will abandon our flag, and defeat dishonor our arms. Our fears are thus to be excited, our energies paralyzed, and our spirit subdued, by this assumption of facts which do not exist, and foreboding of ruin that never can happen. All the calamities of disastrous war have been grouped together and pressed upon the imagination; and whilst this pale progeny of an affrighted fancy is drawn up in mournful array before us, we are invoked, in the impassioned prayer of a patriot for the preservation of his country, not to "unchain the angel of destruction in the land."

Sir, as men who are willing to reason and deliberate, it may be well to remove this "grim-visaged" spectre of war from our view, whose presence seems so much to dim the vision as to render every other object invisible but its own "wrinkled front."

Mr. Speaker, I will take the liberty of saying that the question of peace or war, so far from being now under discussion here, is a question which this country is not, nor can be, called upon to decide. That question is with France alone. She will judge of her own interests, and be governed by her own judgment. If the Government of France, or the predominating party there, believe, contrary to the opinion of all the rest of the world, that their interests will be promoted by their refusal to execute this treaty, and by a consequent change of the relations between the two countries, from peace and amity to anger and war, that refusal will be given and that change be made. This she will do, apart from all other considerations. If such be her purpose, our course will not influence hers. Whether we act with energy, or continue torpid, her conduct will be the same. Her interests alone will direct her action. Congress may rebuke the President, and try to ward off calamity by assuming cowardice; but if France thinks it her policy to quarrel with us, her sagacity will soon discover in this treaty the pretext of a rupture, and give to the discovery all the plausibility of national honor. When, sir, I say that France will pursue what she supposes her interests, apart from all other considerations, I mean to impute to her no greater disregard of the integrity of international obligations than is equally imputable to all other Governments. Sir, in discussing the great concerns of a nation, it is proper that we should look sincerely upon things as they are—as they stand, and must for ever stand, fixed by the irrevocable law of necessity. We should lay aside the courteous duplicity of private life, and speak of facts as we see them. We should be governed in our course by the realities of truth, not by the delusive drapery which the refined sensibility of the world has thrown around its offensive deformity. The history of all time past forbids us to doubt that, in reference to the rest of mankind, the interest of a nation is its only standard of morals. And, sir, I do not hesitate to assert that the nature of man, the necessities of his condition, and the consequent direction of human affairs, render it impossible to erect any other standard for the conduct of nations. So deep are the effects of this truth, that the public opinion of the world has made national honor itself to consist alone in a nation's capacity to discern, and in its resolution and success in the prosecution of its real interests.

H. of R.]

Relations with France.

We may, therefore, be assured, that if France believes it to be her interest, in reference either to her external policy or internal condition, to interrupt the harmony subsisting between the two nations, and to assume a hostile relation towards us, neither the tone of the executive message, nor the passage of this resolution, will divert her from her purpose, or hurry her in its execution. We may increase the plausibility of her justification, but will not furnish the justification itself.

But if, sir, as is doubtless the fact, France recognises her own interests and policy in the continuance of reciprocal friendship, between her and us, she will not passionately sacrifice those interests. Why should she? Is it because the President and this House tell her that she must execute this treaty—tell her that which the law of nations told her at the time of its ratification? No, sir: there are men as well as children in France. It is not to be supposed that a nation, to whom the judgment of mankind has voluntarily ascribed the highest intellectual attributes—a nation whose infinite variety of fortune, through a series of two thousand years, has taught her the value of wisdom and the penalty of imprudence, will now, in the full maturity of her faculties, give way to the puerile passion of offended vanity, and sacrifice her best interests in the very presence and to the evident benefit of a great neighboring Power and natural enemy. And all for what? Because her ancient friend presumes to speak to her in the frank and firm tone of that independence which she herself assisted to achieve.

No, sir, it is weakness to suppose it. France will redeem her plighted faith, if we do not, by our silent indifference, invite its forfeiture. If she do not desire a rupture at all events, she will pay the indemnity; but not without we have the courage to demand it—to demand it in a tone which shall distinctly imply that her refusal will disturb the commercial intercourse of the two countries, and afford the American Republic an opportunity of exhibiting herself to the eyes of regal Europe, not as an appended satellite, but as a primary power, moving within the orbit of the law of nations.

In either of the two aspects in which I have placed this subject, I maintain that the interests, the honor, and independence of the nation, require of this House the passage of a resolution strongly and distinctly declaratory of the feeling and determination of the country. France should be told, in language too emphatic to be misunderstood, that this treaty is to be maintained and its execution enforced, without regard to the consequences contingent upon her displeasure. She should know that, as an independent nation, we must consult our own sense of justice and national honor, not her affected sensibility, to find the rule of our conduct.

The first element of civil liberty is national independence; and it becomes, therefore, the first and most sacred duty of the people of the United States to guard and maintain that independence. To guard it, as well against the silent and secret progress of a principle which may ultimately undermine its foundation as against the most immediate and open assaults. And, sir, I falter not in asserting that, however much to be dreaded or deplored may be the result, should France be pleased to make our firmness the pretext of hostilities, yet that the consequences of betraying a want of that firmness will be immeasurably more so. She had placed us in a conjuncture where silence is disgrace, submission infamous, and even moderation a reproach. To stand mute and motionless in this position is impossible, consistently with the real independence of the country. When, sir, I speak of national independence, I do not mean a mere colonial exemption from the absolute dominion of another country. I mean that independence which lifts a nation to the rank of a primary power; which places all other Governments, with regard to her, under the obligations of international law; and which affords protection to the citizen and his property, on every sea, against every power but the winds and the waves.

The question before us, to be fully comprehended in all its relations, must be viewed in a double aspect: as a question involving the protection of commerce as well as the observance of treaties. When we were negotiating for indemnity, did we mean to say to France, if you refuse the indemnity we can do nothing more? When the treaty was ratified, did we intend to leave its execution dependent upon the good will and pleasure of France alone? If so, then indeed should this House tremble and stand mute. For, as a nation, we have already denationalized our own flag, exposed our commerce to the unsparing rapacity of foreign nations, and exerted the treaty-making function, one of the highest attributes of national independence, only to bind ourselves and absolve all the rest of mankind. If not so, why should we not feel, and speak, and act, as becomes a people who, if not quick, are yet certain, to assert their rights, and able to enforce them? Why bear and forbear, when every moment of our patience is at the evident peril of dishonor? The answers to these questions have already been given: we are a Republic; our policy is peace; this treaty is with a great monarchy; if we say any thing about it, we may displease the King, and perhaps he will declare war against us.

Sir, it has been truly said and often repeated, that our institutions are essentially pacific. This remark must be understood to mean that the genius of our system necessarily restrains that passion for foreign conquest and enlarged dominion common to all nations. If it mean more, it is nonsense. If it mean that the moral action of our institutions upon the mind and heart of the nation tends to reduce the standard of national honor, benumbs the sensibility of the people, and substitutes humiliating fortitude for the spirit of resistance, when outrage is offered—if this be the meaning of the observation, it is false in fact, and a libel in its application.

MARCH 2, 1835.]

Relations with France.

Mr. Speaker, the effects of our proceedings to-day, whatever those proceedings may be, will not cease with our adjournment, or be lost among the vagrant incidents of the times. Should we surrender this treaty, by refusing to insist upon its execution, we shall have cast a doubt upon the efficiency of the republican forms of government, which must excite a reasonable despair of their stability.

If, sir, there be any one fault which, more than all others, pervades the general course of our reasoning on political subjects, it is that of limiting our view exclusively to the immediate and palpable effects of our acts upon the current and transitory affairs of the country, without looking to those remoter consequences which silently and imperceptibly follow, from causes apparently insufficient to produce them. We are apt to form our judgments upon the most handy and convenient reasons; and, instead of considering the nation and the Government as beings which are to subsist through an indefinite series of ages, we unconsciously reason in reference to them, as though they were things of but temporary duration, destined to pass away with the generation of which we ourselves are a part. The position we are about to assume should be taken in reference, not only to this particular treaty, and to the single Government of France, but in reference also to the peculiarity of our internal condition, and to the delicacy of our relations, as a Republic, to the regal system of government abroad.

Sir, Europe and America are the two great quarters of the globe which most powerfully act and react upon each other. Though widely separated by intervening seas, there formerly existed between them certain political connexions and affinities, which time and events have finally severed or dissolved. They now present two great and rival classes of Governments, whose principles are absolutely antagonist to each other. Europe still maintains the ancient regal form, with all its diversities and extremes of power and oppression—of splendor and misery. The settlement of the American continent commenced at an era when the broad vista which the light of truth and science had made through the surrounding darkness of superstition and error, opened a new course to the current of human affairs. The communities of European settlers found themselves without the restraining presence of arbitrary power, and in some measure freed from that habitual obedience which they had so long yielded to the tyranny of hereditary dogmas and venerated customs. The very expanse, wildness, and novelty, of the virgin world in which they moved, gave an impulse to the sentiment of freedom. This sentiment was strengthened with the increasing strength and number of the colonies, until it became the ruling passion of the soul, and at length displayed its maturity in the achievement of the American Revolution. Our Government is the grand result. The ample basis upon which it rests is a single fundamental principle—the exact inversion of a pure monarchy—the elements of power not being concentrated in a throne, and acting from thence upon the body of the nation, but abiding in the mass of the community, as the primitive source, and acting from thence, through a changing agency, upon the individuals of whom that mass is composed. This great elementary principle, which runs throughout our institutions and effectually secures the simplicity of freedom, by complicating the checks to oppression, has extended itself to the southern portion of the continent, and made the republican form of government the system of America. Sir, it has done more—it has multiplied the enemies of despotism in the very presence of despots, and divided the population of Europe into two great parties. The United States occupy the centre of this system, and stands at the head of the liberal party. Her strength, her firmness, intelligence, and resources, the promptitude of her measures, and the force of her example, can alone sustain the one or give hope to the other. The attention of mankind is turned upon her as the last refuge of human nature from the spell of hopeless bondage. Our system is antagonist to the regal system of Europe. Their respective principles are in open collision. No affinities, no sympathy, can ever exist between freedom and a throne. The American form of government is still in its youth. It is at that perilous point in its progress from infancy to maturity, when the slightest incident will leave its impression, and when every impression will contribute to form its future character, and brighten or cloud its prospects of success. The incredulity of despotism, even now, views it as a problematical experiment, and looks upon us with a threatening eye. Each act of ours, in reference to a foreign kingdom, at this critical juncture in our political progression, must influence, more or less, for better or for worse, the future destiny of the Republic and of the system which its example supports. For us now to falter, to cringe, to cower, and submit, rather than assert our rights at the hazard of a monarch's displeasure, is to hoist the first signal of our ruin. The rights and independence of one nation are not to be maintained and secured by the favor, the friendship, or forbearance, of others; but by the force of opinion, until that force is spent, and then by the force of arms.

If, sir, after the cooing spirit which has been manifested towards France in this debate, we should reject this resolution, or adopt some one of this litter of neutralizing amendments, we shall be considered as having betrayed our own distrust of the capacity of our Government to sustain itself in a contest with a foreign monarchy. Our conduct will be received as proof conclusive that the spirit of the country is too docile; that the passions of the people are too obsequious to the allurements of avarice and ease; that the moral power of public opinion is too vague, indefinite, and diffusive, to be imbodied and brought to bear in the defence of national rights. It will be believed that we have discovered a secret weakness—a latent imperfection—a tardy sloth in the active principles of our system, which render it incompetent to the prompt and vigorous operations of national defence. It is the standing argument against the republican form of government, that it wants the energy and unity of action necessary in the rapidly changing incidents of war. Sir, what is the fact? Have not these opinions already gone abroad, and are they not at this very hour deeply affecting the interests and character of our country? Yes, sir, they are the potent agents that have placed us in the dire dilemma, from which we are at this very moment struggling to extricate the nation. The leading speaker in the Chamber of Deputies, who opposed the passage of the indemnity bill, in the debate which terminated in its rejection, rested the burden of his argument against the bill and the execution of the treaty upon the submissive temper of our Government, in bearing unredressed the wrongs committed and the insults offered by England, prior to the late war. He also urged as an argument, a charge which the vote of this House to-day must confirm or disprove, that the people of the United States would sacrifice their national honor to their individual cupidity. I will read from the debate some of the remarks of Mr. Big-non. He says:

"Nevertheless, the hostilities committed by the English ships of war against the American nation, the imprisonment of their seamen under pretence of their being English deserters, the attacks upon several public vessels, particularly upon the frigate Chesapeake on the very waters of the United States, had excited in the minds of all indignation which appeared at one moment ready to break forth. These were certainly most legitimate causes of war. President Jefferson demanded of the English Government signal satisfaction; but the American people did not long sustain their Chief Magistrate. Resentment was soon calmed; the spirit of speculation rarely sacrifices an actual gain to the future prosperity, much less to the dignity, of a country. The voice of private interest prevails over that of national honor."

Again he says:

"The English ministry, on the other hand, whether from pride or disdain on its own part, or want of address on that of its agents, overwhelmed the Federal Government with insults and ill treatment."

These sir, are the arguments thundered from the tribune of the Chamber of Deputies, to prove that a French monarchy might, with impunity, continue to insult an American Republic, by withholding indemnification for the destruction of property, and by the violation of national faith solemnly pledged for its payment. It is deeply humiliating that such arguments should have been used, but it is intolerable that they should have prevailed.

Mr. Speaker, in politics, opinion is power. The world, to a nation, is as a neighborhood to an individual; it determines her character by the rule of her conduct; its opinions regulate her influence in the community of nations, as do the opinions of men prescribe their respective positions in society. The character of a country in the estimation of the world is the only security to its external commerce, and the only power that can enforce respect in all its foreign relations. If we mean to enjoy the freedom of the seas, one of two things must be done: we must either take a firm stand on this occasion, or send a convoy with each ship freighted with our property, and battle our way through the deep. Let this House now quail and succumb, and what prince or pirate will respect our flag or spare our commerce? What monarch will regard treaty obligations when we are a party? What Power will recognise us as entitled to the benefits of the law of nations, if we ourselves refuse to enforce the provisions of that law? Every Government, to be secure in its independence, must not only possess energy sufficient to protect itself from wrongs, but spirit to exert that energy when those wrongs are committed. Shall the Government of the United States, the centre and support of the great continental system of America, thus, by its example of spiritless submission to the outrages of royalty, bring the efficiency of the whole system into doubt? Shall we thus, by the proclamation of our weakness, invite the assaults of the common enemy of this system?

Sir, I have before said that the two systems of Europe and America are irreconcilably antagonist to each other. Each one is sustained as an entirety, by the co-operation of its respective parts. Admitted the shock and collision of their conflicting principles, crowns have been compelled to make a common cause for their common defence. And, sir, gentlemen are unnecessarily alarmed at the possible consequences of displeasing the King of the French, by the determined stand we propose to take. The very form of our Government is a perpetual offence to the whole corps of highnesses and majesties, in Europe and the world. It does not exist by their favor or at their mercy, but by the force of its own principles exerted upon a free and gallant people.

But, sir, am I mistaken in the view I have attempted to present, of the political relations which this hemisphere and Europe bear to each other? Or am I without the authority of an example in our own history, in speaking of the policy of the United States in reference to these relations? No, sir, I am not. It was when we were eleven years younger and feebler than we are, that Mr. Monroe, as the Executive of the nation, thought he had reason to believe that the allied sovereigns of Europe, who had denominated their league the "Holy Alliance," were preparing to extend their system of passive obedience to absolute power to our Mexican neighbor, and to the independent States of South America. His feelings and opinions were not suppressed. His patriotism did not consult the taste of these conspirators against the rights of mankind, to learn in what language he should address an American Congress on a subject affecting American liberty. In his message of the 2d of December, 1823, he did not hesitate to say, that with the movements of this hemisphere we were necessarily connected—that the political system of the allied Powers was essentially different from that of America—that we owed it to candor to declare that we should consider any attempts on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, as dangerous to our peace and safety—and that we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing the free Governments of South America, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European Power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition towards the United States. Such were the views then taken by the Executive, of the subsisting relations between the two adversary systems of Europe and America; and such the feeling he displayed in anticipation of an effort to change those relations. Had the contemplated scheme of the allied sovereigns been carried into effect, the consequences to the United States could have been but indirect and remote. And yet, in just apprehension of even such consequences, the President of the Republic gallantly threw the gauntlet of defiance into the very camp of confederated Kings. And, sir, what tremulous voice was then heard muttering, in doleful strains, the indiscretion of the Executive? None; no, sir, none. From one extremity of the Union to the other, the irrepressible feelings of a free people broke forth, responsive to the awless spirit of their patriotic chief. So universal was the popular judgment in support of the message, that the friends of an honorable gentleman now in this House, but then at the head of the Department of State, attributed to him all the glory of the deed, and urged that among his numerous claims to the gratitude of his country, in the canvass then pending for the succession to the presidential chair. But now, sir, it seems that times, or men, or principles, are changed; radically, sadly changed. The present Executive, moved alone by that vigorous judgment and lofty patriotism which even the subsiding wrath of his prostrate rivals now begins to concede, briefly recites, in his annual message, the wrongs and enormities committed by a foreign Power upon the people and Government of the United States, and suggests to Congress such measures as may comport with the dignity and independence of the nation; and for this he is rebuked, upon this floor, with imprudence. And why rebuked? Not because any man doubts a fact he has stated; not because it is not necessary for this House to adopt some measure; not because each one here does not feel himself, as a representative of the nation, sinking beneath the long-borne burden of French aggressions; not because all are not anxious to throw off this burden, and stand once more redressed of wrong, and erect in the fearless confidence of freedom; but because the statement of the facts, the adoption of a measure, or an effort to retrieve the national character, might give offence to this same foreign Power. Well, sir, be it so; let this House stand mute to-day, and I ask what Power is that which keeps it silent? what Power is to prescribe hereafter the terms of our external intercourse? what Power rules this body, and, through its fears, the nation? It is the terror of France. Shall this terror thus master our souls, and shall we surrender the independence of the nation, for want of firmness to maintain it? What, sir, have we to gain by silence? Nothing. What have we to lose? Every thing: the character of the country; the security to commerce; and all that distinguishes an independent nation from a mere dependent province. Quail but once to the arrogance of a foreign monarch, and we commence a retrograde movement which must endanger the liberties of the continent. Let us not be betrayed by the courteous professions of foreign friendship; they are but the disguised offspring of ministerial policy. A republic, whose principles are openly threatening the very being of monarchy, can never expect to find friendship in a monarch. Nor, sir, should we suffer ourselves to be beguiled by our apparent security at present, or by the existing calm and composure of the world. We are not to suppose that the great fundamental laws of nature, which ever have, and for ever must, impress themselves upon the mass of human affairs, and shape the destiny of nations, have spent their force or been suspended in their action. The political condition of the world must continue to be variously affected by the clash of contending principles. It is not possible, in the nature of things, for either class of these opposing principles to hold an uncontested ascendancy. The republican form of the American Governments will not be permitted to exist, to the jeopardy of the whole monarchical system, without encountering those assaults which the friends of that system will naturally direct against its natural enemy. We should, therefore, allow no advantage by hesitation, in the first instance; nor quicken the courage of an adversary by the exhibition of reluctance to encounter danger in the defence of national rights. "In peace, prepare for war," was the salutary maxim of a powerful mind, devoted to liberty and inclined to peace, after taking an enlarged view of our peculiar relations to the rest of the world.

Mr. Speaker, the success of our institutions is the great political problem of modern times. The effects of the proceedings of this body, as the popular representative of the nation, are more extensively felt than those of any other assemblage of men within the circuit of the earth. They are so, because each act of this House, must, in some measure, influence the destiny of the Republic; and because the friends of liberal principles, throughout the world, have a share in that destiny. Patriotism alone is the passion that can perpetuate this Government; and that passion should be cultivated among ourselves, and inculcated upon those with whom our presence here implies a degree of social influence. It was in reference, sir, to these considerations that I deeply regretted to hear the course of remark that has characterized this discussion. The rights, the interests, the feelings, and character of our own country seem to have been forgotten, in the ardent solicitude to woo the favor and guard from violence the punctilious sensibility of France. We are admonished, in a tone little short of reprehension, to be cautious of what we are about, as though France stood before us "void of offence," and we were in the act of offering to her and her sovereign the first indignity.

Sir, it may not be amiss to pass an eye rapidly along the outline of the circumstances in which our wrongs originated, and the conduct of the French Government throughout this whole transaction.

Towards the close of the last century, France yielded to the strong impulse of freedom. She passed from under the monotonous despotism of Bourbon imbecility into the throes and contortions of a popular revolution, whose immitigable rage not only overthrew her ancient constitution, but unsettled for a while the deep foundations of social order itself. This revolution brought forth a man, who impatiently hurried to take his stand, first in the ranks of her legions, and then upon the ruins of her throne—a man who, if he did not allay the storm that raged within, directed its fury from France to Europe. His all-embracing ambition, stimulated by the martial ardor and seconded by the energies of a mighty people, projected the stupendous scheme of reducing a continent, perhaps a world, to the iron empire of arms. As the execution of such a scheme necessarily involved an utter overthrow of all those European Governments, whose common consent alone prescribed or established the code of the law of nations, the first step placed its projector beyond the obligations of that code. Will the means accomplish the end? was the first and last question, the laconic logic, of Napoleon. His fervid genius threw its baleful blaze over land and sea; and if a treaty of peace with a belligerent neighbor served but to increase the certainty of her future destruction, the neutrality of a national flag was more apt to provoke the ruin than afford security to the commerce which it covered. The United States reposed afar off in peace, and stood aloof from the strife. The powerful allurements of profit redoubled the vigorous industry and quickened the enterprising spirit of our countrymen, who naturally sought to enrich themselves, by supplying the necessities of a warring world. As a neutral Power, our rights of navigation were commensurate with the illimitable seas. We enjoyed these rights, and all the rewards of a prosperous commerce; and it was in the midst of this scene of our commercial prosperity, and his career of universal conquest, that Napoleon dictated those decrees in obedience to which our ships and their cargoes, to the amount of millions, were burnt, or sunk, or confiscated, by the cruisers and Government of France. These outrages were committed without even the allegation of a fault upon our part; committed under the orders of a conqueror, promulgated from his camp. He, himself, was compelled to acknowledge the lawless barbarism of such a system of indiscriminate plunder and destruction. His pride or his policy sought to avert the curse of mankind, by condescending or affecting to bewail the necessity which had extorted from him an edict that broke the force of all human obligations, and impressed the stamp of authority upon all the atrocities of systematic piracy. In the imperial message which communicated these decrees to the Senate of France, the Emperor says: "It is with great pain that we have thus made the interests of individuals dependent upon the quarrels of Kings, and have been obliged to return, after so many years of civilization, to the principles which characterized the barbarism of the earliest ages."

Sir, it is upon this point that the attention of the House should first be fixed—the character of the authority and circumstances under which these spoliations of our commerce were committed.

France continued to prosecute her system of conquest, and we commenced, not war, but negotiations for indemnity. The Emperor, in the plenitude of his power, admitted the justice of our demands, but, in the haste of victory, postponed their satisfaction. Thus stood our relations when the snows and fires of the

North arrested the march of his legions, and the flames of the Kremlin lighted up the last day of his power. The miscellaneous troops of all Europe stacked their arms in the capital of France. The political system of the continent became suddenly inverted. The weight of power, which had before rested from the centre upon the extremes, was now reversed; and France, in her turn, sunk beneath the intolerable weight. She had no reason to expect justice, much less generosity, from her enemies. All were anxious to join in the plunder, and to exhaust the resources of a Power which all dreaded, even after she had been disarmed, robbed, stripped, and chained. The American Republic alone had the honor, the magnanimity, the mercy, to forget, forgive, and forbear. We relied upon the recuperative energies and the justice of the French nation, and suspended our demands. France was destined to other convulsions and changes. The trembling Bourbon once more staggered up the steps of her throne, and fell as he touched it. Napoleon reascended, and again disappeared. The revolution of Three Days sent Charles into exile, and placed the sceptre in the hand of the present monarch. After she had recovered from the fatigue and exhaustion of the rapid transitions she had undergone within the years of eighteen hundred and fourteen and fifteen, our Government renewed its demand of indemnification. Negotiations were recommenced, and finally terminated in the ratification of this treaty, on the second of February, eighteen hundred and thirty-two.

And now, sir, I must remark that the conduct of the French Government towards the United States, subsequently to this period, has been, in my judgment, more inexcusably offensive to the honor and dignity of our country than were all the depredations before committed upon our commerce. In palliation of her conduct now, she can urge none of the necessities of war or intestine commotion, no insufficiency of resources, none of the reasons of state, that are not equally available in excusing all violations of national faith. The only apology that she can offer is, our own apparent indifference, or her determination to make the treaty the source of a rupture.

But let us see what that conduct has been, and what are the facts of mitigation. The treaty has been ratified three years and one month, this day. By the seventh article, the United States was bound to discriminate, for ten years, in favor of the importation and consumption of the wines of France, by the reduction of the duties upon them below the rates fixed by our then existing tariff. By the same article, France engaged to establish, on the long staple cottons of the United States, the same duties as on the short. Congress promptly met the first of these stipulations by the necessary legislation, and France has since enjoyed the benefit. She, upon her part, executed the second by a royal order; and that, too, without a murmur from the Chamber of Deputies. The treaty has therefore already been executed in part, with the expressed or tacit approbation of all the constitutional organs of both Governments. And, sir, this circumstance, if properly considered, will be found not a little to aggravate the injustice of France, or to expose the fallacy of the reasoning by which the Chamber of Deputies seeks to justify its course in refusing to carry into effect the other provisions of the treaty. The payment of the indemnity of twenty-five millions of francs has not been made; and why has it not? Somebody, even in this House, has intimated that the treaty is not obligatory upon France until the Chamber shall have given its sanction by making the appropriation. That is a question with which we have nothing to do. It is a domestic question, of relations between the several departments of the same Government. It is a question, not of international law, but of constitutional power, to be decided upon the hazardous responsibility of one co-ordinate department of a Government arresting the action of another, within its appointed sphere. The French Chamber, as such, is responsible to the French nation alone. The French nation, only as such, is responsible to foreign Powers. Before it can become a question in an American Congress, whether a French treaty binds a French nation, so far as it regards other Governments, until it has been sanctioned by a French Chamber, it must be shown that there are relations and responsibilities existing between the separate departments of different Governments; an idea which effectually throws the two Governments into one, by reducing both from entireties to parts. A proper respect for reason itself forbids its exertion on such an absurdity.

I again ask, why has this indemnity not been paid? Is it because the Chamber has neglected to make the appropriation? No, sir, no. But it is because that body has solemnly refused the appropriation, by rejecting the bill. Yea, sir, after the treaty has been executed in part by both Governments; after France has enjoyed three years, out of the ten, of the benefits secured to her by the treaty; after this protracted parley between the Chamber and the throne, the Chamber, upon full debate and by a regular vote, sternly rejected the bill. What, then, are we waiting for France to do? Nothing. We are waiting for her to undo that which she has deliberately done. Shall we sit quietly here, and give her no reason to recede? Will she do so without a reason? It cannot be supposed. Our very silence is a reason why she should not, because we thus invite her not to do it. If we do not pass this resolution, declaring that we will insist upon an execution of the treaty, we must reject it; and to reject the resolution will amount to an open declaration that we do not insist upon the execution of the treaty. It will be a surrender of the treaty, and an absolution of France from its obligations. What, then, sir, will be the position of this House? It will stand upon the French side of this question, and afford Mr. Bignon another opportunity of reproaching the country with not having sustained the Executive in his efforts to preserve the rights and honor of the nation. With this additional reason for France to stand fast upon the ground she has taken, can we expect her to abandon it by paying an indemnity which she before refused, without the aid of this reason?

Sir, the name of Philip is ominous to republics, but it is not my purpose to pronounce a philippic on the Philippe of France. His ambiguous conduct towards the United States, in relation to this treaty, must, in spite of his professions, subject his sincerity to doubt. But even this conduct might have been extenuated, by the possible embarrassments of his situation, had he not, by the unceremonious recall of his minister, seemed determined to provoke a rupture, or sink our national character down to the last degree of degradation. He has affected to consider the President's message offensive to his dignity; and, unmindful of the patient endurance with which we have borne the injustice of France, or influenced perhaps by this very fact, he has abruptly terminated all diplomatic intercourse between the two nations. Is it true that this message, under the attendant circumstances, contained just cause of offence? Is it true that the dignity of the King has been insulted, and, through him, the honor of the French nation wounded? If so, if France has been insulted by the mere recital of her acts of injustice to us, or if the passage of this resolution may be considered an indignity to her, what, I ask, is our condition? Have we no reason to complain? Have we not also been deeply, grossly, repeatedly, insulted? No, sir, no, we have not. The term insult is too vague and feeble; our language has no word of odium sufficient to describe our condition, if the sensitive honor of the French Government has been wounded by the message, or will be by this resolution. What, sir, the neutrality of our flag contemptuously disregarded; our ships boarded, plundered, sunk, or confiscated, under a French edict of universal desecration; the laborious earnings of American freemen sacrificed to the ambition of a despot, and employed in the subjugation of mankind; twenty years of time spent in quibbling about facts and parleying about indemnity; a treaty, when half executed, then indignantly rejected; rejected upon the declared ground that we had not the spirit to enforce its execution; a French minister recalled, for no other reason than that the President presumed to detail these wrongs; and yet, sir, shall we stand writhing beneath this load of aggression, and palsied by the danger of violating the dignity of that Government which has imposed this load upon us? Yes, sir, we are invoked to do it. After this long and continuous succession of wrongs and insults, stretching through the quarter of a century, and whilst the breeze that bore the tidings of the last and greatest of these outrages is still ruffling the waters of the Potomac, we are admonished to stand still and hold our breath, lest we provoke the royal displeasure of his Majesty the King of the French. Shall we obey this humiliating counsel? Shall we thus leave our commerce, our character, and our very being as a nation, exposed to the unresisted assaults of a hostile world? Who stands ready to prepare such an epitaph for the tomb of the Republic?

Relations with France.

But what shall we do? To this question the answer is plain. Pass this resolution. It will stay the declining honor of the country until the next Congress shall have met, and may then form the basis of their action, in case the indemnity remains unpaid. In such an event, let that Congress take such measures as shall place France, so far as one Government can place another, in the position of an outlaw from the community of nations. Should she think proper to declare war against us, then, sir, we can war it with her. Yes, war it with her, if necessary, to the cost of the last dollar, and to the slaughter of the last man.

These, sir, are the only conditions, hard as they may seem, upon which a nation can enjoy its independence, or even its political existence.

Sir, the depredations committed by France upon our commerce are half as old as our Government. We, who are here, were elected by the people of the United States after the ratification of this treaty. Its provisions have been violated by the rejection of the indemnity bill, since the affairs of the country were committed to our care. Thus far we have done nothing. As an expiring Congress, we have but thirty-six hours in which to save the honor of the country. Does it become us, as the Representatives of a great and independent nation, to adjourn and leave things in their present condition? If we do so, what answer have we ready when the people shall ask, How stand our relations with France? Shall we say, it is true that, by our election, we were told to "take care that the Republic sustained no detriment;" it is true that the treaty has been violated, and the national honor insulted, since we were elected; but still we thought it better that a republic should submit to the insults of a kingdom, than that freemen should encounter the danger of a King's displeasure? If this be our answer, what response can we expect? There is but one. The outraged feeling of the country will break forth from the lips of every freeman. Each one will, and ought to, exclaim of us in the indignant language of Coriolanus:

"I would they were barbarians, (as they are, Though in Rome litter'd) not Romans, (as they are not, Though call'd i' the porch o' the Capitol,)"—

When Mr. ALLEN sat down,

Mr. LOVE was understood to be opposed to the adoption of any resolutions; for before the result of the deliberations of that House could be known at Paris, the French Chamber of Deputies will have finally acted upon the subject. He saw no utility in passing either the resolutions or the amendment, because he believed there was but one sentiment prevailing the whole country upon this subject, and that sentiment was that they would abide by the treaty. However we might differ as to our opinions, and the manner in which our views should be carried out, he was well assured that the opinion was general that we should abide by the Chief Magistrate, in asserting what was due to the honor and dignity of the nation. The best time to express our opinions would be when the appropriation should be asked for, and he should then express himself in a much stronger manner than now. All proceedings now were incipient. He should be willing to vote for any sum that the organ of the Executive and that House should deem necessary to appropriate for the purpose of enforcing justice. The resolutions before the House were idle, and a mere consumption of time. He was for taking a ground that should at once show the world what we intended to do.

Mr. L. took that occasion also to say that he dissented totally from the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that the course of our minister to Paris had merited entire approbation, by remaining in that metropolis after he had been notified that his passports were ready for him. Mr. L. thought, on the contrary, that his conduct on that occasion was rather of the character which he regretted to designate as dastardly and cowardly, and such as the country ought not to submit to. He thought our minister should have acted very differently, and he was borne out in this opinion by the President himself, who informs him "that he should have felt no surprise, and certainly would have expressed no displeasure, had you yielded to the impulse of national pride, and at once have quitted France, with the whole legation, on the receipt of the Count de Rigny's note of the 13th January."

Mr. L. said he considered the notification sent to Mr. Livingston as a direct insult, and that that minister would have better considered the honor and dignity of the country by instant departure out of the country. A strange reason was assigned for his not having done so, that he ought not to leave Paris on account of the expense of breaking up the delegation! What an extraordinary reason for the minister of this great country! He himself invites a war message, and, when he receives it, he is governed by the construction put upon it by the newspapers! So when a gentleman is ordered out of a house, he is to reply, "I will not take the hint!" Was there an American in the world who would thus have acted? Mr. L. further condemned the conduct of Mr. Livingston, and said he was not for war, if it could be avoided, particularly with our ancient friend and ally. He had a veneration for her people, although he could not say much about her present King; but he remembered with gratitude and veneration that King who aided us in effecting our independence. He would never fight France for money, it would be mercenary, and such a cry as he hoped would never be heard urging on our seamen to victory.

Mr. MOORE, of Virginia, expressed a wish to say a very few words to the House on the subject before it. It had been contended here, as well as in the French Chamber of Deputies, that the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831, was not to be regarded as complete, until sanctioned by the French Chambers, inasmuch as the Chambers have an undoubted right to make or withhold the appropriations necessary to carry the treaty into effect. He admitted the right of the Chambers to grant or refuse the appropriations in its fullest extent; but denied that the treaty was, for that reason, to be regarded as incomplete, until the appropriations were made. The Chambers might refuse the appropriations; but they must do so on the responsibility of the nation. Carry out the principle, and see to what conclusions it must lead. If the treaty was not complete until the appropriations were made, would its validity be considered as determined by the passage of an act by the Chambers, appropriating a sufficient sum to pay the amount due to us, at the time when the several instalments should become due? Gentlemen would say, yes. But suppose, before the second instalment becomes due, a new election takes place; the Chambers convene, and repeal the law making the appropriations, (as they have clearly a right to do,) what then becomes of the treaty? Is the treaty, which was valid and binding on all parties, to be thus annulled and destroyed by one party, after it is partly executed? Suppose a treaty to stipulate that a certain sum shall be paid in ten annual instalments, and the legislative branch of the Government, which is to pay, passes a law appropriating the money, and, at the end of nine years, the law is repealed; is the treaty, which has been in full force for nine years, to cease to be binding the moment the law is repealed? Or suppose, what may possibly be regarded as an extreme case, that the people should refuse to pay the taxes necessary to enable the Government to meet its engagements with another Power, and should dismiss all their agents in the legislative and executive branch of their Government, and continue the Government itself, as they have a right to do, will they be thereby released from obligations binding on them as a nation? Surely not; and yet such is the legitimate conclusion to which this principle leads us.

The true view of the subject was, that we must regard the acts of both the executive and legislative branches of the French Government as the acts of the nation, and for which they are responsible to us as a nation. When the treaty was ratified by the executive branch of the French Government, it was ratified by, and binding on, the French nation; and they could no longer fail or refuse to comply with its engagements, without a breach of national faith. If the King had declared, in six weeks after the treaty was ratified, that he did not mean to abide by it, it would not have become us to regard it as an act of perfidy on the part of the King, but as a breach of the faith of the nation, for which they would have been, as a nation, responsible to us. If the Chambers refuse to make the appropriations necessary to pay the indemnity due to our citizens, it is a refusal of France to comply with her engagements, and for which France is responsible. If, after the appropriations have been made, and the money collected, the Executive of France shall fail to pay over the money, that will be a breach of the nation's faith, for which France must be responsible. He would grant that, if the constitution of France required the assent of the Chambers to treaties, that then the treaty of 1831 could not be considered as binding on the nation until that assent had been obtained. But no such consent was necessary to the ratification of a treaty. It is the duty of every nation to have honest and faithful agents, who will strictly comply with the obligations due from such nation to others. France was bound by the treaty of 1831 to have a Chamber of Deputies which would make the necessary appropriations to pay us what it was stipulated by the treaty should be paid to us. And the failure of the Chambers is the failure of France to comply with her solemn engagements.

It might be asked if the Chambers would not be justifiable, under any circumstances, in refusing to make appropriations to comply with treaty stipulations. He would answer, certainly. If the executive branch of the Government exceeded its constitutional power in making the treaty, they would, of course, refuse to permit its execution. If the treaty was flagrantly unjust and iniquitous, or founded on gross mistake, it would not be morally right in us to exact, or proper in the Chambers to permit, the execution of such a treaty. But such a refusal, on the part of the legislative branch of any Government, to comply with the solemn obligations of a treaty, could only be justified in extreme cases, and must always involve the nation in a high responsibility.

It had been asked, if the President and Senate were to ratify a treaty by which our whole system of tariff laws would be, in effect, repealed; if they were to enter into a treaty with one foreign Power, by which the products and goods of that Power were to be admitted free of duty into our ports, and those of all other countries were to be excluded, or subjected to high duties, would Congress be bound to execute such a treaty, or suffer it to be executed? He would answer, certainly not. A still stronger case might be supposed. For, if the President and Senate were to ratify a treaty, and the House of Representatives were to approve of it; if it was discovered that the executive officers and the members of Congress had been induced to agree to its provisions by bribery, or if the provisions of the treaty were ruinous to the nation, the people ought not to permit it to be carried into execution. But if the treaty was such a one as there would be no moral impropriety in the Government with which it was contracted, in demanding the execution of, the people of this country would be bound to permit it to be carried into execution, or to make a proper reparation to the other party failing to do so.

The pretence set up by the members of the Chamber of Deputies, that twenty-five millions of francs was more than was due, even if true, was no just ground for not making the appropriations to satisfy our claim after it had been settled by the treaty. All the argument for refusing to make the appropriation, founded on the expectation that we might be induced to take less than was due, rather than go to war, was as disgraceful to France as it was insulting to us.

It had been said that we ought not to go to war for money, especially for the sum of five millions of dollars. For his part, he would as soon go to war for money as for any thing else, and for five millions as for five hundred millions, if the honor of the nation required it. If France acknowledges the debt, and then refuses to pay it, it must be because she despises our resentment, and means to treat us with contempt. We should go to war, then, if we had to go to war at all, not for money, but to resent an insult to the nation; an insult which he hoped the American people would not submit to, even if it cost two hundred millions to resent it.

He was not, however, desirous of going to war with France or any other nation. He hoped we should not be under the necessity of going to war. We ought not to rush precipitately into a war at any time. We ought to give to France full time to comply with the conditions of the treaty. He would even go so far as to say we ought not to go to war for the money due to us, until France had indicated a determination to refuse to pay the money, or a part of it. He would regard a refusal to pay the whole as bad as a refusal to pay any part of it. He would consider either as good cause for war. He would even consent to refer any question of national law, which might arise concerning the execution of the treaty, to the arbitration of a neutral Power, if it could be done without compromising the honor of the nation, rather than go to war.

Relations with France.

As to our ancient friendship with France, about which much had been said, he was in hopes it would not be interrupted. He wished to preserve it as long as it could be preserved on honorable terms, but no longer.

The great naval and military power of France, of which we had so glowing a description, had not alarmed him. If the character of the nation could only be preserved by going to war with France, her power would not deter him from engaging in it. As Americans, and as men who meant to maintain our rights and honor as a nation, we should only regard the great number of ships owned by France as presenting more chances for attacking her. If her ships will be fought with more skill than in times past, so much the better; there will be more glory gained in capturing them. If she sends her immense armies here, so much the better, it will save us the trouble of going to France to fight them. Even if France could equip a great fleet like that which was called the invincible armada, and hovered on the coast of England in the reign of Elizabeth, and if our naval officers, who were said to be unwilling to encounter the French ships, should refuse to take the command, he should not despair of finding another Blake on the land to destroy it. If they should drive us from the ocean, we can meet and fight them on the sea shore. If beaten there, we can fight them again at the head of tide water. If beaten there, we can make a final stand at the mountains, and there we shall beat them. For those mountains have not been, and cannot be, passed by a foreign enemy.

If, said Mr. M., we are too weak to encounter the power of France in defence of the nation's honor, let us give up the idea of governing ourselves; let us dissolve the Government, and go back and hang on a while longer to the apron-strings of old mother England, and ask her to protect us against the insults of France.

Mr. M. said that he repeated that he did not wish for a war, and hoped we should not be compelled to resort to violent measures to maintain our rights. If, however, the House thought proper to express any opinion as to our present relations with France, it ought to be that this Government will insist upon a full and prompt execution of the treaty of 1831. He would read a resolution expressive of his views upon that subject to the House.

Mr. M. then read the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is due to the national honor that this Government shall insist upon a full and prompt execution of the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831."

Mr. M. said he was opposed to declaring that no further negotiations should be carried on with France, and should vote against any such resolution. He was for demanding every cent which was due us, but would not consent to break off all intercourse between the two nations until driven to it by dire necessity. He hoped, moreover, that neither the Executive of this country nor of France would put a stop to that intercourse, or do any other act, the probable consequence of which would be to involve the two countries in war. They should recollect that they were bound not to forget that the power of declaring war was, in this country at least, in the immediate representatives of the people. And they should, therefore, be extremely cautious how they did any act which might amount to an assumption of power confided to other hands. Something had been said about sustaining the President in his course towards France. For himself, he would sustain him in that or in any thing else, so far as he thought he went right, but no further. What he had said he hoped he would not be considered as having said with a view to sustain the President's course, but simply for the purpose of indicating his own opinion as to the course which this Government ought to pursue under existing circumstances.

He meant to express neither approbation nor disapprobation of any thing the President had done. It was not necessary or proper that he should do so.

Mr. M. said he was opposed to passing any resolution declaratory of our intention to prepare for war, because it might be regarded as a threat, and as nothing else but a threat. He was willing, however, to act. He would much rather do something and say nothing, than say a great deal and do nothing. He would cheerfully vote for an appropriation of three or four millions to repair our fortifications and increase our navy. France might regard that as a significant hint of what we meant to do if she did not comply with her engagements, but could not object to it as a threat.

Mr. EVANS addressed the House at some length in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ALLEN,] and upon the general question. He was opposed to any hostile measures, and was in favor of the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ALEXANDER.] He considered this resolution as the most pacific and proper to be adopted on the occasion. He entered into a history of the treaty with France. He hoped that the House would avoid any declarations predicated upon a contingency which might never happen. He contended that the present difficulty was attributable principally to the menaces held by the President in his last annual message. This message, he conceived, presented the chief obstacle to an amicable adjustment of this question. He contended that there was no consideration which called for any action on the part of Congress until the decision of the French Chambers should be ascertained.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said he agreed with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LITTLE,] that the French Government had no right to take umbrage at the message of the President. She was the aggressor; and the President had done no more than his duty in presenting the subject to Congress in the light in which he viewed it. Mr. S. said he highly respected the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] who addressed the House this morning. He was about to retire from legislative duties, and would leave with the esteem of all parties, and not least for the mild, moral, and liberal views which he entertained upon the question under consideration; yet he regretted the feeling in which that gentleman had reflected on the course of the President. He was the head of our Government, discharging its functions in the spirit of duty, and as such commanded our respect and support.

France had entered into an engagement with us, and had failed to fulfil her sacred pledges. It became the duty of the President to present the facts to us, with his own views of them. He had done so with candor, dignity, and firmness. It had been urged that the President acted under the undue influence of our minister to France, (Mr. Livingston.) Such an influence had never existed. The Chief Magistrate was bound to lay all the facts before the country. It was required that the treaty on our part should be sanctioned by our Senate. This was done; and when France was advised of that fact, why did she not confirm it on her part? Mr. S. said emphatically that France must pay this stipulated indemnity; and when he said she must, he indicated the relative position in which the two nations stood. It was a contract which must be fulfilled, and few in this country would be found recreant in support of that position. He deemed it totally unnecessary to say "at all hazards," he cared not for the words; when he said she must, he said all. The present period was distinguished for its pacific policy. By this expression of our opinion, we summon France before the civilized world, and public opinion would stamp its veto on the whole course of her flagrant injustice towards us. She had taken, with avidity, all the advantages secured to her by the treaty, in the introduction of her wines and silks; but when you come to the indemnity, that is the pecuniary part of the treaty, and cannot be carried into effect by her Deputies! The French derive about half a million of dollars in her commerce, ($200,000 on her wines, and about $300,000 on her silks,) on the strength of the treaty, and then refuse to fulfil their part of the contract. How could France look us or the world in the face, with gross injustice branded upon her fame? We had been told that we had nothing to do with national honor! It was the first time he had ever heard that strange doctrine promulgated. He would tell the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GILMAN,] that there was in this country a strong and unconquerable spirit of national pride; not, indeed, the spirit that created strife between crowned heads, but that elevated policy which would induce us properly and promptly to meet every emergency in which the honor of a country or of an individual could be involved. The people of this country would insist on the fulfilment of the treaty to the uttermost letter. It was right that they should do so; for if it were infringed with impunity, every puny Government in Christendom would turn up its nose with scorn and contempt at our system of passive obedience and non-resistance. He did not believe there was a man in this country who would go to war for the paltry sum of five millions in contest. No; it was the honor and dignity of our national character that prompted the patriotic feeling which pervaded the community. Much had been said of the blood that was to be shed in this contest. He did not believe that any blood was to be shed; but, if it was, it would be better to meet the crisis like men than to crouch like slaves.

Mr. CLAYTON said it appeared to him, and he made the remark with great diffidence, that the House had not as yet taken a correct view of this important question. All bodies do, and ought to, act (said Mr. C.) under evidence, and then they make the facts responsible, instead of themselves, for the results of their action. The present case furnishes the most ample means to place us under the guidance of this wholesome rule. What is the state of the case? The President, at the commencement of the session, puts us in possession of all the facts relating to the rejection of the treaty, on the part of the Chambers, entered into by the French King with the United States, and recommends, in the event of another refusal, a resort, for redress, to reprisals on the commerce of France. This subject was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and they have thought proper not to report until within three days of the close of the session, in which the House has indulged them, believing, no doubt, that nothing should be done at this time. But on the day before the present report was made, we received a message from the President, communicating the correspondence of our minister at France, containing all the information subsequent to the reception of the message in France, which was sent to the same committee to which his annual message was referred. Now, the resolutions on your table are not pretended to be the views of the committee, founded upon the recommendation in that message, but are wholly the result of the information in Mr. Livingston's correspondence. If that be the case, we should so mould our proceedings as not to travel out of the record. We have but one of two courses, either to follow the definite facts submitted to our consideration in this certain official correspondence, or launch out into the ocean of conjecture, directed by no other compass than newspaper reports, letter-writers' conjectures, and coffee-house politics. I cannot but hope that this last is out of the question, and whatever we may do shall go forth to the world as the grave counsels of an American Congress, founded upon the most unquestionable testimony. Before, however, I proceed to analyze it, permit me to offer some few reflections, by way of allaying the war fever which has been evidently gotten up during the debate. A stranger who should have come suddenly upon us while the discussion was going on, could have drawn no other conclusion than that we were debating a declaration of war, and, from the denunciations of members, and the threats contained in the report, that nothing was more certain than a war with France. Sir, there is nothing in the facts before us that would justify such expectation, or any thing in the remotest degree leading to it; and all our blustering, bravadoing, threatening, and fighting indications are entirely gratuitous, and, indeed, I incline to think that, the stronger our prospects are for peace, the higher the war fever rages: and this is in perfect keeping with all experience on this subject. I lay down this position, and appeal to the knowledge of every member on this floor to support or falsify it, for it belongs to an observation which I know every man has made on this subject, that whenever you see a man blustering, vaunting, and swearing what he will do with his adversary if his friends will only let him get to him, depend upon it there is no fight in that man; one person could hold him if he thought there was danger of coming together, and he would very willingly lend his antagonist two or three of his own friends to keep them apart. This bluffing kind of courage, Mr. Speaker, holds good, too, as to communities. All history informs us that the war party in peace, is, generally, the peace party in war: and it is very easily accounted for—legislative bodies do not fight the battles they produce. It is a very easy thing for a man to make a great show of bravery upon other people's courage. We are not to meet the danger. This is put upon other persons. Not one in one hundred of us will go out to meet the foe—and even then it will be found very convenient to send a substitute. Sir, war is a very serious thing. Tom Paine, whose name should never be mentioned but with veneration for his political services, in a letter to General Howe, says "that he who is the author of a war lets loose the whole contagion of hell, and opens a vein that bleeds a nation to death." He adds, "death is not the monarch of the dead, but of the dying; at every conquest he loses a subject, and, like the foolish King you serve, will, in the end, war himself out of all dominion." Now, sir, if we go to war with France, we stake, on the contest, all the high character we gained in the last war, and the "glory" of some who contributed to its exalted fame. We should take care that we do not "foolishly war ourselves out of this reputation."

Permit me now, sir, to show you our present relations with France, and that they do not authorize any action whatever on this subject. On the contrary, we are called on, by every principle of interest, every feeling of magnanimity, and every obligation of self-respect, to abstain from saying or doing any thing. The first thing in Mr. Livingston's correspondence worthy of notice, is the following from Count de Rigny to him: "How great soever may be the difficulties caused by the provocation which President Jackson has given, and by the irritation which it has produced in the public mind, it will ask the Chambers for an appropriation of twenty-five millions, in order to meet the engagements of the treaty." And since this, we are satisfactorily informed, the law has been proposed and referred to a large committee. What more do you want? Will you act before you know the result of this measure? And if you will, how will you act? By irritations? Can you believe this is prudent? Can you be serious in wishing our difficulty with France honorably settled? Does it comport with honor to extort by fear what is due to faith? And is it believed that the French nation can be alarmed into what the honor of such a people would refuse? Here is one great mistake—one, too, that is the less excusable, because, if true, it supposes the use of an instrument that does us no credit; for I insist upon it threats are used only by those who do not intend to use any thing else. What is the next thing to be observed in the correspondence? Mr. Livingston says to Mr. Forsyth, "Should Congress propose commercial restrictions, or determine to wait to the end of the session before they act, this will be considered as a vote against reprisals, and then the law will be proposed, and I think carried." What more do you want than this? Here is your own minister's testimony. He is on the spot—bound to give us, and no doubt does, the best views of the subject in his power. He adds—which I conceive to be very useful information, since we seem to place so much reliance in the virtue of threats—that the "excitement is at present very great; that their pride is deeply wounded at what they call an attempt to coerce them by threats to the payment of a sum, which they persist in declaring not to be due." If, as he believes, they have so far elevated themselves above this mortification as to be able to do us justice, why should we repeat what may and ought to create a relapse? Mr. Livingston either means something or nothing by this information. If nothing, we should do nothing—letting the matter rest where it was before, upon the annual message. If something, then we should profit by the clear indication it contains. I am aware that the views of Mr. L. are liable to the charge of inconsistency. For instance, after stating that, if Congress will remain quiet, the law will pass—after he himself declared to the French minister that the course of his Government, in closing the door of negotiation, "necessarily cuts off all the usual means of restoring harmony to two nations who have the same interest, commercial and political, to unite them, and none but factitious subjects of collision," he turns round and says to the President, if there should be hostilities, certain presses in America "may flatter themselves with having the credit of a great share in producing them." How? For saying, in substance, precisely what Mr. Livingston has said, that Congress should do nothing upon the President's recommendation, and that there is no cause of war with France. Nevertheless, we have no other testimony upon which to act. You must take all or none. Withdraw this correspondence, and the report of the committee loses its foundation.

There is a further reason why we should take care how we meddle with threats. I think the correspondence furnishes a humiliating lesson of what little good those already made have done; and, besides, how difficult it was for our minister to make a suitable apology for what the President had said. Notwithstanding he had recommended a little bravado, which he denominated "firmness," yet he found, to his great surprise, it did not take, and had to assure the French minister it was not intended for France. He likened it to a certain "family matter" in France—there they kept their secrets, but here we had to publish our debates. That it was cause of "great surprise that a communication, made by one branch of our Government to another," should give any umbrage to France, though it threatened reprisals. And, further, the minister might be sure it was not designed to insult France, as he had not been instructed to communicate it to the French Government, and reminded him he had only found it out by chance, from a gazette which he had delivered to the minister, not officially, but at his own request. Now, whoever looks at these apologies, had better take care how they employ threats; they may not always have such good reasons at hand, and the French may not again be in so good a disposition to be convinced.

But, sir, our minister went further; he tried to persuade the French Government that, if certain things had been known in America which had taken place in France, before the President sent his message to Congress, it would have been different; and that now those facts being known to Congress, they would "change the measures recommended." Let us hear his own words: "It is, perhaps, necessary to add that an allusion was made by me to the change of ministry in November, and the reinstatement of present ministers, which I told him I had considered as a most favorable occurrence, and that I had so expressed myself in my communications to you; but that this circumstance was unknown at Washington when the message was delivered; and I added that the hopes of success held out in the communication to which I referred, and the assurances it contained that the ministers would zealously urge the adoption of the law, might probably have imparted the same hopes to the President, and have induced some change in the measures recommended. But that the formation of the Dupin ministry, if known, must have had a very bad effect on the President, as many of that ministry were known to be hostile to the treaty."

Is it our wish to make our minister not only to appear insincere, but ridiculous? That must be the effect when this published correspondence returns back to Europe with the fact that it is wholly disregarded by us, and that not a suggestion of his furnished any objection to our action on this subject.

The President has himself said that, if he had known as much as he did a few weeks after his message was delivered, he would have changed his measures; and shall we not, with the same information, and really nothing to alter the state of the case, be induced to forbear the adoption of measures calculated only to irritate and jeopard the final pacific settlement of the difficulty? Here we perceive the French Government has been told that the threats already made would not have occurred if certain facts had been known; and now, with those facts known to us, and the further fact that these representations have so soothed the ministry that the law of indemnity has been proposed, we are not only about to belie the suggestions of Mr. Livingston, but to add new threats to those already despised and submissively recanted.

But, sir, we are ourselves accused of a want of good faith, and that fact ought to have great weight in regulating our passion towards France; and though it may be lost upon our dignity, it should very much increase our moderation. The French minister says to ours, "In the explanation which I am now about to make, I cannot enter upon the consideration of any facts other than those occurring subsequently to the vote by which the last Chamber of Deputies refused the appropriation necessary for the payment stipulated in the treaty. However this vote may have been regarded by the Government of the United States, it is evident that, by accepting the promise of the King's Government to bring on a second deliberation before the new Legislature, it had, in fact, postponed all discussion, and all recrimination on the subject of this first refusal, until another decision should have either repealed or confirmed it. This postponement, therefore, sets aside for the time all difficulties arising either justly or unjustly from the rejection of the treaty, or from the delay by which it had been preceded."

To this charge of implied infidelity, the President answers that the case was to have been referred to the session of the Chambers next after the promise made. The King replies, it was in his speech to the session, on the 31st July succeeding, but that this session was nothing but a formal one, convoked in obedience to a "legal prescription," requiring them to be called together for installation, within a stated period after a dissolution of the old Chamber of Deputies; that this ceremony takes up nearly a fortnight; and that at such meetings nothing is done; and that this fact is known to every body, and consequently to our minister. That it was not sooner presented to the succeeding Chamber, the minister says to Mr. Livingston, "You yourself requested us not to endanger the success of this important affair by mingling its discussion with debates of a different nature, as their mere coincidence (meaning, no doubt, the Russian claims) might have the effect of bringing other influences into play than those by which it should naturally be governed." In addition to this, he further says, "All this appears from the explanations now given, and, I must add, that the greater part of them have been presented by M. Serurier to the Government of the United States, which, by its silence, seemed to acknowledge their full value."

Now, sir, this is a fair history of our relations with France, subsequent to the receipt of the President's message by that Government, as narrated by our own minister; and upon these facts we are called on to pass a set of gasconading resolutions; and for what? What earthly purpose can it answer, but to inflame our adversary, and perhaps prevent an adjustment of our differences? If we do not think the present condition of the dispute warrants a resort to one of the two remedies indicated by the President, to wit, commercial restrictions or reprisals, wherefore the necessity of doing any thing at all? Sir, there is none; and I should move to lay the whole matter on the table, but that I do not wish to stop the debate, especially after having been indulged in that privilege myself.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SUTHERLAND] quoted that part of the correspondence stating that the message "has certainly raised us in the estimation of other Powers," to show that France will not take the responsibility of going to war with us. If this be a correct inference, we ought to be satisfied with it: and while he uses it for this purpose, I had marked the same clause for another. If our standing is advanced by what has been done, will it not be prudent to stop for the present? All I understand that is expected from the resolutions on your table, is to keep us rectified, in point of honor and spirit, with the civilized world. This being done so far in the quarrel, ought we not to wait till France does something making it necessary to take another step? Mr. Speaker, true courage never vaunts; it lays out no more work to do than can be well done, when the exigency arrives which demands its exercise. It will have enough to do to come out triumphantly from any of its trials, without having to turn aside to redeem all its promissory blusterings. True courage pledges nothing, threatens nothing, asks nothing, but what is just, and grants every thing that is generous. It meets the crisis to which it is called coolly and deliberately, and considers the victory half achieved in the self-collection with which the onslaught is commenced.

Mr. GILMER would ask what was intended by the introduction of the resolutions? What was promised or expected to result from them? These questions came home to every one, to the interest of the whole country. Besides, what power had that House to do so? That House had only legislative authority, and to pass these resolutions, he contended, would be transcending their constitutional limits of power. Mr. G. referred to the consequences and effects of war upon the interests of the country and the stability of its institutions. He contended that nothing had as yet been done by the French Government to justify such a course on our part. So far as the treaty-making power of that country was concerned, every thing had been done that could be done. Of whom did we complain? Of the popular branch of the French Government. We should bear in mind that that branch was new to France; and every one must perceive, who had read the debates of the French Chamber, that there was a prevailing ignorance on the subject of these claims. They were apprehensive that the monarchy had gone too far, and there was a jealousy which existed between them. But should we, the most popular Government on earth, be the first and foremost to prevent the exercise of the popular branch of a nation just emerging from the shackles of despotism? He was convinced that if we went to war on account of this treaty, as the subject stood at present, public opinion would be against it. He had no doubt whatever that the force of public opinion alone in Europe would compel France to pay this indemnity. War, it should be borne in mind, would put an end to it. Go to war, and the indemnity would be at an end. He said that neither national honor nor national character was concerned in this dispute.

Mr. LITTLE followed, with great energy, and at considerable length, in support of the resolutions reported by Mr. CAMBRELENG, and in reply to Mr. GILMER and Mr. ARCHER.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he rose not to prolong the debate, but to make an attempt to put an end to the only war which he believed would ever grow out of this question. We had on most great questions, particularly on one which divided the House and the country, adjusted it by compromise. He now rose to propose a compromise which he hoped would unite both sides of the House. It was due to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] to explain to him that he could not accept his first resolution as he had promised to do, because, on examining its provisions, he found it referred rather to the rights of the claimants than of the nation. He thought the House would not adopt a resolution of that character. He, however, proposed to offer the resolution he had presented yesterday, without the words "at all hazards," for he was compelled to concur in the opinion expressed by the gentleman himself, [Mr. EVERETT], that they were unparliamentary.

[Mr. E. EVERETT explained. He considered them not unparliamentary in a report, but in the form of a resolution.]

Mr. C. continued. That gentleman must pardon me, sir, if I cannot perceive the propriety of the distinction between the report and a resolution which he makes. Both are alike reported for adoption or rejection by the House. The language was, he thought, not only unparliamentary, but the gentleman must pardon him for saying that it was undignified and even gasconading. He therefore most willingly relinquished them, as incompatible with the dignity of the House. He should offer the resolution without these words as soon as the present motion was decided, and he hoped in that form it would meet the approbation of the House.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he had seldom trespassed upon the indulgence of the House. He had been generally content, as became him, to receive instruction from others, whose talents and long experience in that hall qualified them to impart it. I do not rise now, said Mr. R., with any design of detaining the House by attempting to present a full view of the subject which excites, not here only, but throughout the country, so profound an interest. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, though repeatedly urged to make a report, has been pleased to defer it, until an apparent disposition prevails, perhaps an urgent necessity exists, to stifle debate, or, at least, to suppress a free and full discussion. Yet the occasion is one, when to remain silent may be ascribed to a disposition to shrink from due responsibility. I am desirous, therefore, said Mr. R., of briefly explaining the views by which my own course will be regulated. This, however, is not my sole motive for addressing the House.

Relations with France.

[H. OF R.]

I had indulged a hope—the recent debate has, I confess, well nigh extinguished it—that some means might be yet suggested of attaining that unanimity so earnestly recommended by all, and so becoming on occasions when the rights and interests of our country are involved in controversies with foreign Powers. On the most important points that unanimity indeed already exists. All concur in the justice of our demands upon France. All agree that, in the present state of our relations, it is inexpedient to authorize reprisals, or adopt any measures of commercial restriction. It would seem there could be little left for serious disagreement; still less for angry debate. A number of resolutions, it is true, have been proposed: a variety of views presented. But in reviewing these, which I propose briefly to do, we shall find there is no such decided contrariety of opinion as to preclude harmonious action. Such a result can only be marred by invoking the spirit of party. On the present occasion, I trust, we shall soar above its malignant influence, and look only to the common good of our common country.

There should be little difficulty in disposing of the resolutions originally reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. In regard to the first, the chairman [Mr. CAMBRIDGE] has indicated a willingness to accept of any modification upon which the House may unite; and has even sought for a substitute in the report of the minority. To the second there will not probably be a dissenting voice; and the last, it is understood, is abandoned. Then, as to those proposed by the venerable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] They declare, in substance: That our rights under the treaty ought not to be abandoned.

That the President be requested, during the recess of Congress, to resume negotiations with France, if he deem it compatible with the honor and interest of the United States; and

That no legislative measures of a hostile character are at this time expedient.

In the first there is nothing, perhaps, seriously objectionable. The mover himself will scarcely insist upon the second; and if he should, will probably stand alone; for it is obviously impolitic, not to say inconsistent, while asserting that our claims under the treaty will not be abandoned, to suggest, in the same breath, or rather to invite, a continued or renewed negotiation. As to the third resolution, it varies in no essential particular from the second reported by the committee; or that unanimously adopted by the other House; or that now under consideration, submitted by my colleague, [Mr. ARCADE.] Why it is the latter has been so vehemently opposed, said Mr. R., I am a loss to conjecture. It cannot be for the course it indicates as proper; for in the propriety of that all seemingly concur. The chief objection seems to be, the reason it assigns for that course. Yet in assigning as a reason for our forbearance, an expectation that France will do us justice, my colleague stands fully justified by the language of the committee itself in its report to which I shall presently advert.

Nothing more clearly proves how very slight are the shades of difference existing among us, than the views and resolutions of another of my colleagues [Mr. PATTON] who last addressed the House. He does not, it seems, exactly approve the first resolution reported by the committee; nor the substitute which the chairman appears now willing to extract from the report of the minority; nor the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS;] nor that offered by my colleague, [Mr. ARCADE,] who followed that gentleman. Yet he does not widely dissent from either. Indeed, he has himself intimated an intention of offering a resolution, so slightly varying from that of my other colleague, that the latter is entirely content to accept it, in lieu of his own. Is it not manifest, then, notwithstanding the warmth of the debate, that there is no irreconcilable conflict of opinion upon any essential point: that there is a common ground upon which, following the example already set us, we may all unite, and present an undivided front?

The chairman of the committee, with a view, he tells us, to harmony, has extracted from the report of the minority a single sentence, which he proposes to mould into the form of a resolution, and to adopt as a substitute for the first resolution reported by the committee. The gentleman from Massachusetts, too, gives it the preference over his own. Torn from its context, and deprived of the explanations which accompanied it, it does not seem happily selected to effect the object professed.

The chairman himself has since emphatically condemned the coarse expression it contains, pledging us to insist, at all hazards, upon the execution of the treaty. The epithet he applied to it has escaped my memory. I remember well it was exceedingly appropriate. [A member said, "gasconading."] Yes, gasconading; that was the term. The gentleman appears now conscious of the impropriety of the gasconading threat contained in the sentence he had selected; and, though at first that seemed its chief recommendation, has frankly announced a willingness to withdraw it. The example he has set, in resorting to the report of the minority, which I am bound to presume is strictly parliamentary and proper, suggested to me the idea of looking to that of the majority. Fas est ab hoste doceri. Not that I regard the gentleman from New York, in any sense, as an enemy, or harbor any unfriendly feeling towards him. Far from it. That gentleman, on a former occasion, greeted one of my colleagues [General GORDON] and myself as allies in a common cause; as ever ready to maintain the doctrines of the democratic republican party. Sir, I have ever claimed to be a republican—a democratic republican. Certainly not of the new school; not of the same school with those who would assign to the Executive limits far more extensive than those which the federalists—yes, even what were called the anglo-monarchical federalists—had ever conceded, or were willing to concede. Not to that school whose disciples bend to the will, and would concentrate all power in the hands of one man. But, sir, the gentleman from New York, though he was pleased to commend our principles, did not favor us with his vote. His speech was for us, but his vote against us. I propose to meet him now on his own ground; and trust, on this occasion, we shall not only accord in our opinions, but also in our votes. In the report of the committee I find sentiments in which I should hope all may concur, and which I presume neither the chairman nor any other member of the committee will be disposed to disavow. I have embodied them in the form of a resolution, which it is my intention to offer, in case the one proposed by my colleague [Mr. ARCADE] should not prevail. I ask leave now to read it to the House, with a preliminary one of my own, and, in addition, the second resolution of the committee, with a slight verbal amendment.

[Mr. R. here read the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this House regards the treaty of July, 1831, between the United States and France, as adjusting, in a spirit of mutual concession, the differences so long unhappily subsisting between the two countries.

Resolved, That there is satisfactory evidence that the French Government earnestly desires that the appropriation for indemnity should be made, in pursuance of the stipulations of the treaty, and reason to hope that the Chamber of Deputies will adopt that measure, and faithfully discharge the obligations of France to the United States.

H. OF R.]

Relations with France.

[MARCH 2, 1835.]

Resolved, therefore, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the President's message as relates to commercial restrictions, or reprisals, upon the commerce of France.]

Should any objections (said Mr. R.) be discerned to the first resolution, I am ready to withdraw it; my object being, if possible, to attain unanimity. The second is, of itself, sufficient for every purpose. It expresses the sentiments of the committee in its own language. These sentiments are alike honorable to France and to the committee, and I do not understand there is any desire to retract or disown them.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG said, Certainly not. But the gentleman from Virginia had taken only a part of the paragraph.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. It is true; that part only has been taken which speaks of the just and friendly dispositions of the French Government. The remainder of the sentence merely expresses a fear that the conduct of France has placed us in an embarrassing position, and may produce a suspension of our diplomatic intercourse.* If the gentleman really desires that that fear shall be made the subject of a resolution, and the House concur, though I can by no means discern its propriety, still its insertion will in no manner impair the force of the sentiments embodied in the resolution just read. With such opinions, it is difficult to understand why any disposition should prevail to make use of terms, or adopt resolutions, of an inflammatory or offensive character. I know, sir, this disposition is disclaimed. Almost all who have addressed the House, even those who have violently denounced the conduct of France, have thought it prudent to deny that any hostile movements are designed or can result from their course. My colleague, who sits before me, has ridiculed all apprehensions of collision with France as mere affectation. He charges those who have expressed them with attempting a dramatic display. Can my colleague seriously think there is no ground for such apprehensions? Does he regard the tone of the President's message, the recommendation of reprisals upon the commerce of France, as entirely pacific? Has he forgotten that this Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which he is himself a member, has presented resolutions declaring that we should insist upon the treaty; that it would be incompatible with our honor to negotiate further; that preparations ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France? Has he forgotten the substitute proposed by the chairman of that committee, and so readily clutched by the gentleman from Massachusetts, declaring that we would insist upon the execution of the treaty at all hazards? Does he remember the abusive epithets which members on this floor have showered upon the French people and the French King, or, as they call him in derision, the King of the French? Thank God he is not our King, and we may therefore abuse him with impunity. Sir, we are told that not to show a becoming spirit is dastardly. No one can misunderstand the import of this expression. It is meant to justify language and resolutions of a hostile tendency. It implies censure on the course by another branch of the Legislature, which has abstained unanimously from both. Sir, it condemns the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which from an early period of the session declared that, as we ought to do nothing, it was best to say nothing; and which, though repeatedly called upon, had declined making any report until on the very eve of our final dissolution. The course originally recommended by the committee, it would seem now, was dastardly. The resolution, offered by my colleague, [Mr. ANCHUTZ,] conforming to it, and that adopted in the other House, are tame and spiritless. The friends of such a course are taunted, from the same quarter, with the appellation of the peace party. The warm blood of the South, it seems, is chilled. It is from the North, and the East, and the West, the fiery spirits now spring up, ready to rush at once into war to defend the honor of the country.

Gentlemen disclaim this warlike propensity. I am glad to hear it. But what other interpretation can be placed upon such proceedings and such language? It is said there is no menace, no insult. Reprisals are no cause of war; to talk of insisting, at all hazards, upon the execution of the treaty, implies no hostile intentions. We may insist by commercial restrictions; we may resort to a non-intercourse. Sir, if the Chambers should reject the treaty, and, after adopting such resolutions, we should take the measures alluded to, we should bring ridicule upon ourselves. It will be said, after attempting to bully France by blustering, gasconading language, we had meanly shrunk, and contented ourselves with saying: that all we meant if she would not render us justice was, that we would have nothing more to do with her. No, sir. We mean a menace and insult, or we do not. If we do, let us come out openly, boldly; let us proclaim in the face of the world that France is faithless; that it is vain to negotiate; that we should appeal to force only to vindicate our rights. Let us not convey an insidious insult in language that may hereafter be explained away, and leave us in an attitude that will justly bring contempt upon us.

What good reason, Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully ask, can be assigned for resolutions of the character, reported by the committee, or extracted from the report of the minority? What effect were they designed or expected to produce? No one will assert that they were intended as a guide to the next Congress. All must acknowledge that it would be presumptuous in us to instruct our successors what course they should pursue in any future contingency. Having all the facts before them, they will be far more competent than we can possibly be to determine what the interests and honor of the country demand. Are such resolutions, then, necessary to sustain the one or the other? Yes, we are told, it is a question of boldness. Our courage, it seems, is questioned. By whom? Not surely by France, whose gallant soldiers have fought and conquered by the side of our own. Sir, if our courage be doubted, let those who deem it the proper mode, offer a resolution declaring that the people of the United States are as brave a people as God ever made; and, deeply impressed with its truth, I would myself vote for it, did I not feel it would make us justly ridiculous in the eyes of the world.

Let us ascribe to individuals the conduct recommended to us as a nation. A man, considering himself aggrieved, demands reparation. He informs his antagonist that he insists upon having it, at all hazards; that it is incompatible with his honor to negotiate further, and that his friend is making the necessary preparations to meet any emergency which may grow out of their dispute. What man of honor or courage would demand redress in so

* Extract from the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

"While there is satisfactory evidence that the French Government earnestly desires that the appropriation for indemnity should be made in pursuance of the stipulations of the treaty, and while there is reason to hope that the Chamber of Deputies will adopt that measure, and faithfully discharge the obligations of France to the United States, it is, on the other hand, to be feared that the conduct of that Government has placed us in a position at least embarrassing, even if it should not produce an entire suspension of diplomatic intercourse between the two nations."

Relations with France.

gasconading a style? What man of honor or courage would deign to give it until the offensive language should be withdrawn? If there be any gentleman here who would do the one or the other, these resolutions are entitled to his approbation and support. Sir, there has been too much of this gasconade. It is unbecoming the dignity of this House. Whatever injury France may have done us, the language of her Government, even in the most irritating circumstances, has been ever decorous and respectful. The French are a brave and gallant, as well as a courteous nation. But I trust we will not leave it to be said that they surpass us either in courtesy or gallantry. It reflects no credit on us to attempt to bully or disparage France. Our courage has never been called in question. It is not necessary we should enter it of record, or trumpet it forth to the world. We shall be apt to bring suspicion on it, by adopting what the gentleman from New York properly calls a gasconading tone. To talk so much of our spirit, to boast of our courage, will be regarded as the strongest proof that that virtue is on the decline among us.

No, sir, the resolutions of the committee are of no consequence, unless for the effect they may produce on France. The committee must be supposed to intend the probable consequences of their own measures. Can any one doubt what those consequences would be? Suppose the resolutions adopted; if they reach France before the final action of the Chambers, will they not instantly close the door to an amicable adjustment? Is that our object? Do we not know that the French people have had their sensibilities deeply wounded by the President's message? Mr. Livingston tells us that such is the fact. None but himself could ever have failed to anticipate it. Sir, it is evident our minister was much confounded at the excitement it occasioned. A firebrand had been thrown amidst combustible materials, and he was astonished at the explosion. Yea, he was amazed at the effects produced by the tone he himself had recommended. He complains that he is left without instructions in what manner to act. He endeavors in his distress to throw the blame on the opposition papers. No wonder he should be desirous of throwing it off his own shoulders. But who can credit the tale? Who can believe that the French people or Government would look to the Intelligencer or Courier to ascertain whether they had been insulted by the President's message? How happens it they should look to the opposition papers—the organs of the minority—and disregard the declarations of the President that no menace was intended? the commentaries of the Government paper? the representations of our accredited minister? Did not Mr. Livingston tell them the message was not addressed to them: that it was in the nature merely of a family conference?

No, sir, this is placing the opposition papers, indeed, upon too high ground. But is it not true? None, whatever may be their affected contempt for the French, can believe it. Yet, deeply wounded as they were, they have yet manifested a disposition, expressed a desire, to do us justice. They regard the message as the act of one branch only of the American Government. Would it not be unwise in us to take away the only ground upon which they stand excused in their own eyes for such a determination? Shall we servilely echo the language of the palace, and leave them no longer room to doubt that an insult was designed, and that the representatives of the people are disposed to reiterate it?

But suppose, before our proceedings reach France, the appropriation shall have been made. Then will we not have cause to regret having unnecessarily inflicted a wound on those who, on full deliberation, had recognized the justice of our claims, and evinced the strongest desire to preserve peaceful relations? Suppose the appropriation rejected: still no possible benefit can result from the resolutions in question. On the contrary, may there not be reason to apprehend that France, anticipating what all disclaim, and none, I hope, desire, hostile movements on our part, may lay an embargo on our vessels, or send out armed privateers to sweep them from the ocean?

Sir, I trust the disposition manifested by the chairman of the committee, to abandon the first and last resolutions originally reported, will prevail. It is with that hope I have ventured to propose the resolutions I have had the honor to read. Should that of my colleague, [Mr. ARCHER,] which has my cordial approbation, not prevail, I trust they will receive the concurrence of the House. It is wholly unimportant where the blame of the existing difficulties rests, or whether the glory of an amicable arrangement, should one be effected, belong to the administration or the opposition—the President or the Senate. It is said none of it is to be ours. It becomes us to be solicitous only to pursue measures, as far as may comport with our honor, to ensure the continuance of that friendly intercourse which ought to be the wish, as it is manifestly the interest, of both countries. Gentlemen may flatter themselves, in taking a different course, with the hope of catching the popular breeze. I know not how that may be. But I feel well assured, should we wantonly plunge into a war that may be honorably avoided, no long period will elapse before we shall receive—what we shall well merit—not the applauses, but the execrations of our country.

When Mr. ROBERTSON had concluded,

Mr. BINNEY, after asking that the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and those offered as amendments by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCHER,] might be read by the Clerk; and also that he might again have the benefit of hearing those suggested by the gentleman from Virginia last up, [Mr. ROBERTSON,] proceeded to say that he desired to have all these propositions before him, for the purpose of finally ascertaining whether his mere vote would, by its relation to the respective propositions, sufficiently explain his opinions. I had hoped, said Mr. B., that this might be the case, as well in consequence of the pressure of other business of great importance, which a continuance of the debate may endanger, as from the difficulty of saying any thing on the present subject without more than usual liability to misapprehension; but as I am still unable to perceive that my vote in rejection or adoption of any of the resolutions will be a sufficient explanation of the motives for giving it, I feel constrained to ask the brief attention of the House, while I submit a few remarks in justification of myself to my constituents, rather than for the purpose of instruction to the gentlemen around me.

From the commencement of this debate, I have repeatedly found myself, as probably many others have, agreeing with gentlemen in the general strain of their remarks, and yet not agreeing with them in the resolution which they declared their determination to support; and I have, on the other hand, coincided with gentlemen in the terms of the resolution, for which, if any should be adopted, they declared their preference, while, at the same time, I have differed from them widely and essentially, upon some of the reasoning which appeared to lead them to their conclusion. This is one of the peculiarities which distinguish the present debate, and which impose it as a duty upon me to state my own reasons for my own conclusion.

I beg further to say that this agreement with gentlemen in their premises, and disagreement in their inferences, on the contrary, is not a consequence of the common error of illogical deduction, but springs from a different cause, and principally from a want of agreement in regard to the true question before the House, or from a failure to keep that question always in view. The question before the House is not what gentlemen think, or ought to think, in relation to the points of difference supposed to exist between the United States and France, but what this House ought to say; and not what it ought to say upon the happening of a future and contingent event, but what, in the very events accomplished, and now before us, it ought to say, and to say to France; for this is the necessary character of any thing now said, that it is said by the House of Representatives to the French Chambers and to the French nation. If these are regarded as features of the true question before us, then it is obvious that gentlemen may agree in opinions, and not in the expression of them; and that they may even agree that the expression of them may be fit to follow a future event, without agreeing that it ought to be made in anticipation of it.

The question, then, for determination by the House is what this House ought now to say to France, in regard to certain matters at present affecting the relations of the two countries; and this question the House will continue incompetent to decide, with any thing like the wisdom which the occasion requires, until it shall determine and settle another question; and that is, what object it purposes to attain by saying any thing in regard to the matter. The honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GILMER] has been the first to call the attention of the House to this fundamental inquiry. What object does the House purpose or hope to effect by saying any thing? If this object be not previously stated, the debate must necessarily be without point, and also without any standard of comparison in its progress. It will continue to be, as in no small degree it has been, a mere idle waste of time and breath in the expression of sentiments which no one in the House or the nation has, or ever will have, any doubt about.

To this inquiry I shall deem it my duty to recur at another time, after endeavoring precisely to fix the character of our present relations with France; for unless this is truly stated and adequately considered, my own remarks will be of as little pertinency as I have ventured to suppose has been the case with those of some other gentlemen.

What, then, is the state of the relations between France and the United States? What is it, according to the information imparted by the President in his different messages to Congress? For it must not be forgotten that but a partial communication of the despatches of the American minister has been made to the House; that parts have been withheld, from alleged considerations of public interest; that we consequently know but in part, and that this partial knowledge greatly augments the difficulty of saying any thing which shall have a very pointed or particular application to these relations. The House will, without hesitation, admit that it should proceed with the greater caution in speaking its opinions upon a subject which considerations of public interest have prevented the President from unservedly laying open to Congress. From what has been disclosed, however, it is obvious to the whole country that, with a single exception, the relations between the United States and France are not only those of amity, but of the most perfect harmony. Apart from the non-execution of the treaty of 1831, there is not a cloud in the sky under which the two nations repose. Every difficulty that has at any time disturbed the friendship which began in the original alliance of the two nations has been adjusted by negotiation. Their commercial intercourse is upon a footing of equal satisfaction to both. There is no subject of unfriendly competition between them. Ancient ties have been strengthened, and new ones created, by the approximation of the constitution of France to that principle of elective representation which is the foundation of our own. It is impossible to imagine two nations with fewer natural causes of misunderstanding, or whose reciprocal interests tend more necessarily and directly to peace.

What, then, is the case presented by the treaty of 1831? On the part of the United States, we prefer a claim to the payment of specific sums, at appointed periods, stipulated and fixed by the most sacred of international compacts; for such is the indisputable character of that treaty. There is no question of interpretation, no collateral matter whatever, to bring its effect or application into doubt; we repose upon the plain words of the treaty, and upon the faith of France. Such is the case on our side; and it is impossible to put a plainer or a stronger case. How is it on the side of France? The constitutional King of the French nation, and the nation itself, by him, its only representative before foreign nations, say precisely what we say. They acknowledge the validity, the effect, and the obligation of the treaty. They have never suggested a reason or a motive for its evasion or disallowance. It stands as the bond of France, acknowledged by that department of the French Government which is alone capable of declaring the consent of the French nation to the United States. The claim of the United States is therefore not only remarkable for its clearness and simplicity, but for the frank and unequivocal assent and acknowledgment of the party from whom performance is to come. By what casualty, or mischance, or mismanagement, such a claim, so acknowledged, is to become a source of collision, and the occasion of rupture between the two nations, it is not at present within my power to comprehend.

It happens, sir, that, by the constitution of France, as by our own, the right of raising and appropriating money for the execution of every engagement of the nation, and therefore of treaties, belongs not to the treaty-making power, but to another branch of the Government; and that to obtain from this department, not the recognition or sanction of the treaty—for it is perfect without either—but to obtain the means of satisfying its stipulations, the King resorted to the Chamber for the necessary acts of legislation. The King, in behalf of his own nation, and not in behalf of the United States, asked an appropriation by law to satisfy the treaty. In the Chamber of Deputies, the bill, or projet de loi, authorizing the Minister of Finance to take measures for carrying the treaty into effect, failed at the first presentation by a very few votes; and it is not difficult to perceive that it failed from want of information, from misinformation, or prejudice, and, more than all, from the opposition of political parties, not growing out of the treaty, nor having any direct reference to it or to the United States, but availing themselves of the occasion to annoy that branch of the Government to which they were opposed, by the rejection of a measure which it had specially approved and ratified. The appropriation failed, sir. The faith of the French nation was not kept as this nation had a right to expect; and there was ground, and just ground, of complaint. But considering the nature of our respective Governments—considering also that this failure occurred in the popular branch of the Legislature, for which our own institutions bespeak some toleration as well as sympathy—and taking mainly into consideration the fact that the first action of such a body is hardly ever definitive, no one could regard the act as seriously threatening our relations with France, if the King, the treaty-making power, the constitutional representative of the nation in this behalf, retained his fidelity to the compact, and his determination to repeat his appeal to the Chambers for the means of executing it. The President acted, sir, and acted wisely, under the influence of this sentiment. The King of France did retain his fidelity to the treaty. He did retain his determination to repeat his appeal to the Chambers. He did more; he evinced the profoundest personal interest in the execution of the treaty, by giving to the American minister an assurance of its fulfilment, not only as a King, but as a man whose individual sentiments were devoted to the object. The King promised that the treaty should be again presented to the Chambers as soon as they could be assembled; and I am warranted in saying, that, whatever shade was cast over our relations by the delay in first introducing the bill into the Chamber of Deputies, or by the refusal of a small majority to pass it, this promise was, in the opinion of the President, sufficient to dispel. The President did not deem the circumstance to be of sufficient moment to communicate it to Congress. Here again the two nations stood towards each other in the attitude of friendship—on both sides looking for, expecting, and desiring the same thing.

But, sir, the Chambers met upon the 31st July, 1834; and although the King, in his speech from the throne, on the day of their meeting, announced this bill as a subject to be presented to them, yet it was not actually presented during the remainder of that session, and, at the expiration of a fortnight, the Chambers were adjourned to the close of December. The justification of the King, if it exists—for I am not here to judge him, but to state with accuracy the present posture of our relations—the justification of this omission by the King stands on the fact or suggestion that the session of the Chambers in July, which was the first meeting after the new election of the Deputies, was, according to established and well-known usage, a session for ceremonial purposes only, and therefore not within the accepted meaning of the engagement; and it stands on the further suggestion, that the time which was part of the engagement was not to be taken rigorously, but with such reasonable latitude as belongs to every engagement of this nature, and which, to ensure the very success that is in view, may require the exercise of some discretion as to the precise moment of presenting the stipulated measure for consideration. These are the alleged justifications of the King; but either they did not occur to the President, or he deemed them insufficient. The President was offended by the delay, and, in his message at the opening of the present Congress, he is understood to have impeached the fidelity of the King to his word, and to have uttered a menace against the whole nation, of taking redress by force, if Congress would consent, unless the Chambers should make provision for the treaty at their present session. The actual or supposed non-compliance of the King of France with his word of promise, in precise manner and form as he gave it, or authorized it to be given, is the first of the two clouds which have come over our relations with the nation of France, and it still remains suspended over them, notwithstanding it is now known to this House, and to the world, that, in substance at least, the King has been true to his word, and that the bill is before the Chamber of Deputies for their decision. The supposed imputation upon the King's honor, and the menace addressed to the fears of France, do not appear to have been received, nor was it expected by men of reflection that they would be received, without some corresponding sensibility. The King has recalled his minister, that he may no longer, as it is said, "be exposed to hear language so offensive to France." Passports have been offered to the minister of the United States, "that he may take the measures which may seem to him to be the natural consequences of the communication;" and thus the message of the President, under the interpretations given to it in Paris, has become the cause of another cloud over our relations, while the general interests and feelings of the two people, notwithstanding both these incidental difficulties, tend as directly and as naturally to the preservation of peace and harmonious intercourse as they have done at any former period. It is with relations such as these that the House is invited, in some way or other, to interfere. It is in reference to difficulties of this aspect that it is thought by some gentlemen that the interposition of the House will be profitable. On the contrary, sir, I have a very strong conviction that they are of that very kind which will not be benefited in any way by the action of this body, and that they will end of themselves, if we will suffer them to do so; for I believe the recall of the French minister is deemed a sufficient answer to so much of the message as was personal to the King; and I also believe that we have the benefit of an admission by the French minister of Finance, upon submitting the bill to the Chamber of Deputies, that the message of the President does not impair the obligation of France, and of that body, to make full provision for the treaty, and consequently that, up to this time, France is without pretext for escaping from its obligations.

And now, sir, what name is to be given to the only subjects of collision that exist between two great nations, and for which they are to go to war, if they go to war at all? With respect to the treaty itself, I repeat that it never has been, it never will be, of itself, a subject of collision between the two nations. Parties have made an occasional use of it; it is in the spirit of party so to do. But this must have an end; and, if not quickened into new life by ourselves, it will be found to have come to an end already. That a great nation like France, knowing the value and the force of public opinion, and its finally irresistible influence in compelling fidelity to engagements by nations as well as by individuals, will desire or will be able to resist its influence in compelling fidelity to this treaty, is what I do not believe. I will not impute to her the will—I do not believe that she has the power—to refuse a compliance with it. Of itself the treaty is not, and if left to itself it never will be, a subject of collision between the two countries. But we have other subjects of collision, incidental to the treaty, of which, with due care, if gentlemen are so disposed, something may be made; and it is worthy of inquiry, by what name they are to be called, if, in the course of events, any thing is to be made of them that shall interrupt the peace of the two countries. On the one side, sir, there has been a failure in a punctilio of time; on the other, there has been a failure in a punctilio of personal courtesy—of courtesy to the person of the King, and possibly to the nation—but still a punctilio. And thus this nation is to forego the unanswerable claim that she has to a substantial performance of the treaty, and both nations are to forget their ancient friendship, and the present and perpetual sameness of their great interests, commercial and political, to go to war upon punctilios of time and courtesy. Sir, the minister of the United States has given to the present difficulties between the two nations the very name they deserve, and he has said that there are none between the two countries which do not deserve the same name.

In his letter of the 14th January to the Count de Rigny, Mr. Livingston adverts with regret to the recall of the French minister, as cutting off the usual means of restoring harmony to two nations who have the same interests, commercial and political, to unite them, and "none but factitious subjects for collision." Yes, sir, our subjects of collision are factitious, and we have none of any other description. The present subjects of controversy and collision are stated by our own representative, and stated most truly, to be, one and all, artificial, adventitious, incidental, superinduced; and that there is not among them one that is natural or necessary, or that properly belongs to the general and true character of the relations between the countries. The pervading character of those relations is peace and reciprocal good will, and a spirit among the people disposed to continue both; but on the one side there is complaint of the want of punctilious compliance with the letter of a promise, and on the other there is offence at the terms of this very complaint, and the half demonstration of a purpose to postpone the performance of right, in consequence of a menace to extort it by force. If the House is disposed to add to these factitious subjects of collision, it can do it with all possible ease; if, on the contrary, it is disposed to let this troubled current run itself clear, the House has nothing to do but to let it alone. Sir, I call to the attention of the House the fact, not yet adverted to, that the Chamber of Deputies before whom the subject is now depending, is not the same individually by whom the bill of appropriation for the treaty was rejected. Since that rejection, new elections have taken place, and doubtless with a more pointed reference to this subject than the elections of the previous Chamber. The precise influence of this circumstance cannot be stated, but it is not to be disregarded; and the reference to it completes what I have to say in regard to the relations between France and the United States, which, if it is intended to affect them at all, by any thing now said by this House, cannot be considered with too much circumspection in all their bearings. And now, Mr. Speaker, as I am most decidedly against adding to the number of these factitious subjects of collision, thinking, as I do, that our case, under the treaty, by itself the clearest and most unanswerable case that any nation ever had against another, has been sufficiently complicated by what has already been done, and as I agree with those who are for saying and for doing the least, at the present time, I mean to protect myself from misinterpretation by one or two remarks.

I hold the treaty of 1831 to be a compact of unquestionable validity, constitutionally made and perfected on both sides, requiring nothing further from any branch of the French Government to complete its obligatory force, and more than usually sacred, from the nature of the wrongs it was intended to indemnify; and while I perceive no necessity at this time for a resolution by the House, that the rights secured to our citizens by the treaty ought in no event to be sacrificed, abandoned, or impaired; yet, I am ready to say, for myself, that I do not now conceive of any possible event, in which the least of these rights ought to be sacrificed, abandoned, or impaired, by any act or omission on the part of the United States. The treaty has, on the part of France, been made by the authority of that branch of the Government to which the constitution of the French nation has delegated the absolute and perfect right of making treaties. The whole nation have made it by the King, to whom is confided, without qualification or appeal, the power to declare war, and to make treaties of peace, alliance, and commerce, the generic names under which every species of contract with foreign nations was intended to be included, and which, beyond doubt, literally includes the treaty of 1831, a treaty of commerce, and of indemnity for interrupted and outraged commerce. The authority of the Chambers over the purse of the nation, and their consequent power to obstruct the execution of the treaty by refusing an appropriation for the stipulated payments, affects not in the remotest degree the obligation of the treaty upon the whole nation, and upon every branch of its Government. The Chambers hold the same power over appropriations for the payment of debts contracted by express authority of a law made by themselves as a constituent part of the Legislature. They have the undoubted power to refuse an appropriation in execution of a previous law; but the law is not the less a law, nor the treaty the less a treaty, nor either of them in any degree less obligatory upon the honor, faith, and conscience of the nation, by reason of the existence of such a power. The power of the French Chambers does not concern a foreign nation. They are not part of the treaty-making power. The constitution of France has not reposed that trust in them, but in another. Their authority is for internal administration. The United States have no relations to that body, send no minister to it, cannot negotiate with it, cannot recognise it as entitled to take any part, original or final, in their negotiations with France. In the King is centered the full and entire power of the nation in its external relations with foreign Powers. With him the power begins and ends; and the treaty which is concluded by his authority, whether it be a treaty of peace or of commerce, is a treaty of the nation, its supreme law, and binds every department of the Government as effectually as if it were expressly ratified by every officer and subject of France. How and where the nation are to obtain the money which is to satisfy the treaty is a question of internal law, in the decision of which neither can the voice of the United States be heard, nor her rights be prejudiced. The Chambers may refuse the appropriation; but if they shall refuse it, and if the nation shall sustain them in the refusal, the nation will violate that faith which it authorized the King to plight. There is no difference in this respect between the constitutions of the two countries. A treaty made by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, is the supreme law of the land. It binds the nation, and the faith of the nation. Congress have power to refuse an appropriation to pay an indemnity stipulated by treaty; but if Congress refuse it, and if the nation shall sustain them in the refusal, the nation is untrue to the constitution, and stands before the world convicted of violated faith. That the power may be fitly used in an extreme emergency is saying no more than that the violation of public faith may possibly be a smaller evil than the execution of a ruinous treaty. But, be it smaller or greater, the public faith is violated, unless a treaty constitutionally made is executed in all its parts, and by all parts of the nation. These, sir, are my sentiments in regard to the obligations of the treaty of 1831, and no vote I shall ever give will contradict them.

Again, sir, whether the refusal by the French nation to execute this treaty will or will not be a just cause of war, and an expedient reason for resorting to it, belongs not to this occasion to settle. What are sufficient causes of war let no man say, let no legislator say, until the question of war is directly and inevitably before him. Jurists may be permitted with comparative safety to pile tome upon tome of interminable disquisition upon the motives, reasons, and causes of just and unjust war. Metaphysicians may be suffered with impunity to spin the thread of their speculations until it is attenuated to a cobweb; but for a body like this, created for the government of a great nation, and for the adjustment and protection of its infinitely diversified interests, it is worse than folly to speculate upon the causes of war, until the great question shall be presented for immediate action; until they shall hold the united question of cause, motive, and present expediency, in the very palm of their hands. War is a tremendous evil. Come when it will, unless it shall come in the necessary defence of our national security, or of that honor under whose protection national security reposes, it will come too soon—too soon for our national prosperity—too soon for our individual happiness—too soon for the frugal, industrious, and virtuous habits of our citizens—too soon, perhaps, for our most precious institutions. The man who for any cause, save the sacred cause of public security, which makes all wars defensive—the man who for any cause but this, shall promote or compel this final and terrible resort, assumes responsibility second to none, nay, transcendently deeper and higher than any which man can assume before his fellow-men, or in the presence of God, his creator. But, sir, when I have said this, let me further say that, terrible as war is, if it shall not come until after national security is impaired, national honor in its legitimate sense blighted, and national rights yielded up and prostituted to every threat of force, and to every artifice of fraud, it will come too late. War is a great evil, but there is a greater evil than war. I therefore will not say, sir, that because this is a treaty for the payment of money, therefore the non-performance of it cannot be a just cause and expedient motive of war. I would not say so if it were a treaty which began as well as ended in a pecuniary debt; for the question might still arise, whether, after submitting to the dishonor of such a violation, there would be any thing left to us either worthy or capable of defence. But this treaty did not begin as well as end in pecuniary debt. It is a treaty of indemnity for wrongs, every one of which, by involving security and honor too, was a just cause of war, if there can be such a cause, and would have furnished the expedient motive too, if our strength had been equal to half the measure of our wrongs. If this treaty be invalidated, what will be our position? Treaty for indemnity, negotiation for treaty, motive for negotiation, will all have gone, and for ever; and what will remain but the wrongs which negotiation and treaty can never repair? Sir, I will not pursue this subject further; and God grant that the day in which it must be pursued further may never arrive.

Again, sir, as a means of averting this tremendous evil, I hold that the spirit of pacific negotiation should never leave us. Upon this subject I adopt every sentiment that was uttered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] even while I am compelled to reject the resolution he proposes. We should cling to negotiation, or to the temper of negotiation, as tenaciously as the shipwrecked mariner clings to his last plank. It is the last plank upon which nations in discord can alone hope to reach the shore and haven of peace. It should be retained in peace and in war too—when the storm threatens, when it first curls the surface of the ocean, and, above all, when it rages in its utmost fury. If this plank of escape is thrown away in defiance, even at the moment of deadliest conflict, what issue do the human passions prepare for this savage and ferocious struggle, but that one or both of the parties shall perish for ever beneath the boiling waves? Sir, I confess my astonishment that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations should have reported to this House a resolution declaring it “incompatible with the rights and honor of the United States further to negotiate in relation to the treaty of 1831.” What does he mean by negotiation? What does he mean by excluding it even in relation to the treaty? He has not duly considered the subject, nor weighed the import of his own language. Sir, the position of the treaty is such that it cannot even be insisted on without negotiation. Events have for ever made the literal execution of that treaty impossible; and if it is to be executed, negotiation can alone fix the equivalent for payment, which should have been made in 1833, 1834, and 1835—in one, two, and three years after the exchange of ratifications on the 2d February, 1832. Are the instalments now in arrear to be paid simply, or with interest; and what is to be the rate of interest? Is interest alone to be received, or damages for the detention? All these questions are questions for negotiation; and if the gentleman shall say that he did not mean this, then I answer that he did not mean what his resolution says. It would be an act of unprecedented weakness for this House to use such language in regard to a treaty so situated, or to any treaty or point of controversy whatever; and it would moreover transcend the proper functions of this House, which do not include the power of negotiating with foreign nations. It belongs to another department; and this is my reason for not agreeing to the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, which, if the President shall deem it compatible with the honor and interests of the United States to resume the negotiations between the United States and France, that resolution requests him so to do. Sir, the request is out of place, and it is unnecessary. If the President shall deem it compatible with our honor and interest further to negotiate, he will do it without the request; and if he does not, the resolution requests nothing of him. I would leave the responsibility where the constitution has placed it; and while I mean to offer no praise to the President, (for the occasion does not call for it,) I will say that, possessed, as I do not doubt he is, of great sagacity, of the strongest sentiments of gratitude to this people, and, above all, of a desire that his whole public career shall abide the judgment of that posterity that is to pass upon it, I entertain no fear whatever that, if left to himself, he will fail either to accept or to invite negotiation, when the honor and interests of the country shall call for it. But upon him, I repeat it, be the responsibility, and the whole responsibility, of his office.

And now, sir, having cleared my own vote from all chance of misapprehension, let me recur to the inquiry, what object does this House mean to attain by saying any thing upon this subject? Is it to make France know that we are awake to the treaty, and mean to adhere to it? France knows it already—all the world knows it; it is a matter upon which neither France nor the United States, nor any part of Europe, will again sleep, until it is finally disposed of. Is it to sustain the President in what is understood to be an imputation upon the personal honor of the King, and a menace against the nation? I call upon the House to pause—to pause and turn their eyes inward upon the emotions that would be there excited by a menace from France to extort by force what was due from us in honor or in faith. And ought France to be less sensitive than we are? Ought she to be censured for not being less sensitive? Sir, it is with nations as it is with men, that even honor and justice may be compelled to withhold what is due from both, by language which takes away all the grace and at least half the virtue of doing what is right. And this is our position, that whatever we now say will follow a supposed menace, and unless diluted to insignificance may, and perhaps must, be understood to repeat it. I would abstain from any language that could be so interpreted. I would give to France the fullest opportunity now possible of executing this treaty, by abstaining from every expression as well as from every act which may disable a brave and high-spirited people from complying with its own principles of honor and good faith, because they are not left to the operation of these principles alone. If France shall ultimately refuse what these principles require, it does not now become us to resolve or to say what is the direction which such a state of things may compel or induce this nation to take.

But is it, sir, for another purpose that the House is to adopt some of the strong resolutions which have been proposed? Is it to repel insinuations or charges made on the floor of the Chamber of Deputies in disparagement of the character of our country, imputing to us a disgraceful devotion to gain, and a more disgraceful insensibility to national honor? And is this House, sir, is this branch of the Congress of the United States, to point its grave and deliberate resolutions against some vapid spouter from the tribune, some partisan debater, who seeks to draw himself out of his obscurity by assailing whatever is respectable or elevated among men? Sir, there are in all legislative bodies men who waste the hours that should be given to the weighty concerns of the nation in idle and unmeaning babble; and are we to increase the mischief by condescending to notice it? Whatever might be my general unfitness for the exalted duties of legislation, I would at least endeavor upon this occasion to enlarge myself to such a measure of practical wisdom as to regard only that which is worthy of regard. It is a time when the interests of the nation hang upon the complexion of our words, and may be committed to irreparable loss by the slightest inconsideration.

H. or R.]

Relations with France.

Let me further inquire, sir, if this House shall, for these or any other motives, convey a menace, express or constructive, in any of their resolutions, will they not necessarily strengthen the hands of that party in the Chamber of Deputies opposed to the constitutional monarchy of France, and therefore opposed to the treaty which the head of that monarchy has made and ratified? Will they not impair the force of that portion of the Chamber friendly to the constitution, friendly to the representative principle, and friendly to us—impair it by the influence of those emotions which irresistibly compel men of spirit, whatever may be their convictions of justice or policy, to forego them all when they come in conflict with self-respect or with national pride? Will they not throw the weight of these sentiments in the scale that is adverse to the present Government of France, in those parts of it which approximate to our own, and thus place us in opposition to the general cause of constitutional government?

Sir, in every point of view in which I have placed this subject, I have been unable to discover any advantage from, at this time, saying any thing, while I think I can clearly see that if almost any thing is said, it may weaken the force of what may hereafter necessarily occur to be done. It is, I humbly conceive, the duty of this House, as it has been deemed the duty of another branch of the Legislature, at the present time, and in the present posture of affairs, to reserve itself fully on every part of the case, and to leave the question unembarrassed to those who succeed us. I agree in the main with the sentiments contained in the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts; but I perceive no advantage in the adoption of them, and in the present form I cannot vote for them. I cannot agree either to the sentiments or the expression of the principal resolution from the Committee on Foreign Relations; and if any advantage whatever is to be derived from it, though with eager attention I have followed every part of this debate, to gather from what quarter advantage might be shown in connexion with that resolution, I remain as at first in a state of total obscurity. If any thing is said, I am for the least that can be said; and, in the present state of the several resolutions, decidedly prefer that which has been offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCHER.]

When Mr. BURNET had finished,

Mr. SCHLEY said he did not rise to make what might be dignified with the title of a "speech." He was restrained from doing so by two considerations: first, because he labored under a physical disability to do so, in consequence of ill health during the greater part of the session; and, secondly, because, in his opinion, the subject under consideration did not require or admit of much speaking.

The course, said Mr. S., which gentlemen have taken in this debate, forcibly reminded him of a reverend friend of his in Georgia, who is fond of speaking, and who, though he took a text, always sedulously avoided touching it in his discourse, and directed his attention to matters and things in general. Sir, said Mr. S., what is the question before the House? Is it a question of war? Is there any thing in the resolution offered which looks to such a state of things? I humbly apprehend not. Why, then, do gentlemen portray in such vivid colors the horrors and calamities of war? Is it to drive us from the support of this resolution? To drive us from any action in regard to our present relations with France? If this be their object, they will find themselves in error.

Sir, I will not undertake to attribute the motive of such a course. Perhaps gentlemen would not be willing to admit as just the opinion I have formed; but certainly no adequate motive can be found in the nature and tendency of the resolution itself; and no gentleman who has advocated it on this floor has intimated a desire for war, nor any thing which could lead to such an idea.

I was somewhat astonished to hear my honorable colleague, [Mr. GILMER,] and the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCHER,] assert the doctrine that there was no violation of the treaty on the part of France by the refusal of the Chamber of Deputies to make the appropriation necessary to carry it into effect on their part. On what ground is this opinion held? On this, that the French Chambers is a separate and independent branch of that Government, in the same manner that this House is under our constitution. Admit this fact, and what follows? Why, these honorable gentlemen say that the treaty is not complete and binding on the nation until all the departments of the Government have ratified it, and provided for its final consummation; and therefore we have no cause of complaint against France. Is this true, in regard either to the French Government or our own? I presume not. What would be the consequence of such a doctrine? The executive branch of the Government, to which is intrusted the treaty-making power, would enter into a solemn treaty with a foreign nation, but the Chamber of Deputies in France, or this House here, as the case may be, would refuse to make the appropriation necessary to carry it into effect, and consequently the treaty would prove in fact to be no treaty. The parties would stand precisely where they stood before the negotiations were commenced, and in this way a nation might for ever avoid the payment of money due for any cause to another nation. Sir, this cannot be true. The proposition involves in itself a manifest contradiction. If the executive branch of the Government has the power to make a treaty, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that such treaty must be binding and obligatory on the nation; and therefore if another branch of the same Government, holding by the constitution the purse strings, shall refuse to pay the money stipulated by the treaty to be paid, such refusal is a violation of the faith of the nation, and a breach of the treaty. I admit the right of the Chambers and of this House to refuse the appropriation necessary to carry the treaty into effect; but they do it at their peril, and the nation injured or insulted by the refusal will have the perfect right to demand and take satisfaction.

But his principal object in rising to address the House was to present to them a view of the subject which had not been taken by any gentleman that had spoken. He would therefore proceed at once to what, in his opinion, was the main and the only question which ought to be considered, and he would detain the House but a few minutes. His honorable colleague [Mr. GILMER] and the honorable gentleman from Virginia who last addressed the House [Mr. ROBERTSON] had both emphatically asked the question, "What is the object of this resolution, if it be not to excite angry feelings, and lead to a state of hostilities?" Sir, (said Mr. S.,) I will tell the honorable gentleman what the object is. Every member on this floor, who has read the debate in the French Chamber, at the time when the law to appropriate money to carry the treaty into full effect was rejected, knows that the ground upon which the rejection was placed was that the promised indemnity was too great, and that some twelve or thirteen millions of francs is all that the French people ought in justice to pay. A pamphlet containing these debates, and this reasoning, was furnished by the Executive to every member at the opening of the present Congress. We have been in session three months, with a full knowledge of all these facts, and now, if we adjourn without opening our mouths on the subject, or declaring our view of the matter, will not the conclusion from such conduct be irresistible, that we know we have obtained by the treaty more than we are entitled to? Will not the French Chamber and people have a right to say that we know that the ground taken by them is true in point of fact, and that, therefore, we have not denied it? Is not this the fair and legitimate conclusion from these premises? And are gentlemen prepared to do an act which shall lead to such consequences? Will they be silent, by refusing to pass this resolution, and by such silence convey to the French nation and the world the idea that we claim more than in justice and equity we are entitled to?

Relations with France.

Sir, if there be any gentleman on this floor who really believes that the treaty gives us more than we are entitled to, let him say so, and let him vote against this resolution. But no man in this House, or in this nation, holds this opinion. On the contrary, every member who has addressed the Chair on either side of this question has declared his firm conviction that the indemnity offered by the treaty is much too small; that, instead of twenty-five millions of francs, it ought to be some sixty or seventy millions. Those gentlemen who oppose this resolution have declared, in the minority report, and in their speeches, that our claim under the treaty must not be abandoned. Why, then, are they unwilling to say so, by adopting the resolution on your table? No reason has been assigned, except that the resolution contains a menace or a threat. Not so, sir; there is nothing of that character in the resolution; nothing that could insult an individual or a magnanimous people. No such thing is intended, and the French people cannot so understand it.

We desire not war. We have done nothing to lead to such a result. This resolution has no such bearing, and if the French Government shall choose to make war on us in consequence of its passage, let them do so, and take the odium and the consequences. The civilized world will not sanction, but decidedly condemn, such a course.

This is the first opportunity which this House has had to express its opinion upon the conduct of the French Chambers in rejecting the appropriation, and upon the justice of our claims. There is, in fact, no difference of opinion here in regard to either. Let us then say to the French nation, that we know our cause to be just; that the indemnity provided by the treaty, instead of being too large, is, in fact, too small, and that we will insist upon its execution.

Mr. MANN, of New York, demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment offered by Mr. ANCHER; which were ordered.

Mr. GORHAM was in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ANCHER.] He thought it a very proper resolution for the occasion; but he rose simply to enter his decided protest against the views contained in the speech which the gentleman had delivered in favor of his amendment. He was utterly opposed to the speech; but would vote for the resolution.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, desired to state a single reason why he should vote against the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. ANCHER.] That gentleman had contended that the treaty with France was not a binding compact. If the amendment of his colleague should be concurred in, and should go out to the country coupled with the foregoing declaration, it might have a tendency to induce a belief that this House had adopted the resolution in consequence of the reasons expressed by his colleague. For one, he was of opinion that the treaty with France was a solemn and binding compact, which could not be disregarded or set aside by the French Chambers. He repeated, in conclusion, that, for the reason which he had assigned, he could not vote for the amendment.

Mr. WATMOUGH said he certainly did not propose to occupy much of the time of the House at this period. He was too deeply impressed with the vast importance of every moment of time. He knew well that the passage of the bills now on the table, waiting the action of the House, and compromised by delay, was of infinitely more importance, even in reference to the very question now under discussion, than any consequence that could possibly result from the "cormorant war" of words in which the House had been so long indulging.

What benefit, continued Mr. W., is to be derived from the high-sounding war speeches which some honorable gentlemen have permitted themselves to utter? In my opinion, none, sir. I do not think that the high standing we have hitherto held in the eyes of foreign nations can at all be enhanced by a continuance of this course. Upon this matter of our French relations, sir, my own mind is distinctly made up. I can perceive no cause for war. I differ totally from those who advocate that measure, always so fatal in its results. I consider the grounds they assume as untenable and unsound. If their object be to produce effect abroad, it is worse than idle; if to excite the passions of our countrymen at home, it is the part of every good man, of every firm patriot, to oppose himself to the effort.

Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of the critical position we are at this moment occupy. I am as little inclined as any man to do that which will compromise the honor and dignity of my country. I feel, sir, that we are tottering upon the verge of one of the most dreadful calamities that can afflict a free nation—a calamity that, to us, in our present position of unrivalled and progressive prosperity, would be melancholy in the extreme. War, at all times dreadful, would come upon us now like the blast from the desert, drying up and withering all before it. It is to be avoided. It is a solemn and sacred obligation upon us to endeavor to avoid it, so long as we can avoid it with honor. It is incumbent upon us to do nothing that may even remotely induce it. Personally, sir, it has no terrors for me—it is the only profession I have ever been taught; but, loving my country with unbounded affection, and aware of the evil growth it produces in the hearts of all men, of the tares it scatters and would cast over the whole land, I feel I should be wanting in my duty if I did not, under existing circumstances, oppose myself to that course which tends to produce it.

I think, therefore, sir, no good can result from a further prolongation of this debate. All has been said on both sides of [the House that is likely to produce good; much on one side that may produce evil. To my mind, the argument of my distinguished and esteemed colleague near me, [Mr. BAKER,] and of the honorable gentleman from Georgia who spoke first, [Mr. GILMER,] contains all that ought to be said, at this time, on this subject. The deep attention with which the House received what fell so warm and intellectual from the lips of my distinguished friends, amply proved the force of what they uttered. No one even ventured to question their positions. What, then, do we hope for from further discussion? We do not aim to frighten France by words. To little purpose is it that I have dwelt upon the history of that great nation, if I am not convinced that results directly the reverse of what have been intimated be not the consequence of any such attempt; or can we hope by further discussion to induce the movers of the many sets of resolutions now before us, or any one of them, to waive the honor which each is struggling for, and give place to his rival? It is a vain hope, sir. No one will recede; each seeks for the success of his own measure; few can vote for any of the resolutions as they now stand. In the meanwhile, sir, time flies; a few hours more, and this House will only exist as a matter of history; and, near as we are to the close of our political existence, it is absolutely appalling to reflect how little has been done. Upon the whole, therefore, sir, believing that when the proper time comes it will be better to act than to talk, and convinced that the silent operations of reason and reflection will be conclusive upon the minds of all men, both here and abroad, I move, in order to enable the House to dispose of at least some of the important bills upon the table, to lay the whole subject upon the table, and upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the reading of the resolution which he had offered, in its modified form. He desired that the House should know what it was that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATMOUGH] had moved to lay on the table.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831, should be maintained, and its execution insisted on.

The question was then taken on Mr. WATMOUGH's motion to lay the whole subject on the table, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Ashley, Barber, Bates, Beatty, Bell, Binney, Campbell, Clayton, Clowney, Corwin, Crane, Crockett, Deberry, Dickson, Horace Everett, Garland, Gilmer, Gorham, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Hardin, James Harper, Hazeltine, E. So the motion was negatived.

Mr. BEARDSLEY remarked that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ANCHER] was the particular subject now under consideration. It contained two propositions; one declaratory of the views of this House, that no legislative measure was at this time required or proper; the other, a statement of the cause or foundation of the opinion at which the House had arrived. That foundation, as declared in the resolution, was a "just expectation" that France would make provision for carrying the treaty of July 4, 1831, into effect.

Mr. B. asked upon what that "expectation" was founded? What ground had we for assuming it as the basis of our action on this most important subject? All might, as all did, desire that result. It was the hope of every one; but, for himself, he saw no sufficient reason for expressing the "just," the confident "expectation," that the Government of France had already made, or would make, the required provision.

[Mr. ANCHER explained. He meant by the words "just expectation," as applied in the resolution, not to refer to the conduct of France, or what might be expected from her, but the character of our claims upon her, which he regarded as just.]

Mr. BEARDSLEY said the explanation would help the matter but little, unless the phrasenology of the resolution was changed. That would be understood, at home and abroad, according to the ordinary meaning of the terms used, and not as construed or explained by the honorable mover: and he insisted that the only fair interpretation that could be placed upon the language of the resolution was that which he had given. At least, that was its natural and common-sense meaning. France would so understand it, if adopted by the House, and she would act accordingly. Then, he would ask again, upon what was that "expectation" founded? Upon, as he supposed, the speculative conjecture of our minister at Paris, and upon that alone. After the omission of France, from 1832 to this time, to perform her treaty—a positive, long-continued neglect and violation of its provisions; and, still more, a positive refusal by the Chamber of Deputies to abide by its provisions—after the recall of the French minister and the dismissal of ours from France, we are called upon, in the face of this mass of evidence, to express a confident, a "just expectation" that France will abide by and perform her treaty, which has hitherto been most unceremoniously neglected and violated. He could see no reasonable ground for that opinion; and he would not, out of mere complaisance to France, express an expectation which, in his opinion, was in no respect warranted by her conduct. This was one, and, with him, a decisive, objection to the amendment under consideration. There were others, which might be stated, growing out of the posture of our present relations with France, and which, in his judgment, called for a decided expression of opinion on the part of this House.

Mr. B. said he could not vote for the amendment of the honorable and very distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] which proposed to advise the President that further negotiation with France would meet the approbation of this House, if, in the opinion of the President, that course would be compatible with the honor and interest of the United States.

Relations with France.

The treaty-making power was not vested in this House, but in the President and Senate. The President was the organ of that power, and of the Union at large, with all foreign Governments. He would leave those upon whom the constitution had devolved that responsibility, to exercise it, without obtruding upon them advice which is not asked for, and for which he could see no necessity. Even if the advice were of itself proper, he would not, at this time, expose to France any strong anxiety for further negotiation. With whom would we negotiate? With the King of the French? He had signed the treaty; he admitted its obligatory force, and was unquestionably desirous to see it fulfilled. It was not his fault that it had not been punctually performed. Why, then, negotiate further with the King? Or was it intended to invite a negotiation with the Chamber of Deputies?

Mr. B. said he did not, in all respects, approve of the original resolutions reported by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, although he would vote for them rather than not express any opinion upon the subject. The amendment, however, which had been proposed by the honorable chairman, and which he understood had been accepted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] as a substitute for his first resolution, met with his entire approbation, and he should give it his vote. If adopted, it would express the opinion of this House that it was the duty of the Government of the United States to insist upon the performance, by France, of the treaty of 1831. The circumstances in which we were placed demanded an explicit opinion on our part, either that we would or would not insist upon its performance. If we were not prepared to insist upon it, let us say so, and abandon it altogether.

Gentlemen had said such an expression would be equivalent to a declaration of war against France. If so, then the minority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs was for war; for this was their sentiment, expressed in their own language, leaving off those words which were supposed to give it an unbecoming severity, if not, indeed, some small degree of ferocity. The obnoxious words, "at all hazards," had been stricken out, and the only sentiment which the resolution would now contain was the fixed opinion of this House that the treaty ought not to be abandoned, but that its performance should be insisted on. And, sir, have we not a right to express that opinion and to indicate that purpose? Is not such the general sentiment of our constituents? Are we prepared, any one of us, to abandon the treaty, or to say to France that we will not insist on its performance?

Sir, will France have a right to regard this resolution as a menace? Surely not. She has made the question for us, and we are bound to decide it—to decide it as the national honor and the national interest require; as our constituents demand that it should be decided. Sir, is there any reasonable doubt of what is the true sentiment of this country? Consult the public press: with the exception of the most degraded and corrupt of its organs, we shall find it united in maintaining the sanctity of the treaty, and insisting that the rights secured by it shall in no event be sacrificed or abandoned. Sir, let us take counsel from the patriotic feelings of the country, and proclaim to France and to the world that, as the obligation of this treaty is perfect, as on our part we have performed all its stipulations with fidelity, so we will exact and insist upon a similar observance on theirs.

Mr. BRIGGS expressed a disposition to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCADE], because it gave an expression of the opinion of the House, which he deemed necessary. It appeared by the discussion in the French Chambers, that an idea prevailed there that we were divided on the subject of the justice and intention of recovering this claim. This, he apprehended, was not the fact. He believed this House, he believed this people, to be united on this subject. The very newspaper (the National Intelligencer) which had been loudest denounced as opposing the views of the President, had very emphatically declared in favor of the validity of the treaty, and the necessity of its being fulfilled. An expression of the opinion of the House on this point, and the confidence we entertain in the final adjustment of the claim, seemed to be called for. He, for one, would contribute to that result of the discussion.

Mr. WISE begged to say a word or two only. Instead of spending so much time in idle debate, he thought they would be best doing their duty by putting their country into a state of defence. If this war should come within the next twelve months, he feared he should be called one of those members of Congress who neglected to take measures to put the country in a state of defence; and when the French fleet should arrive, and seize upon their fortifications, it will be asked, what was the House of Representatives about during the last two days of the session? and the only reply will be, that they were spent in debate. Mr. W. wished the subject had been laid on the table, and that they had taken up the subject of appropriation to provide for the means of defence. To the House, and every individual member of it, he would say, in mercy say no more about it.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed a hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] would consent to adopt the resolution which he had proposed, for the purpose of facilitating the business of the House. If that gentleman did not deem it expedient to do so, Mr. C. said he should feel it incumbent on him to move it as an amendment, after the question had been taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia. He urged the House to come to some action upon the subject. Let us, said Mr. C., do our duty, without reference to the course of the French Chamber of Deputies, and leave them to do theirs.

Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts, now rose and said that, before the question should be taken on the amendment now before the House, he was desirous of assigning the reasons which induced him to oppose its adoption, though some of them had already been stated, in a very able manner, by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. BEARDSLEY.] The amendment alleged "that in the just expectation that the Government of France will have made provision, or will make provision, for carrying into effect the stipulations of the treaty of indemnity with that Government, of the 4th of July, 1831, this House will forbear, at the present time, to adopt any measure in relation to that subject." Mr. A. said he was not disposed to bandy words either with the French Chambers or the French nation; but, for one, he could not say that there was just reason to expect any such thing. For himself, he had no such expectation. If he were to vote for the resolution, he must violate his own conscience. Whether the wording of the amendment was such as to express the idea intended by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCADE], as explained by himself, or whether it was to be taken in the sense which it would assume in the opinion of the nation, and of mankind generally, he could not in conscience vote for it, because he did not believe it. If this was not the proper occasion, if there could be no proper occasion, to enter into a war of words with the Legislature of a foreign nation, he must at least be permitted to say that it was not an occasion which would justify the paying of compliments to the French Government. To what did his friend's "just expectation" refer? Did it rest on the fact that the treaty had been four years ago consummated, as far as the legal and constitutional authorities of the country could consum-mate such an instrument? That three if not four annual instalments of the sum stipulated to be paid had utterly failed? A failure for which we were justly entitled to still further indemnity? Did it refer to the fact that the Chamber of Deputies had positively refused to carry the treaty into effect? Or was it drawn from the complexion of the intelligence recently received of the existing disposition on the part of that Government? Did the honorable gentleman find in all this, the "just ground" for expecting that they would do us justice? Or, if his expectation was not derived from these facts, was it from the style of argument employed in the Chamber of Deputies by these treaty-breakers? Did the gentleman find there that regard to moral principle from which he drew his inference that they would faithfully perform their engagements? Or was it from the fact that that style of argument had, in effect, predominated in that body, and led to the rejection of our bill? Did his hopes rest on observing the little, narrow, Shylock principle of reasoning, that cavilled for the ninth part of a hair—the refusal to pay five millions, if they could get off by paying three? Was it that for the sake of securing this difference, these Deputies had openly imputed to the American people the lowest, meanest, basest feelings of the human breast? That we are held up as a money-loving people, who would sell our honor for gain? In a word, that we were actuated by all the vilest feelings that belong to cowards? He asked the gentleman from Virginia to say whether this was the foundation on which he grounded his just expectation? Did the gentleman believe that the present Chambers would be any more honest or more honorable than their predecessors?

Mr. A. said that this was one substantial reason why he could not adopt the amendment proposed by his honorable friend from Virginia. The other was (what the gentleman, in the honesty of his heart, frankly admitted) that the whole foundation of the very able speech by which the amendment had been supported, was fear! The gentleman had been replied to on this point by his own colleague [Mr. BOULDER] in a manner that rendered it wholly needless for him (Mr. A.) to make any further answer to his argument. While his friend had been speaking, Mr. A. had been very forcibly struck by the contrast, noticed by that gentleman's colleague, between the course which the honorable gentleman had endeavored to persuade the House to adopt, and that which all that gentleman's friends, in that House and out of it, knew the gentleman himself would follow, under the like circumstances.

Every body knew full well that there was not a man upon that floor more sensitive in whatever pointed towards his honor, or more prompt to expose his life at any moment for the minutest punctilio of the most fastidious code by which that honor could be judged. Yet the gentleman came there and told the House that they must not dare to resent the grossest perfidy on the part of a foreign Government—nay, that this House must not even declare its inflexible adherence to the rights of their fellow-citizens, stipulated by a solemn treaty, for fear of consequences. The gentleman, in his speech, had, with great ability, and with entire consistency, set forth his reasons for the amendment which he had proposed. The amendment and the speech were perfectly congenial with each other.

Mr. A. had, therefore, felt surprised when he heard his colleague [Mr. GORHAM] declare that he should vote for the gentleman's resolution, though he protested against his speech. Mr. A. protested against both his resolution and his speech. He considered them perfectly consistent with each other. If the gentleman's argument was sound, then his conclusion was just. If the Chambers were not bound to carry the treaty into effect, then this House had no right to pass the resolution Mr. ADAMS had proposed. Thus, too, the resolution offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WARREN], by way of compliment (he supposed) to the speech of the gentleman's colleague, from Philadelphia, [Mr. BRUNN], ought to have been adopted; for that resolution was quite as consistent with the most able and eloquent speech of his colleague, as the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia was with the amendment he had offered.

Now, in order to lay a just foundation for such a resolution as was now proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, or such an one as he had himself had the honor to propose, it was necessary that the House should first settle the question which the gentleman from Virginia had raised, viz: as to the obligation upon the French Chambers to fulfil a treaty made by the King and his ministers. He had understood the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GILMER] to intimate something of the same uncertainty. He regretted that a gentleman for whom he entertained so high a respect should have countenanced, by a part of his speech, any doubt upon that subject. Mr. A. held in his hand the constitution of the French Government, and he should now ask leave to read to the House two sections from that instrument:

"ART. 13. The King is the supreme head of the State; he commands the land and sea forces, declares war, makes treaties of peace, alliance, and commerce, appoints," &c.

It is unnecessary to read further, the rest of the article being only the enumeration of other powers vested in the King.

Now, the House would observe that there was not here (nor in any other part of the constitution) one single word about any participation on the part of the Chambers in the making of treaties. And Mr. A. then declared in his place, before God and all mankind, that the treaty made by the French Government with this country was binding upon that Government in its full force before all the world.

There was another article of this French constitution which he desired to read to the House, because it had a bearing upon the internal operation of that Government, though equally applicable to its action towards foreign Powers.

"ART. 61. The public debt is guaranteed. Every kind of engagement entered into by the State with its creditors is inviolable."

Now, what was this treaty but an "engagement with a public creditor?" And if all debts to public creditors were to be "held inviolable," why not with creditors in a foreign country as much as those at home? So that the Chamber of Deputies, who had rejected the project of law for the payment of the American indemnity, could not do so without violating, not only the faith of the French nation, but the very letter as well as the spirit of their own constitution.

Mr. A. said that he did flatter himself that the vote of the House which had just been taken, upon the motion of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WARREN], to lay all the resolutions and the whole subject on the floor—no—on the table—'tis the same thing—was an indication of that feeling in the House which he felt in his own heart, that it was the bounden duty of that House to declare what was its sense of the existing condition of things, and what was its conviction of the duty of the French Government to fulfil its national stipulations as contained in its treaty with this country.

He had heard the other gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUNN] with that delight which always filled his mind when that gentleman undertook to discuss any important subject; but the delight had been in this instance mingled with pain and mortification. The speech of that gentleman had brought to his most reluctant mind the involuntary recollection of one who,

Relations with France.

—“with words cloth'd in reason's garb,
Counsell'd ignoble ease and peaceful sloth:
Not peace.”

It had been inquired by an honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GILMER,] and the inquiry had been repeated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIRNEY,] what was the object to be attained—what was the end for which the resolution which he proposed should be adopted by the House? He would tell these gentlemen what his object was in offering the resolution he had proposed.

At the commencement of the present session, the President of the United States had laid before the Legislative Assembly the existing state of our relations with the mighty and gallant nation who had been our earliest ally. He had told a tale which was simple and true, and it was a tale of plighted national faith deliberately broken; and he had concluded the communication by declaring that such was the present state of things with regard to the non-payment of the stipulated indemnity. The information was not new; the fact of the non-payment had been known to Congress at the close of its former session. But, after a correct representation of the wrongs of the nation, the President had proposed, on his high and great responsibility, that, if the French Chambers at their then approaching, or as it proved at their then existing session, should not make the appropriation to carry into effect the treaty of France with the United States, that reprisals should be granted against the French commerce.

Well, the President—but Mr. A. would make no farther observations on the message, though he had intended to make more than one—the President, as the great representative of the whole nation in its foreign relations, had assumed an attitude before the world; he had committed the nation upon the question; he asked not whether the measure was wise or unwise, spirited or rash; but the nation was committed; and now, what had Congress done? This House had—he would not say dodged the question—but the committee, who were its appropriate organ, had never made any report upon it, until within three days of the termination of the session. The world, therefore, did not and could not know what were the sentiments of the House.

In another place, (he would not name the Senate, lest he should be called to order,) but in another place, in another body, a committee had been raised, and that committee had done its duty faithfully: they had reported in a few weeks after the subject had been committed to them. They had submitted a very full and able statement of the case, and one which went to sustain the President in all the facts as he had stated them, and in the opinion he had expressed that the nation had suffered, and were suffering wrong, from a foreign Power, but declaring that it was not expedient for Congress to do that specific thing which the President had recommended as the remedy for the wrong, viz: the authorizing of reprisals. The resolution thus reported by the committee had been debated in a certain place that Mr. A. should not speak of, and the discussion had ended in the unanimous declaration by the body that—what? not that they would not adopt the specific remedy proposed by the President, but that it was not expedient to do any thing at all in the existing posture of affairs.

The message of the President had gone to France; the report of the committee had gone to France; the debates upon it had gone to France; and the resolution with which the report and the debate concluded, a resolution not of the committee merely, but of the body itself, had gone to France likewise. Under this state of things, how would the American nation, in its representative magistracy, appear before the nations of the world; and especially before that nation from whom we were claiming justice? One branch of the Government declaring that he believed we possess a remedy which we can apply, and another branch declaring that they will not support him in applying it; or in any other manner as a substitute for it. These two facts, put together, formed the foundation of all that anxiety which he had felt and expressed, and which had induced all his endeavors, hitherto fruitless, to drag that House, if possible, to do something upon the subject. From the 20th of January, six days after the resolution of the Senate was adopted, he had called repeatedly, earnestly, he might almost say incessantly, for a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations, as the foundation for the deliberation and action of the House upon the subject. He had felt that, where the other body had thought proper to close their action upon this great interest, it was the duty of this House to commence theirs. The other body had passed a resolution merely negative, refusing, by implication, to sustain the President, and leaving unnoticed the great national interest at stake. Mr. ADAMS had believed this an omission which it was the appropriate function of this House to supply.

He did believe that it was due to this nation, to mankind, and to the admitted obligations of France, that this House should declare that, if it could not sustain the President in the course he had recommended, still that they would never consent that the rights of our countrymen stipulated by the treaty should be sacrificed, abandoned, or impaired, by any consent or acquiescence on our part. It was in reference to the effect upon Europe and upon France, of the combined action of the three departments of our Government, that he had been so solicitous for some action on the part of this body; a body which, of all others, ought to express the feelings, the moral sensibilities, of the nation. What he wanted to prevent was an injurious impression going abroad from the conflicting views of the other two branches of the Government.

Whether this explanation would be satisfactory to the worthy gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GILMER,] or the able and talented gentleman from Philadelphia, [Mr. BIRNEY,] he did not know. He gave it to the House and to the world, as the cause of the great anxiety he had shown heretofore. He gave it as the reason, satisfactory to his own mind, of all the solicitude he had so long and so often manifested on this question. He gave it as the object to be secured, the end to be obtained, by the first of his three resolutions, and as the motive of his aversion to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, and to any and every resolution merely declaratory that this House will do nothing.

He wished that the action of that House might manifest not only the susceptibility, but the spirit of the nation: for if there had been an excess of spirit in the presidential communication, Mr. A. was sure the electricity minus in the other branch of the Legislature had been quite sufficient to counteract it. They had had upon that floor, on the present occasion, a perpetual series of homilies against the manifold evils of war; but they came from those who would prefer any thing to war. As long ago as the war of Troy, one of the greatest chieftains who figured in that celebrated contest had said, in a speech to the assembled chiefs, his associates, “Curst is the man, and void of law and right,

Unworthy property, unworthy light,
Unfit for public rule, or private care,
That wretch, that monster, who delights in war.”

These were the sentiments of a valiant and venerable warrior, delivered twelve hundred years before the religion of Christ had taught us that good will to man is the first law of our nature, and that peace on earth is among the most imperious of our duties.

Mr. A. inquired whether all they had heard during the present debate in that House, or that which met their ears, wafted on all the wings of the wind, from the public journals, contained more than these four lines from the Iliad? They came from one of the most valiant of all the heroes who had battled before the walls of Troy, in a quarrel which Mr. A. would say nothing about but this, that it was not so just or so important in its nature as that which now occupied the attention of that House. About the abstract question of the evil of war, none entertained any doubt. Habes contentem reum. None disputed that war was a great evil; and if it were not too commonplace, he might add something, also, upon that subject. But give him leave to say that all the declamation of gentlemen against war was wholly irrelevant, unless they included, in their arguments against it, the cause of the war. When John Hampden spent £20,000 of his own money, and brought on one of the most bloody civil wars in history, what was it for? Because he would not pay twenty shillings of ship-money unlawfully demanded of him. It was said, at that day, "what a monstrous man that Hampden is! he is involving his country in all the horrors of a civil war to escape from the payment of 20 shillings!" So in '76, when this country, with a population of not one-fifth of its present amount, rushed into a war—not a foreign but a civil war; not against a nation of strangers, but against the mother country, and against thousands, too, of its own citizens; what had been the tory argument at that day? "What! will you incur all this blood and slaughter for a charge of 3d. a pound on tea?" But did that band who signed the Declaration of Independence admit the force of the argument? Did those men sit down and calculate that 3d. a pound on tea would not cost any one of them perhaps twenty shillings a year, and thereupon gravely conclude that they had better submit to so small a tax than go to war with the mightiest nation in the world, for 3d. a pound upon the price of tea? Such was the argument then; and such, in substance, is the argument now. For, what was the tax at that time, but the violation of rights secured by treaty—chartered rights? What were the charters of the colonies but treaties between the British Kings and their subjects in this hemisphere? What difference of principle is there between the obligation of the compact between a monarch and his people, and of a compact between the same monarch and another sovereign State; and if the people have not only the right, but are bound in duty to vindicate their right of property, even by war, against their own sovereign, are they not under the same obligation to maintain the same right, by holding a foreign King to the fulfilment of his covenant with them?

After two such examples, Mr. A. did not wish to come down to a later period in our history. But his colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. GORHAM] would remember that, at the commencement of our last war, there were some who said we were encountering a great risk for a very petty object; and the Legislature of his own dear native State had raised a committee to inquire how many American mariners had been impressed on board of British men of war. The committee, if he remembered right, had reported that, after the most diligent inquiry, they could not find that more than thirty-nine or forty had been thus seized upon; and the argument upon the report was, "will you go to war—unto all the expense and all the horrors of war—a war with Great Britain, too, for thirty-nine or forty sailors?" The argument was as good then as it was now. For himself, Mr. A. said he should make no professions of any kind; but he could say with great truth that there was not a man in that House who had a more profound abhorrence of war than he had. He was ready to do any thing to avoid it that was consistent with the national honor. For, notwithstanding the dissertations and nice distinctions which the House had heard, to prove that there was no such thing as national honor, he could subscribe to no such doctrine. He believed there was such a thing as the honor of this nation, and that whenever it was endangered it ought to be defended. Some gentlemen perhaps might retort upon him that he did not expect, in case war should be made, ever to enter the field in his own person. Perhaps not; very probably not; but he should ever be ready to do for the honor of his countrymen what he would do for his own. If he knew his own heart, he would not expose one of his countrymen to a danger which he should be unwilling to encounter in case of need himself, nor would he be accessory to the shedding of the first drop of their blood for a cause in which he would refuse to shed the last drop of his own.

The resolutions he had proposed were three. The first contained a declaration that our rights, as admitted and secured by France in the treaty of indemnity, ought in no event to be sacrificed, abandoned, or impaired, by the consent of the Government of the United States. He considered such a declaration as just and necessary. Mr. A. said he had had his fears for the result of the long deliberations of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the continual procrastination of their report. If the President should say that he had been deserted by the Legislature in his endeavors to support the rights of the nation, not only as to the specific measure he had recommended, but as to all other measures of any sort; and if the House should adopt the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that all further negotiation upon the subject is to be refused, he saw not what was to be the end of such a course of procedure.

The President had no power in his own arm; his power was derived only from the concurring arm of the people; and when one branch of the national representation declared that they did not approve of his measures, and the other branch delayed to declare what their opinion was, Mr. A. had a fearful misgiving that the interest itself might be sacrificed, abandoned, or impaired: an event which he should deem disgraceful to the honor of the nation, and faithless to the rights of our fellow-citizens, guaranteed to them by the first principles of the social compact. He felt, therefore, extremely solicitous that something like spirit should be shown by some part of the Government besides the President, and that the House should declare what their views were of the rights of the nation.

He had then added a second resolution, declaring to the President, on the part of the House, that, if he considered it consistent with the honor of the nation to resume negotiations with the French Government, he should do so. He wished to give some indication by the House of what was its desire on that subject. He wished to show to the world that there was no desire in that body to cut off negotiation unnecessarily; that they were disposed to adopt all proper and becoming measures to preserve peace, and not to do any act which might be construed into a justification of hostilities by the French nation.

The second resolution had, indeed, been suggested by a resolution of the contrary tenor, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Mr. A. said that he was not, however, tenacious in respect to its adoption by the House. If the resolution adverse to negotiation, presented by the Committee on Foreign Relations, should be withdrawn, and if the House should consider the occasion such that it was assuming too much for the House even to hint, to whisper, to the President what his course ought to be, let them forbear; the House would dispose of the resolution as they pleased.

Before he resumed his seat, he wished to say one or two words in reply to the idea which had prevailed among many, both in and out of the House, in respect to the measure of reprisals, which had been recommended by the President in his message. The feeling now professed on that subject had not always prevailed: the members of that House had not always been so extremely alarmed at the idea of authorizing reprisals against nations who had wronged us. He would refer gentlemen to the year 1794, when our commerce was suffering depredation from the cruisers of Great Britain, and when the delivery of the Western posts, stipulated by treaty, had not been performed. The great reason openly given for withholding the delivery of those posts was, the weakness of this nation: we were not in a condition to compel the surrender. We were then under the articles of the old confederation. But after the organization of the present constitution, at the commencement of the French revolutionary war, Great Britain had issued orders in council, under which great depredations had been committed upon our commerce, and, on the 27th March, 1794, Mr. A. found upon the journals of the House of Representatives the following resolutions:

“Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for the sequestration of all the debts due from the citizens of the United States to the subjects of the King of Great Britain.

“Resolved, That provision ought, in like manner, to be made for securing the payment of all such debts into the treasury of the United States, there to be held as a pledge for the indemnification of such of the citizens of the said States as shall have suffered from the ships of war, privateers, or from any person or description of persons acting under the commission or authority of the British King, in contravention of the laws of nations, and in violation of the rights of neutrality.”

What was this but reprisals? The money was to be paid into the treasury of the United States, and held by us as a security for indemnification for outrages upon our rights of neutrality. The measure had been continued to be suspended in the House until the succeeding month of May. Whoever would look at the yeas and nays, would find that this measure of reprisals had been voted for by Madison and Macon. The House, indeed, had not passed the resolutions, but it had agreed to and did actually pass a non-importation law. Congress at that day was prepared to sanction an act more daring by far than would now be the authorizing of reprisals against the commerce of France. The non-importation law was not passed in the Senate. It was rejected by the casting vote of the Vice President. But why? Because on the 15th of April, 1794, President Washington had nominated Mr. Jay as envoy extraordinary on a special mission to Great Britain, and assigned the prospect of war as one reason for that appointment.

In the first volume of the Executive Journal of the Senate, page 150, under date of the 15th of April, 1794, is the following message:

“Gentlemen of the Senate:

“The communications which I have made to you during your present session, from the despatches of our minister in London, contain a serious aspect of our affairs with Great Britain. But as peace ought to be pursued with unremitted zeal, before the last resource, which has so often been the scourge of nations, and cannot fail to check the advanced prosperity of the United States, is contemplated; I have thought proper to nominate, and do hereby nominate, John Jay as envoy extraordinary of the United States to his Britannic Majesty.

“My confidence in our minister plenipotentiary in London continues undiminished. But a mission like this, while it corresponds with the solemnity of the occasion, will announce to the world a solicitude for a friendly adjustment of our complaints, and a reluctance to hostility. Going immediately from the United States, such an envoy will carry with him a full knowledge of the existing temper and sensibility of our country, and will thus be taught to vindicate our rights with firmness, and to cultivate peace with sincerity.

“G. WASHINGTON.”

This, Mr. A. said, was a formula which he wished to see adopted in all times of like difficulty. To vindicate our rights with firmness, and to cultivate peace with sincerity, was our duty now, as it had been that of our fathers in 1794. When this message of President Washington was sent to the Senate, the resolutions for sequestering British debts, and the non-importation bill, were measures pending in the House of Representatives, a majority of which had warmly favored him. They were superseded by the mission of Mr. Jay. The rights of the nation were vindicated, the peace of the nation was preserved, and an example was set of firmness and of moderation, successful in the result, and worthy of imitation in all cases of irritable altercation with foreign Powers. A declaration of determined purpose to maintain our rights, with an extended olive branch in the hand, appeared to him the appropriate attitude for the nation now to assume.

But if it was not the intention of the House, if they considered it improper, even in such an emergency as the present, to advise the resumption of negotiations with the French Government, he would readily abandon that resolution, as his object had been only to obtain from the House what he considered a far more significant expression of its opinion than a resolution to lay the whole subject upon the table. But if the House should reject the amendment proposed by his honorable friend from Virginia, [Mr. ALEXANDER] he would either accept the modification proposed by the honorable chairman of the committee, [Mr. CAMBRELENG], or suffer it to be put as his, and withdraw his own.

When Mr. A. had concluded,

Mr. HARDIN had hoped, he said, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs would have reported in sufficient time to have allowed every gentleman an opportunity of delivering his sentiments upon this subject. Late as it was, Mr. H. should not have said a word on the subject, but for the last war-speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.]

Mr. H. entered into an examination of the foundation of these claims under the treaty. They had arisen from spoliation made by Napoleon Bonaparte, who had always refused to make any indemnity. Both Louis XVIII and Charles X had also refused to enter into it; and it was only on the elevation of Louis Philippe to the throne of France that these twenty-five millions had been acknowledged. To this King we owed the treaty, and he had omitted nothing in his power to secure its passage. Mr. H. also contended that the French Chamber, as the popular branch, had the same right to reject a treaty involving an appropriation, as the House of Representatives in Congress had. Besides, the French had the power of making their own laws and their own constitution, and they had the right of putting their interpretation upon them. With these views, he thought it cowardly, he thought it dastardly, for this nation to threaten war. He could see no treachery, no backsliding, in the King or his ministers. That king was surrounded with difficulties, and had made himself responsible for injuries done twenty-five years ago. What should we go to war for? A paltry sum of five millions. A war would cost us in one year not less than ten or fifteen millions of dollars, and would sweep from the ocean at least fifty million of our commerce. And upon whom would the expense fall? Upon the hard-working, industrious farmer, almost exclusively. Besides, Mr. H. had no feeling for a French war. He remembered, when we had only two millions and a half of people; when we were overwhelmed with debt, and our little band of hardy patriots without arms or clothing, that France shed her blood and expended her treasure for us. Should we forget this? She stood by us when all the nations of the earth stood aloof from us.

Mr. GORHAM rose to reply to some remarks of Mr. ADAMS. He said the whole bent of that gentleman's resolutions and his speech began and ended in the position that war was inevitable with France. He denied that such was the feeling or the policy of Massachusetts. Mr. G. then proceeded to examine the grounds on which the treaty stood, how it was obtained, &c. He also went into a detail of the difference of sentiments entertained by him from those of other gentlemen who had addressed the House, particularly Mr. ARCHER and Mr. ADAMS.

Mr. CHILTON next obtained the floor. He also replied most particularly to the remarks of Mr. ADAMS. The position which that gentleman first took upon this floor upon this question excited the surprise of all, and particularly his friends. He had then accused another branch of the Legislature of dodging the question. He had subsequently, in an explanation, declared that he also wished this House to do the same thing. On the last occasion he had assured the country that there was no prospect of a war with France; that there was not a member on that floor who would vote for such a proposition. How were we to reconcile those various and conflicting opinions and sentiments of the gentleman with his present course? Mr. C. said the resolutions of Mr. ADAMS were infinitely weaker than he could approve, though he denounced his war speech. He disavowed any personal disrespect to that gentleman, in thus alluding to the inconsistencies of his course. To use a musical phrase, he had looked upon the gentleman heretofore as a sort of political pitch-pipe to his friends. But if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, how shall the horseman prepare himself for the battle? Hereafter he should follow a trumpeter with an instrument of a less uncertain sound.

Mr. ARCHER also thought the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] should be the last to give lectures on consistency. Allusions had been made to his fears and to his courage. If he had courage, he was sure he would not show it only, as he would not say whose was shown, in bravado and menace. He had said that he had full confidence in the justice of France. He still retained that opinion. Mr. A. continued further to defend his amendment.

Mr. HAWES told a story of a bird whose only cry was "fair play." Such was his cry on the present occasion, as he could not abide to see so many birds plucking one. He was well aware, however, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] needed no champion to enter the lists in his defence; for, as the roused lion shakes the dew drops from his mane, so could he shake off his antagonists at will. He marvelled what had brought down the ire of his two colleagues, [Messrs. HARDIN and CHILTON,] and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. ARCHER,] in their united strength, upon the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts. Was it because an American heart beat high in his bosom? Was it because he boldly stepped forward to sustain the honor of his country? Mr. H. said no man had been accustomed more highly to respect the French nation than himself. He, too, like his honorable colleague, [Mr. HARDIN,] remembered when with us the lily was accounted the fairest flower of the field. He, too, had paused with high-wrought feelings before the painting in the rotundo, where the warriors of veteran France and infant America were grouped together in the enjoyment of recent victory, the reward of their mutual prowess. But should the recollection of those things make us forgetful of right? Should they teach us to see our country trampled upon? His other colleague [Mr. CHILTON] had represented the gentleman from Massachusetts as ready at one time to be received with open arms by a party on that floor. By what party? He asked if there was already a French and an American party in that House? If so, it was high time the people of Kentucky knew it; and he should feel it his duty to go home and acquaint his constituents of the fact. They were accustomed only to rally under the flag of their country. Mr. H. said he rose only to say what he had said. He did not like to see the gentleman from Massachusetts, whose long career had been crowned with that brightest of all crowns, the suffrages of a free people for their highest station, exposed to a rifle here, a musket here, and a pop-gun there.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on Mr. ARCHER's amendment; it was rejected, as follows: Yeas 71, nays 143.

YEAS—Messrs. Heman Allen, Chilton Allan, Archer, Ashley, Barber, Barringer, Bates, Baylies, Bell, Binney, Campbell, Chambers, Chilton, Claiborne, William Clark, Clayton, Clowney, Corwin, Crockett, Davis, Davenport, Deberry, Dickson, Evans, Horace Everett, Felder, Gamble, Gilmer, Gordon, Gorham, Grayson, Grennell, Griffin, Hiland Hall, Hardin, Hazeltine, William Jackson, Ebenezer Jackson, Janes, King, Letcher, Lewis, Lincoln, Martindale, Marshall, McComas, Mercer, Milligan, Miner, Murphy, Phillips, Pickens, Pinckney, Potts, Ramsay, Reed, Rencher, Robertens, William B. Mr. CAMBRELENG then moved the following resolution (according to an intimation which he had before made) as an amendment to the first of those introduced by Mr. ADAMS:

MARCH 3, 1835.]

General Appropriation Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831, should be maintained, and its execution insisted on.

Mr. ADAMS said he was willing to adopt it. While he was up, he had a word to say on the remarks of his colleague, [Mr. GORHAM,] who had denounced his course as not being in accordance with the sentiments of Massachusetts. If such was the fact, he could but regret it. He had only to say it was in accordance with the dictates of his own heart.

Mr. GORHAM said there was no man in the United States for whom he had more sincere respect than for his honorable colleague. He had not made his remarks in a spirit of dictation. He was well aware that that gentleman possessed the right to maintain his own opinion; but he (Mr. G.) must be permitted also to retain the opinion he had already expressed.

Mr. S. JONES, of Georgia, then submitted the following, as an amendment to the above:

Resolved, That, with a solemn treaty, acknowledging the rights of our citizens, entered into under the usual formalities, and with a nation professing to be governed by that code which prescribes the obligation of such instruments, we have every right to expect that the same will be observed in good faith; and that, as this House is officially informed the law for executing said treaty is now under consideration in the French Legislature, it is inexpedient, for the present, to legislate on the subject.

Mr. S. JONES briefly advocated the amendment, and called for the yeas and nays; but they were not ordered.

The question was then taken, and the resolution rejected without a division.

Mr. ROBERTSON then offered the following, as an amendment:

Strike out from first resolution, words "resolved that," and insert:

"There is satisfactory evidence that the French Government desires that the appropriation for indemnity should be made in pursuance of the stipulations of the treaty of July 4, 1831, and reason to hope that the Chamber of Deputies will adopt that measure, and faithfully discharge the obligations of France to the United States."

Mr. GORHAM asked for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered. The amendment was then rejected.

The question then recurring on the substitute adopted by Mr. J. Q. ADAMS, as given above,

Mr. MANN, of New York, called for the yeas and nays.

They were ordered and taken, when the resolution was adopted unanimously, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, John Adams, Heman Allen, John J. Allen, William Allen, Anthony, Archer, Ashley, Banks, Barber, Barnitz, Barringer, Bates, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Beatty, Beaumont, Bell, Blair, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Briggs, Brown, Bull, Bunch, Burd, Burns, Cage, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carmichael, Carr, Casey, Chambers, Chaney, Chilton, Chinn, Claiborne, Samuel Clark, William Clark, Clayton, Clowney, Connor, Corwin, Coulter, Cramer, Crockett, Darlington, Amos Davis, Davenport, Day, Deberry, Denny, Dickson, Dickerson, Dickinson, Dunlap, Evans, Edward Everett, Felder, Ferris, Fillmore, Forester, Foster, Philo C. NAYS—none.

Mr. ADAMS then withdrew his other resolution; and Mr. CAMBRELENG also withdrew the first resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, its place being superseded by the one first adopted.

The following resolutions were then also unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the President's message as relates to commercial restrictions, or to reprisals on the commerce of France.

Resolved, That preparation ought to be made to meet any emergency growing out of our relations with France.

The joint resolution from the Senate, rescinding the joint rule which prohibits the transmission of bills to the President on the last day of the session, was then adopted, after an ineffectual attempt on the part of Mr. MASON to amend it, so as to rescind that which prohibits the transmission of bills from one House to the other on the same day.

On motion of Mr. POLK, several appropriation bills, returned from the Senate with amendments, were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; when, at 12 o'clock,

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 3.

By unanimous consent of the House, Messrs. CLAY, MOSES MASON, and WILDE, were permitted to record their votes in favor of Mr. ADAMS's resolution, as modified at the suggestion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, on the subject of the French treaty.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. POLK, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HUBBARD in the chair,) for the purpose of considering the amendments of the Senate to the several appropriation bills.

The committee first proceeded to consider the amendments made by the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1835.

The amendments increasing the appropriations for the contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress, and increasing the appropriation to the superintendent and watchmen of the northeast executive building, were concurred in.

The amendment providing that the salary and outfit for a minister to England should not be paid unless a minister should be appointed at the present session of Congress, or in the recess, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, was read.

H. OF R.]

General Appropriation Bill.

Mr. POLK said he did not rise to make a speech. His purpose was to move that the committee disagree to this amendment. The amendment was altogether unusual, and he believed wholly unnecessary. We should not presume that the President would not discharge his constitutional duty, and it was not necessary to preadmonish him in regard to it.

Mr. ADAMS, of Massachusetts, said he called the attention of the House to this subject when the bill was before it. He had, however, submitted no motion in regard to it. It had now become a matter of more importance that a minister should be sent to England. If our minister should be recalled from France, and our negotiations suspended, it was proper that we should have a minister in the neighborhood. This amendment ought not to be sanctioned. In the first place, it was an attempt at dictation to the President, which was inconsistent with the constitution. In the second place, it made the appointment of a minister dependent upon a special call of the Senate. He did not agree that the President had not the power, under the constitution, to appoint a minister in the recess.

The amendment was disagreed to: Yeas 51, nays 74.

The amendment making an appropriation in favor of John Randolph Clay and N. Niles, was amended by inserting the sum of $1,080, to be paid to Captain John Downes for presents to the natives of the Sandwich and Society Islands, and concurred in.

The amendments in favor of Samuel Slater, and for the purchase of iron chests for the safe-keeping of the records of the United States courts in the city of New York, were non-concurred in.

The amendment appropriating $77,381 98 for the completion of the warehouse at Baltimore, was amended, on the motion of Mr. POLK, by inserting $60,000, instead of the first sum; which was agreed to.

The amendment allowing to Valentine Geisey $802 87, was amended by substituting $862 81, and agreed to.

An amendment making an appropriation for certain improvements being read,

Mr. JARVIS moved to amend the amendment by making an appropriation for the erection of a Treasury building, to be constructed of granite.

Mr. CHINN suggested an amendment providing that the building should be constructed of freestone.

The two latter amendments were negatived, and the Senate's amendment concurred in.

Mr. WILDE moved to strike out the name of Persico, and insert that of Mr. Thorwald, an American artist, to be employed in decorating the Capitol.

Mr. WARD said if there were any works that commanded the admiration of the visitors of the Capitol more than others, they were those of Mr. Persico. Besides, there were provisions made already in this bill for American artists.

Mr. POLK appealed to the House not to engage in discussions about the merits of artists at the last day of the session, with so much business before them that must be acted on. He hoped the amendment would at once be rejected.

After a few words from Mr. MERCER, the amendment was negatived.

Mr. WILDE moved to strike out the name of Mr. Persico, and insert that of Mr. Greenough.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS said Mr. Greenough was already engaged in a great work.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. HAMER then moved to strike out the whole paragraph; which was agreed to.

Mr. JARVIS's amendment was negatived, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in without a division.

Mr. POLK moved that the House non-concur in the amendment of the Senate providing $250 for recording the opinions of the judges of the Supreme Court. The clerk already received sufficient.

Mr. HARDIN briefly supported it, and it was agreed to.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, proposed an item of $7,400 for the system of military tactics for the army of the United States.

Mr. MANN, of New York, understood this was for paying General Scott for translating and compiling this work, which he had done without the authority of any resolution of Congress.

Mr. WARD was understood to say that a resolution on the subject had been adopted.

Mr. MANN had no idea of paying officers twice over. General Scott now received six thousand eight hundred and some odd dollars annually, and the country was entitled to his whole services. It was a case similar to that of Commodore Hull, which the House had rejected.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, explained the facts of the case. A resolution had been adopted, authorizing the Secretary of War to employ a person to compile a system of military tactics for the army of the United States. He had done so. The work had been approved of and adopted by the Military Committee of that House. A bookseller had offered General Scott more than was now asked. Mr. M. denied that the case of Commodore Hull was analogous to this, because the services for which that officer claimed extra compensation were within the line of his duty.

Messrs. PATTON, MERCER, ARCHER, and VANCE, further supported the amendment, and Mr. MANN, of New York, opposed it.

Mr. FERRIS remarked that the brief space allowed the House to finish the much important business before them would prevent him from extending his remarks beyond what a sense of duty to a gallant and meritorious officer, and the obligations of justice, would seem to require. He (Mr. F.) was as much opposed as any person could be to paying public agents in any capacity, civil or military, extra compensation for service performed in the line of their duty. But if they are required to perform services of a different description, of an extraordinary character, requiring much labor, research, and talents of a high order, in their performance, he would not refuse his assent to make compensation to the officer commensurate with the services rendered.

The system of tactics prepared by General Scott, under the direction of the Secretary of War, and with the sanction of a resolution of Congress, was necessary, in order that our system of military discipline should receive and have incorporated with it those improvements which the protracted wars of Europe have brought into use, and whose utility and efficiency have been tested by experience. It is found by experience that, in many cases, a line of men three deep is more efficient than a line of men two deep. If so, it would be unwise in us not to adopt this improvement in such cases; but to do so requires an entire change in our system, and in all the evolutions in which this change forms a part. It may also be proper to observe that the paces or steps necessary in the performance of military manoeuvres differ according to the military system of tactics in use in different countries, both as to time and distance. It must be obvious, therefore, that, in the adoption of improvements into our system of discipline, it becomes necessary to make a compound calculation of the number of paces and time of making them required by our system to perform the manoeuvre proposed to be adopted from any foreign system. Such a work cannot be called a mere compilation or translation; and, if not entirely original, requires new matter, much intense study, and many laborious calculations. The talents and learning in military matters required for a work of this description are of no ordinary kind, and require a union of practical skill, theory, and knowledge of the military tactics of the various civilized nations, and of military history, rarely found in the same individual; and it is but an act of pure justice to say of the gentleman who has prepared this work, that they are found in him. If these matters are duly considered, it will be found that the compensation proposed is reasonable, and it would be unfair to reduce it to the pay allowed to the writers of newspaper paragraphs, translators, or mere compilers of the writings of others. Can any one of us doubt of the utility, or even necessity, of such a work, to enable us to keep pace with the improvements in tactics adopted in the European armies? It is the military discipline of the armies of civilized nations, based on a scientific system of tactics, by which masses of men are moved with uniformity and celerity under the direction of a man, that gives them superiority over barbarians, and enables them to vanquish many times their numbers, and not superior physical force or bravery; and, when all other things are equal, that military force which has the best discipline and tactics may be regarded as the most powerful and efficient. With these views and impressions, I shall support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

General Appropriation Bill.

Mr. BEALE proposed to insert 2,500 dollars, instead of 7,400.

Mr. GRENELL said it was to him a clear case of contract between the Government and General Scott, and the only question was, whether the work was worth the money.

Mr. BEALE's amendment was negatived without a division.

The amendment of Mr. MASON was also negatived: Yeas 57, nays 76.

The amendment appropriating 1,380 dollars for the purchase (for the use of the public land offices) of copies of Gales & Seaton's documents in relation to the public lands, was taken up.

Mr. LYTLER moved to amend the amendment by appropriating 2,000 dollars for the construction of one or more fountains in the public grounds adjacent to the Capitol; which was negatived.

The amendment of the Senate was not concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate, appropriating $40,000 for Gales & Seaton's State Papers, for the year 1835, was read.

Mr. POLK referred to the large appropriations hitherto made for this work. A majority of the Committee of Ways and Means were opposed to the amendment.

Mr. PLUMMER opposed the amendment. Every time an appropriation was made to this object, it was considered authority for continuing the work up to the period at which the appropriation was made. He was disposed to limit these appropriations, and stop the future publication of the work, so far as the House was concerned.

Mr. MANNING said that, if a contract had been entered into in this case, it ought to be complied with. He asked the Chair whether there existed a contract in relation to this publication.

Mr. HARDIN said, if the books were published, he would be willing to pay for them. If not, he, for one, was disposed to put a stop to this useless waste of the public money. He had received the last and present year a number of the copies of this work. They probably cost the Government three or four dollars per volume, and they were not worth twelve and a half cents per volume; they would not pay their carriage to Wheeling. It was only intended to give a job to the printers of this city, and it was high time that a stop should be put to it.

[The law authorizing the publication of these documents was then read.]

Mr. H. said this appropriation was for the present year. He repeated that the work was worthless. The small volumes were not worth more than six and a quarter cents, and the larger size not twelve and a half cents per volume.

Mr. BARRINGER explained the manner in which the work was compiled and executed. He was surprised that any gentleman should oppose the amendment, under the circumstances of the case.

Mr. HAMER said he did not understand this contract. It seemed that 750 copies were to be published, but as to the number or size of the volumes no provision was made. There had been already eight or nine volumes published, and there was no telling where it would end. It might be continued for a hundred years. He was disposed to pay for what had been printed; but he would not go further.

The amendment was then concurred in: Yeas 76, nays 62.

The amendment making a further appropriation of $10,800 for completing the printing of the land documents ordered by the Senate, was read. It was opposed by Messrs. POLK, PLUMMER, and VINTON, and supported by Messrs. GARLAND and E. WHITTESEY.

Mr. E. EVERETT moved to amend the amendment by directing the manner in which the foregoing work should be distributed; which was agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then negatived: Yeas 59, nays, 61.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON moved to amend the bill by appropriating $2,600, for the publication of the new system of discipline and tactics for the use of the army of the United States.

Mr. LETCHER moved to amend the amendment by appropriating to General Winfield Scott $7,500, for compiling and superintending the publication of the foregoing work.

Mr. WILLIAMS proposed 5,000 dollars; which was agreed to: Yeas 76, nays 63.

Mr. HAWES moved a proviso, that the sum to be paid to General Scott should be in full of allowances on this account; which was negatived.

The amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, was then agreed to, as amended.

Mr. SMITH moved to strike out the several items of the Senate's amendment regarding appropriations for the West Point Academy.

Mr. S. said he did not rise to detain the progress of this bill more than a few minutes. He could not, however, forbear to remark that the manner and circumstances in which this proposition has been brought before this committee clearly indicate something new in the history and condition of the institution at West Point. It has been usual, Mr. Chairman, and I believe invariably the practice, for the items now to be passed upon to originate in this House, instead of in the Senate. In no instance, (said Mr. S.) it is believed, have they ever been brought before this House, until now, in the shape of amendments tacked upon the general appropriation bill of the House by the Senate.

[Mr. WATKINS said he would explain the reason of this course, if Mr. S. would permit.]

Mr. SMITH said he well understood the reasons for this novel procedure. And the committee well understand the why and wherefore the Senate has thus brought these proposed appropriations before the House, but he would not now go into their reasons. He would, however, observe that it cannot but appear extraordinary that appropriations of this magnitude, amounting, as he believed, to more than $120,000, should be asked for the support of the Academy at West Point, while there is lying upon the table of the Speaker a report of a committee of the House, wholly adverse to the institution. That report, sir, has come from a committee of twenty-four members, and is the result of laborious investigation. And the inutilty and unprofitableness of the institution is so fully demonstrated by that report, that the friends of the academy upon this floor have not dared to have it printed, and the contents of it brought home to the knowledge of the members of this House and of the public. Repeated efforts have been made to have that report printed: but the friends of the institution have as frequently defeated it. The report, sir, upon the Speaker's table, demonstrates that only about two in five of those who enter the institution remain in it to graduate—and that only about two in five of those who graduate, or about one in twelve of those who enter the institution, actually enter the public service at whose expense they are educated. The report also demonstrates that such are the influences prevailing at the institution, that more dismissals from it take place annually than at all the other institutions of a similar high grade in the country. The discipline of the institution has proved insufficient to counteract these influences. A portion of the cadets have been within three or four years past publicly censured by the head of the War Department, and, to succeed in the government of the institution, a tavern stand in the vicinity of it was necessarily bought up a few years since, at an expense of $10,000 to the people. But, said Mr. S., the time of the committee will not admit of my going more into the detail of the developments contained in the report of the select committee, which has been thus far suppressed. I will, however, make a motion, and leave every gentleman to take upon himself the responsibility of voting it down, if he chooses; and I presume it may be voted down. I will submit a motion, said Mr. S., that the committee non-concur with each of the amendments of the Senate making appropriations for the academy.

H. OF R.]

General Appropriation Bill.

Mr. HAWES moved to amend the amendments proposed by the Senate, by adding an appropriation for printing 5,000 copies of the report of the select committee on the Military Academy, to which Mr. SMITH had alluded; which motion was agreed to without opposition.

Whereupon Mr. SMITH withdrew his motion to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate.

The amendment of the Senate, appropriating 650,000 acres of land for the satisfaction of military bounty land warrants, was read.

It was advocated by Messrs. MCKINLEY, CHINN, HARDIN, JOHN Y. MASON, and ALLEN of Virginia, and opposed by Messrs. PARKER, MILLER, VINTON, and BURD; when the amendment was agreed to: Yeas 83, nays 48.

The amendment making an appropriation of lands to satisfy certain confirmed land claims in the State of Missouri, was read.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, opposed the amendment, on the ground that the claims embraced in the report of the commissioners ought not to be confirmed. It would be giving away several hundred thousand acres of land, and open a door for the same disposition of some two millions of acres more. The House knew nothing about the nature of the claims; the reports had not been printed; they had not taken the usual course, through Secretary of the Treasury, and by him examined, and his opinion as to their validity reported to Congress. The grossest frauds had been practised in granting the lands; the Governors who made the grants had violated their oaths. All these facts he (Mr. J.) could establish, if the time of the House would permit him to do so.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Missouri, expressed his astonishment at the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, which he (Mr. A.) pronounced erroneous from beginning to end. It had not been usual, as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, for the Secretary of the Treasury to examine reports of commissioners in such cases, and accompany the same with his opinion, as to the validity of the claims, to Congress. Mr. A. called upon gentlemen to point out a single instance where a report of the kind had been accompanied by any such remarks. The Secretary of the Treasury had been merely the channel of communication, without a word further than that he had received and transmitted the document. The assertion that the claims embraced in the report have been rejected by three or four different boards of commissioners is equally untrue. Not one of them has been rejected by more than one board of commissioners, and then that rejection was in a great degree the result of a want of knowledge on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury (who gave instructions to the first board of commissioners appointed to examine and adjust those claims) as to the laws, usages, and customs, of the Spanish Government applicable to them.

The statement of the member from Tennessee is equally erroneous as respects the printing of the report. It will be remembered that, at the suggestion of that gentleman, after the failure of the bill of the last session confirmatory of the commissioners' report, the report was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instructions to examine the claims, and report his opinion thereon to this House, at the commencement of the present session. At the same time the printing of the report was ordered. Mr. A. received a printed copy in August, and he supposed a copy had been forwarded to every member of Congress. Mr. A. had taken up the report, and carefully examined every claim embraced in it, referring, as he proceeded, to the laws of the United States, the laws, usages, and customs, of the Spanish Government, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States applicable to private land claims in Upper Louisiana, (now Missouri,) and he did not hesitate to give it as his decided opinion, that every claim contained in the report ought to be confirmed. Perhaps some few cases, under the strict letter of the law, might be excluded; but in equity they would no doubt be considered valid. Any further delay in confirming the whole report would be adding injury to the already injured claimants, who had been transferred from their former Government to that of the United States, without their consent, or without their previous knowledge of the transfer, with a solemn pledge on the part of the United States to protect them as citizens in their persons and property. This pledge had not, as yet, been redeemed. The rights of those citizens are yet withheld, and shamefully withheld.

Mr. A. said he had lived long among the original inhabitants of Upper Louisiana. He knew them well, and he believed no man knew a more honorable, upright, and better disposed people. He had, too, the honor of a personal acquaintance with the ex-governor Lousous, who the gentleman from Tennessee has thought proper to charge with malfeasance in office. Mr. A. could inform the gentleman from Tennessee that Governor Lousous's character never had been impeached, and is unimpeachable. As a man of honor, as a virtuous and amiable officer, he occupied high ground in Upper Louisiana, and is still remembered with affection.

Mr. A. repeated that the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee was erroneous in all its parts, and intended to prejudice the rights of a meritorious class of claimants. He hoped the course would not be sustained by the House.

Indian Annuities—General Appropriation Bill.

[H. or R.]

Mr. POLK moved the previous question; which prevailed, and cut off the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. MANN (of New York) were in favor of postponing the further consideration of the report of the commissioners until the next session. They had not investigated the claims embraced in it; and Mr. PLUMMER ardently advocated the amendment; Mr. HAMER also speaking on the same side.

The question was then put on concurring with the Senate in their disagreement to the amendment, and it was carried: so the amendment relating to the confirming land claims in Missouri was not agreed to.

The amendment in relation to the compensation of officers of the customs, was read.

Mr. VANCE opposed the amendment, and it was supported by Messrs. SUTHERLAND, PHILLIPS, and PINCKNEY; when it was concurred in.

Mr. MCKINLEY moved an amendment making an additional appropriation for the pay of the naval officers, in pursuance of the late act of Congress; which was agreed to.

Various amendments were concurred in without opposition.

The bill was then laid aside.

INDIAN ANNUITIES BILL.

The committee next took up the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for Indian annuities, and other similar objects, for the year 1835.

The amendment in relation to patents for lands reserved was non-concurred in.

Mr. POLK gave a brief explanation of the appropriation of $1,032,000 provided for under the treaty of Chicago, with various Indian tribes, in 1832. The Committee of Ways and Means had given the subject a most rigid examination.

Mr. LOVE said he had given this subject a most rigid examination also; and he was well convinced that, if the House was in possession of all the facts they would never adopt it. He was well convinced that frauds existed, not on the part of persons in Washington, which should induce its rejection. The Indians had, to say the least of it, made a good bargain, and they might wait another year. He would not vote for so large an appropriation as a million and thirty odd thousand dollars, brought forward for the first time on the last day of the session. Mr. L. then moved to non-concur with so much of the Senate's amendment as provided for the removal of the Indians beyond the Mississippi.

Mr. POLK again explained, by making a reference to the various treaties. The Committee of Ways and Means had taken up each item seriatim, and compared it with the provisions of the treaties. He was himself indisposed to recommend so large a sum; but, after a most careful examination, he was convinced the sum was proper.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. MCKINLEY moved an additional item of $810 for a Mrs. Mitchell, for teaching Indians. Agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The House then took up the fortification bill, and the question being on concurring with an amendment made in committee, proposing the appropriation of three millions of dollars, to be expended, in whole or in part, under the direction of the President of the United States, in increasing the military and naval service, including ordnance, fortifications, and increase of the navy, if, in his opinion, the state of the country shall require it,

Mr. HESTER demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and being taken, resulted as follows: Yeas 107, nays 75.

LIGHTHOUSE BILL.

The committee then took up the bill making appropriations for lighthouses, lightboats, buoys, &c., for the year 1835.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved to concur in all the amendments of the Senate. Agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY moved an amendment for the improvement of the harbor of St. Louis, $20,000; but subsequently withdrew it, in consequence of a bill containing the same provision being before the Senate.

On motion of Mr. POLK, the committee then rose, and the bills and amendments were severally reported to the House.

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The general appropriation bill was then taken up.

Mr. POLK moved to concur with the Committee of the Whole in the amendments.

Objection being made, the amendments were taken up seriatim.

The amendment of the Senate, in relation to the appropriation for the salary of a minister to Great Britain, was read.

Mr. WILDE asked for the yeas and nays on this amendment; which were ordered.

Mr. EVANS moved to amend the amendment of the Senate, so as to provide that the appropriation should not be applied unless a minister should be first appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; which was disagreed to.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS said this amendment proposed to introduce a new principle. The President had heretofore uniformly appointed foreign ministers of all grades, when he deemed such appointments necessary. This was a most important and necessary power reserved to him under the constitution. The amendment was an assumption, on the part of the Senate, that a minister should not be appointed without the consent of that body. This, if adopted, would be one of the most pernicious alterations which the constitution could endure. It was one among other instances of an attempt to alter the constitution in an appropriation bill. If this principle should be adopted, we should have other amendments of the constitution introduced in a similar way, and the President might be compelled, in consequence, to veto the general appropriation bill. It was incumbent upon the House to prevent any encroachments of the Executive upon the prerogatives of the Senate. In like manner, the House was bound to resist the encroachments of the Senate upon the constitutional powers of the Executive. It was also the province of the Senate to check and control the action of this House, which was quite as likely as the other branch, he would not say now, but in other times, to infringe upon the just rights of the Executive. The constitution provided three powers, who were to co-operate together in the management of the public affairs. They formed checks upon each other, and were so constituted that when one of the three attempted to transcend its constitutional sphere, the other two would interfere to prevent it.

In conclusion, Mr. A. said that the amendment of the Senate proposed to introduce a principle which was contrary to the practice of the Government from its commencement. Every President, from Washington down, had pursued a different practice from that proposed in the amendment. It was true, the Senate did not assume directly to declare that a minister should not be appointed by the President, unless previously confirmed by that body; but the means of such appointment were withheld, and the Senate had determined not to pay a minister unless appointed according to the terms of their proviso. He hoped the House would disagree to the amendment of the Senate.

H. OF R.]

Indian Annuities—Fortification Bill.

[MARCH 3, 1835.]

Mr. BARRINGER said he was opposed to the amendment of the Senate, and should vote against it. He believed the President had the power of appointment during a recess, where a vacancy occurred in that recess, and he held that it made little difference whether he were a chargé or a minister. The President might equally take upon himself to increase the pay, or to appoint a minister plenipotentiary instead of a chargé, or vice versa, during the recess. Mr. B. did not concur with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] in his reasoning, although he said he should concur with him in the vote he intended to give. He (Mr. B.) denied the right of the President of the United States, upon former practice or precedent, to appoint a minister during the recess, when the vacancy originated, or existed during the session of the Senate, and the President might have nominated. He was aware that it was a contested question, as long ago as under the first administration of this Government. But one practice had been generally recognised, that of consulting with the Senate whether they would agree to institute diplomatic relations with any country. It was so during the administrations of Washington and the elder Adams, even down to the time of Mr. Jefferson. The President never presumed, until after the administration of the last, to open diplomatic relations with a country without first advising with the Senate. Mr. B. said he should vote for the appropriation. The question was taken by yeas and nays, and resulted as follows: Yeas 114, nays 48.

So the House concurred with the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, and disagreed to the Senate's amendment.

Mr. JARVIS renewed his amendments, offered in committee, embracing appropriations for the Capitol, the President's house, and the Departments. Agreed to.

On the Senate's amendment appropriating $40,000 for preparing, printing, and binding, public documents, under the act of 1832, a motion was made to disagree; and Mr. HAWES demanded tellers, and the amendment was disagreed to: Ayes 58, noes 81.

Some conversation arose on the Senate's amendment, appropriating the sum of $10,800 for printing and binding the documents relating to the public lands, and the accompanying maps, by the printer to the Senate.

Mr. PLUMMER, Mr. EVANS, and Mr. PINCKNEY, spoke briefly in support of it, and Mr. PARKS in opposition.

The amendment was agreed to without a division.

Mr. PARKER asked for the yeas and nays on the Senate's amendment granting 650,000 acres of land for the satisfaction of military bounty land warrants; but they were not ordered: Yeas 23, nays 115—not one fifth.

The question on the adoption of the amendment was taken by tellers, and decided in the affirmative: Ayes 87, noes 56.

The amendment relative to the Missouri land claims having been read,

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON renewed an amendment he had offered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON hoped the House would not agree to the original amendment, and that the claims should be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ASHLEY advocated the justice of these claims. He believed there were not more than three or four that would not obtain a favorable decision in the Supreme Court. They had been before the Secretary of the Treasury ever since last June, and he had refused to adjudicate upon them. He denied that those claims were founded on fraud.

Mr. MANN, of New York, was disposed to place confidence in the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, [Mr. CAVE JOHNSON,] and, in the absence of more direct information on the subject, he should vote against the amendment.

Mr. PLUMMER hoped the House would not give the amendment the go-by, for it was a proposition founded on justice, and ought to be adopted.

Mr. HAMER thought these claims should be confirmed.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON again spoke in opposition to the amendment. The claims required more investigation than it was possible for the Secretary of the Treasury to give them. He knew the grossest frauds and perjury would be found to exist in relation to a number of these claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS said it was impossible to go into a legal adjudication of claims at that late hour, and the better way would be to let the subject lie over to another Congress.

Mr. ASHLEY again advocated the claims, and defended the character of the claimants.

Mr. WILLIAMS again expressed a hope that the subject should be left to a future session.

Mr. POLK demanded the previous question, and explained that he did so from a wish to save the bill, if possible.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question was then put, and the amendment of the Senate was disagreed to without a division.

The amendment in relation to the pay of custom-house officers was concurred in: Yeas 81, nays 49.

The amendment making an appropriation for printing 5,000 copies of the report of the select committee on the West Point Academy was agreed to.

INDIAN ANNUITIES BILL.

The House next proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the committee to the bill making appropriations for Indian annuities, &c., for 1835.

The amendments made in committee to the Senate's amendments were concurred in.

A portion of the amendments of the Senate were concurred in, and others were disagreed to.

The amendment of the Senate appropriating one million and thirty-two thousand dollars for carrying into effect certain Indian treaties, made at Chicago, in September, 1832, was read.

This item was opposed by Messrs. LOVE, VINTON, and H. EVERETT; and supported by Messrs. POLK, BEARDSLEY, and GILMER.

Mr. STEWART moved the previous question; which was seconded and agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate was then concurred in: Yeas 93, nays not counted.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The bill making appropriations for certain fortifications already commenced, was taken up.

A portion of the amendments adopted in the committee to the Senate's amendments were concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate appropriating $75,000 for the repair of the fortifications in Boston harbor was read.

The question being on the amendment to this item, adopted in committee, appropriating $3,000,000, to be expended by the President, in the recess of Congress, if he should deem it expedient, for the military and naval service, including fortifications, ordnance, &c.

Mr. HIESTER demanded the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Quincy Adams, J. Adams, J. J. Allen, William Allen, Beale, Bean, Beardsley, Beaumont, Bockee, Brown, Bull, Bunch, Bynum, Cage, Cambreleng, Carmichael, Casey, Chaney, Samuel

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then concurred in.

The bill making appropriations for light-boats, buoys, monuments, &c., was taken up.

The amendments of the Senate (which had been agreed to in committee) were concurred in.

THANKS TO THE SPEAKER.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY submitted the following resolution, which was unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to the honorable JOHN BELL, for the able, impartial, and dignified manner in which he has presided over its deliberations, and performed the arduous and important duties of the Chair.

BRANCHES OF THE MINT.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPEAKER in the chair,) on various bills from the Senate, &c.

The first bill considered was, "an act to establish branches of the mint of the United States."

Mr. C. P. WHITE moved an amendment establishing a branch at the city of New York.

Mr. McKINLEY said he was favorably disposed towards the amendment, but it was evident it could not be sanctioned by the Senate at this late hour.

Mr. CAMBRELENG advocated the amendment.

The amendment was lost, and the bill was laid aside.

The committee next took up and considered the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; which was laid aside.

JUDICIAL CIRCUITS.

The committee then took up the bill entitled an act supplementary to the act entitled an act to amend the judicial system of the United States.

[The provisions of this bill, are these: It provides for consolidating the circuit composed of New Jersey and Pennsylvania with that composed of Delaware and Maryland, and requiring Judge Baldwin to hold the circuit courts in the Delaware and Maryland circuit, so as to obviate the necessity of appointing a judge of the Supreme Court in that circuit, and thereby to extend the circuit system to the Western States.]

Mr. HARDIN proposed an amendment to the bill, the substance of which he stated. Instead of eight circuit judges, he proposed nine. If the House would take a review of the United States, it would be evident to every one that eight judges were too few. The Supreme Court required sixty days, besides what the States of the new proposed circuit would require. The bill before the House would require above forty weeks of the undivided attention of the judge of the new circuit—more labor than any man could well perform. Besides, there was a great propriety in making the number of judges to be an odd number, similar to committees of the House, because, if they were equally divided, no adjudication could be made. Mr. H. further explained the provisions of his amendment as to the regulation of the new circuits.

Mr. ROBERTSON opposed the amendment. A similar proposition was made to that House some years ago, which was debated for three weeks, and defeated, as he feared the present bill would be.

Mr. GARLAND said, if the amendment were adopted, the bill would be defeated, as a similar one had been six or seven years ago. That bill passed the Senate, and when it came into the House was defeated by a similar amendment to the present. He urged upon the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN], if he was favorable to the bill, to withdraw his amendment at once.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, also opposed the amendment on the same ground, and called upon the committee to take the question upon it at once.

Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland, expressed his approbation of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. It has been offered at his instance, by the Committee on the Judiciary, and had one good ingredient at least: it was calculated to accommodate the new States, without depriving one of the old thirteen of a right enjoyed since the organization of the Government. With this fact full before him, he could not feel that the two gentlemen from Louisiana displayed their accustomed liberality in urging, as they did, the passage of the bill without amendment. New Orleans doubtless needed a circuit court. From the character of the causes cognizable by the federal Judiciary, that large commercial city ought to have the boon this bill proposed to grant. This was conceded, and the zeal of the gentleman from Louisiana commended while it was displayed in behalf of that feature of this bill which secured to their constituents that which they had a right to demand, and could not but feel they were unjust towards the citizens of Maryland. If New Orleans had strong claims to the full benefit of all the courts organized to enforce the laws of the Union, surely Baltimore, one of the first commercial cities of the United States, will be cruelly outraged by the passage of this bill without amendment.

The bill, as it came from the Senate, was an act of monstrous injustice to Maryland; and that any representative of that State could stand silently by and witness this sacrifice of the rights of his constituents, was cause to him of great surprise. With what propriety could the fourth circuit be abolished? It appeared from statements furnished to the Judiciary Committee by the clerks of the several circuit courts, that in the year 1833 the circuit court was in session in Maryland eighty-four days, in Delaware six days. From the same statement we learn that similar courts sit on an average in the Virginia circuit forty-two days, and in the Georgia circuit thirty-two days, annually. There is, then, more business to transact in the 4th circuit than there is in the 5th and 6th circuits united; if either of the Atlantic circuits were, therefore, to be abolished, it would be much more reasonable to blend that of South Carolina and Georgia with Virginia and North Carolina, than to make the unnatural combination which this bill proposes. If the venerable and venerated Chief Justice was required to hold the courts of Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina, he would be on the circuit bench 132 days, while Judge Wayne would be on the bench only 32 days in the year. The mere statement of these facts must carry conviction to the mind of every man that the true object of this bill did not appear on its face. In fact, if members would engage seriously and solely in the good work of extending the benefits of the judiciary system to the whole Union, and not in the unholly work of destroying, by indirect means, an estimable citizen, they would conclude as he had done, that Maryland needed more a separate circuit court than any State south or west of Pennsylvania, except the State of Louisiana. The States in the interior cannot long furnish many causes for the employment of the federal Judiciary. The cases now pending before State courts, in the Western States, will be found to have originated chiefly from the fact that this Government is a large landholder. Trespasses committed on the national domain, and suits instituted to enforce contracts growing out of the sale of the public lands, will constitute, doubtless, four fifths of the cases which the judges will be called on to decide in the circuit courts the bill proposes to establish in Illinois, Indiana, and Missouri. The time is rapidly approaching when such cases can no longer arise, and then the judgeships now about to be created for the benefit of these States will become mere sinecures. How different must be the condition of things in Maryland. Baltimore is a port of entry at which is collected more revenue than at all the ports of the four Southern Atlantic States. To collect this revenue, the federal courts are needed, and as its amount will increase with the rapidly augmenting business of that city, the labors of these judges will also accumulate. The maritime jurisdiction of the circuit courts, too, will afford laborious employment to judges in Baltimore, and, (through which city the citizens residing in Virginia, west of the Blue Ridge, and in Pennsylvania, on many of the tributary streams of the Susquehanna, carry on commerce with all the world,) while in the interior States named, few causes, if any, could arise under this branch of the jurisdiction of the federal courts.

Mr. T. said it was too obvious to require illustration, that the object of this bill did not appear on its face, and had not been avowed by those with whom it originated. This he would show more fully than he had attempted, when it came up for consideration in the House, when he proposed to make a few brief comments on the facts and statements with which he had now troubled the committee.

[A message was here received from the Senate, announcing that that body insisted upon their amendments to the general appropriation bill, and had appointed a committee of conference.]

Mr. POLK moved that the House insist, and that a committee of conference be appointed on the part of that House, to meet the committee of the Senate, and that the number be three. Agreed to.

The committee appointed were Mr. POLK, Mr. E. EVERETT, and Mr. BEARDSLEY.

The Speaker then left the chair, and the House resumed its proceedings in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the judiciary bill.

Mr. MILLIGAN said that so much had then been intimated as to the operation of this measure upon the State he had the honor to represent, that he felt compelled, in order to avoid misconception, both here and at home, to claim the indulgence of the House, while he offered a word of explanation. He lamented the necessity of doing so at this particular time, and he could assure honorable gentlemen that he was too much alive to the value of the short interval which now remained for legislative action to tax their patience beyond a moment. He rose, not for the purpose of making a speech, but an explanation, and should abstain altogether from noticing the amendment just offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HANBIX,] further than to say he hoped it might not prevail.

According to the present arrangement of the circuit courts of the United States, (said Mr. M.,) Maryland and Delaware constitute the fourth judicial circuit. The bill from the Senate, if he understood its provisions, proposed simply, so far as it related to Delaware, to incorporate that State in what was now the third circuit. It did not, therefore, as had been alleged, contemplate to withdraw from Delaware any advantage she may derive from a circuit court. No such thing. It did not even propose to abridge the number of terms, or vary the time, or alter the places of holding that court. It merely directed that a different circuit judge should preside; in other words, that, in place of coming from Maryland, he should come from Pennsylvania. How, then, could the rights or the interests of the people of Delaware be prejudiced by this bill? Should it become a law, with what justice could her citizens complain that they have been deprived of any privilege or immunity which they before enjoyed? If it really had an injurious tendency, he confessed that, with the best attention he had been able to bestow on the subject, he could not discover how that injury was to arise.

I might add, sir, (said Mr. M.,) what is well known to every man at all conversant with our local concerns in Delaware, that there is now, and that there has been for years past, very little business transacted in the federal courts in that State. Fortunately for her people, suits before that tribunal were "like angels' visits, few and far between." But if they were ever so numerous, it would not affect the case, or change his opinion as to the propriety of the measure. The doors of justice were not closed against them by the provisions of this act. On the contrary, he repeated the assertion that the same courts were still open to them—and the only difference was, that, whenever they had causes to be adjudicated, instead of being tried before a judge of a circuit called the fourth, they were to be tried before a judge of a circuit called the third. The distinction, therefore, if it existed, was one of form and not of substance.

Mr. M. said he felt fully persuaded that his constituents would rightly understand this matter, and be satisfied with the proposed arrangement—more especially so, when they heard that, without the loss of any rights of their own, they were by this act extending the advantages of the circuit court system to their fellow-citizens of the Western and Southwestern States. They would see in it also a change which, without abridging in the smallest possible degree any of the conveniences they possess for the administration of justice, would operate a saving to the nation of the salary of one judge—a matter not perhaps of great consequence by itself, but certainly important as a part of the projected reduction which we all hope to witness in a patronage now wielded for the most pernicious purposes.

Entertaining these views of the direct bearing of this measure, (Mr. M. said,) he had no hesitation in giving it his support; and he treated that gentlemen who had magnanimously withheld their votes, under the supposition that it worked injustice to his State, would now be un-deceived. He added, that he should not have complained, and he believed the people of Delaware would not have complained, if, in the new arrangement of the judicial circuits, even the Chief Justice had been assigned to them. Far otherwise. They would have esteemed it one of the most signal pieces of good fortune that could have fallen to their lot. They beheld in that venerable and illustrious individual, not merely the undiminished possession of the highest order of human intellect, but the beautiful association of every quality which renders man a blessing to his fellow-men. And if they could be allowed a wish upon this subject, it would be that his life, like his virtues, should be immortal.

Mr. CARMICHAEL said, if the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HARDIN] was agreed to, he would vote for the bill; otherwise, he should feel it his duty to enter into a detailed discussion of the merits of the bill. After some further remarks, he yielded the floor to

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, who suggested that it would facilitate the business of the House, if the committee should rise and report their proceedings to the House.

Mr. FILLMORE expressed a similar wish.

[Mr. CARMICHAEL here yielded the floor, in order that the report of the joint committee of conference on the disagreement of the two Houses, in relation to amendments to the general appropriation bill, might be made.]

The Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POLK, from the joint committee of conference, reported that the committee had unanimously agreed to recommend to the House to recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, making appropriations for the salary of a minister to Great Britain, and secretary of legation, and that the salary of a minister to Great Britain be stricken out. This branch of the report was concurred in by the House, as also the recommendation that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, making an appropriation to Samuel Slater, to Gales & Seaton, for printing Congressional documents, and making an appropriation for printing 5,000 copies of the report of the committee on the West Point Academy.

The joint committee of conference further recommended that the Senate recede from their amendments in relation to land claims in Missouri, and an appropriation for a road in Alabama.

The House then insisted upon the two latter amendments.

The House being again in Committee of the Whole, Mr. HARDIN proposed to amend the bill by striking out seven and inserting eight, as applied to the number of judges of the circuit, with several other amendments relative to its location and boundaries.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS, of Maryland, said his colleague [Mr. CARMICHAEL] had given way on the understanding that, when the bill came into the House, he should not be prevented from delivering his views on it by the motion for the previous question.

Mr. BEARDSLEY rose, he said, to propose an amendment to this bill.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

A message was here received from the Senate, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the House took up the amendment to the fortification bill, appropriating $3,000,000, and the resolution of the Senate that it would insist on its disagreement.

Mr. GHOLSON expressed a fervent hope that the House would recede from its amendment. He was conscious that no man, woman, or child, in the United States, who had any intelligence of the matter, seriously believed that France would declare war against this country. The appropriation was, therefore, unnecessary, and the House might with propriety abandon the amendment. He moved that the House do recede.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he trusted the House would not recede. If no measures were to be taken for the defence of the country, let the Senate take the responsibility.

Mr. GORDON was in favor of receding. The amendment was extremely objectionable. It was unparalleled in the legislative history of our country. It placed the purse and the sword both in the hands of the Executive, and made the legislative subservient to the executive power. It was but yesterday that we were told emphatically that there was to be no war with France. To-night, at the moment of adjournment, we were called upon to place the whole public treasure in the hands of the Executive, to provide for the contingencies of war.

Mr. BYNUM rose and said he hoped in God, if the House of Representatives had not lost all respect for themselves and the people whom they professed to represent on that floor, that they would not recede from the vote that they had given on that all-engrossing and important subject, to gratify the Senate in their opposition to the executive branch of this Government. It was no longer to be disguised, the fact was not to be disputed, that that body had become intoxicated with its own powers; they were not contented in attempting to curb the Executive, but it was clear, and as evident as noon-day, that they were now attempting to take charge of the House of Representatives. Yes, (said Mr. B.,) they are about to take charge of the Representatives of the freemen of this nation, and he regretted, exceedingly regretted, to find that their conduct was connived at by honorable gentlemen of this House. Sir, said he, I feel indignant at the attempt, and enter my solemn protest against their taking in their custody the legislation of this House; they had already been guilty of usurping the rights of the executive department, and would now, if a stand was not taken against their conduct towards this House, usurp the entire legislation of this body, and use it as a mere creature to register their edicts.

The SPEAKER here informed Mr. B. that it was not proper to allude to the Senate by name in debate in this House; when a cry was heard, by many voices: "Proceed! Go on! Call them by another name!"

Mr. B. proceeded. He was aware that it was difficult to make any allusion to the conduct of the Senate without getting out of order, as it was against one of the rules of the House to make allusions to that body in debate, by name; he would then allude to it as the collateral branch of this Legislature. Sir, (said Mr. B.,) will any man dare to deny that the conduct of the collateral branch of this Legislature, throughout the whole of the last session, and much the greater part of this, has been to usurp the whole of the legislative and executive control of this Government? And if they were not resisted, and promptly, too, it would be idle to call this longer a republican Government, in which a majority of the freemen of this nation ruled the minority. The fact was the reverse. A minority, and a small one, too, in the other branch, was about to take the entire control of the whole Government, which was destroying virtually, and in fact, the only republican feature of this heretofore free and republican form of Government. Sir, said he, if this aggression of that madly ambitious body is not met and repelled by this House, ours is no longer a Republic; and it is false to call it so. It is virtually and in fact an aristocracy, ruled by the majority of forty-eight individuals, not directly amenable to the free people of this country for their legislative misconduct. Gentlemen might call it by another name; but he affirmed it to be as rank an aristocracy as ever ruled the destiny of any nation on the face of the globe.

But, Mr. Speaker, (said Mr. B.) I feel mortified, yes, sir, deeply mortified, at the conduct of the two honorable gentlemen from Virginia, [Messrs. GHOLSON and GORDON.] Sir, I did not expect such a course from gentlemen of that State, heretofore so much distinguished for her chivalry, devotion to the untrammelled republican institutions of this country, and disinterested patriotism. He had expected a different course from honorable gentlemen. But he had now found, to gratify their spleen towards the Executive, that patriotism, and love of country, and sacred regard for our republican institutions, all, all were to be sacrificed at the relentless shrine of party malice.

[Mr. GHOLSON here rose and asked his honorable friend from North Carolina if he would give way a moment for him to explain.

Certainly, said Mr. B.

Mr. GHOLSON proceeded to show that it had not been his intention to make a party question of it; the honorable gentleman was grossly mistaken if he thought that he had been influenced at all by party feelings in the course that he had felt it his duty to pursue on that occasion; but that he had no idea of placing in the hands of the President three millions of dollars, to use as he thought proper.]

Mr. BYNUM continued. He understood the course perfectly well that honorable gentlemen were disposed to pursue on the occasion; he could not be deceived in that, and he was equally determined to speak of it freely and fearlessly. The two honorable gentlemen from Virginia had expressed horror at the idea of trusting the President with three millions of dollars. He had not the least doubt there were those that were unwilling to intrust him with the paltry sum of ten dollars; ay, sir, with three millions of cents. Yet the great majority of this nation had intrusted him with the rights, liberties, and lives, of fourteen millions of souls; with the whole revenue (in certain respects) of this great and growing nation.

The American people had trusted him with all that was near and dear to freemen; nor had he, as yet, betrayed that trust; but, on the contrary, had realized the most sanguine expectations of those who had placed him in that high and responsible station. He did not expect that those who had ever opposed him, and who never had had confidence in either his capacity or integrity, were willing to trust him with the amount that it had been proposed to place at his discretion to use for the benefit of the nation, if he thought it necessary, and if we should be unfortunately forced into a war with France. He had every confidence himself in the President, and entertained the most sanguine opinion that, were we to place ten or one hundred millions of dollars in his hands, not one cent would be used, unless the exigencies of the nation required it. Had the President not the confidence of the nation, he never could have been placed where he was; and he occupied the identical station that he now did for the especial reason of his possessing the confidence of the great body of the people who had, with overwhelming majorities, given him their suffrages. He was the only individual whom they had selected to superintend their interest in the execution of their laws in the recesses of the legislative branches of Congress; and how was he to effect this, if the necessary means were not placed in his hands by the legislative departments? He knew full well if any calamity should happen to the nation, it would be immediately laid at the door of the President; yet gentlemen were willing to unite with the opposite branch of this Congress, and withhold the very means which was almost indispensable to protect the nation and the rights and interests of our citizens. He had not the least doubt, and he expected few had the hardihood to deny the fact, that there were many in another legislative branch whose name he would not call, for fear of being out of order, at present, who would most willingly see the interest of the American nation sacrificed, and our flag tarnished for ever, if, by effecting it, they could disgrace and degrade the name of the President of these United States, and that body of the people who had so signally and triumphantly sustained him.

Yes, sir, continued Mr. B., to effect this, I believe there are those who would willingly see a French flag floating and waving in triumph over the splendid walls of this great and magnificent edifice. Upon this question there were but two parties. They were the American and the French party; and gentlemen, let them attempt to trim and shuffle as they choose, would have to meet it in the end as such. He had seen, much to his mortification, attempts made to make this an administration and an anti-administration question. No true-hearted American would view it as such. All parties were ready to admit that we were in the right—both friend and foe had so declared; and who was so base as not to stand by his country when in the right? Such was the character of the American people. They were emphatically for their country, right or wrong. He did not believe that our brave countrymen would ever stop to inquire what party is to be put up, and what to be put down, when a proud enemy had invaded our soil.

After taking the step that had been taken by this House, in voting unanimously to sustain and stand by the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831, now to refuse the least indication to maintain it, did appear most clearly to him a most extraordinary inconsistency, not to call it by a more appropriate name; and he could not believe gentlemen to have been in earnest, who had supported the one, while they were now willing to deny the other. All he asked of gentlemen was to act in good faith, and to carry out their professions by their actions.

If the opposition persisted in making this an administration and anti-administration measure, he thought the administration party had nothing to fear on that score, and the opposition would be promptly met before the people or elsewhere. He thought there was patriotism enough in all portions of the country, to stand by her when her soil was threatened, and her rights and honor had been assailed by a proud, haughty, foreign foe; and he could not believe that it would be received by the free and brave men of this country as an adequate apology for the sacrificing of her interest, that it was done through hatred and hostility towards your Executive. No, sir, the people will require, said he, a very different answer from their Representatives here; and should the opposite branch of this national Legislature continue to thwart the views of the majority of this nation, I am for making them responsible for it before the whole American people, whose rights, interest, and honor, they have sacrificed to gratify personal ambition and factious spleen. There, sir, I, as an American citizen, will arraign them, and expose, as far as my feeble capacity will justify me, their attempts to usurp executive rule, and the entire control of this branch of the legislative department. Sir, (said Mr. B.) I feel indignant at the rapid strides that that department is now making against the free republican form of this Government, by attempting to usurp and control both the executive and this branch of the Government of the country; and I feel more indignant that it has been so long connived at and acquiesced in by honorable gentlemen of this House.

If they are to take the whole charge of the legislative and executive action of the Government, let us at once inform our constituents of the fact, and recom-ment to them to dispense with the agency of this body and the Executive, as being useless and unnecessary. But, sir, for one, I will ever protest against any body's attempting to coerce this House in the adoption or rejection of any measure, whether it be attempted by the collateral branch of this Legislature, the executive or the judicial department of the Government.

Mr. B. reiterated that he sincerely hoped the House would not recoil from the vote they had given on that great and important subject. He implored them, for the dignity and honor of their representative character, not to be coerced into any or out of any measure that they deemed it their duty to pursue. He hoped that they would show and maintain a becoming respect for their own decisions, and would not consent to sit here merely to register the edicts and measures of another body, that had manifested a disposition to treat them, almost upon all occasions, with scorn and contempt. He had much rather that the whole bill should be lost, than to yield the independence of that body to any power on earth. He had long been taught to believe that the purity, permanency, and independence of our free republican form of government, depended almost entirely on the perfect independence of each of the great departments, the legislative, executive, and judicial, each of the other; but it was too plain to be contradicted, that it was attempted, on the part of one of these departments, to usurp in their own hands all of the efficient powers that properly belonged to the others.

He could never be brought to sanction such a state of things, by quietly sitting by, and not raising his feeble voice against it. One of the honorable members from Virginia once more raised the hue and cry about the "purse and the sword;" he really had thought that "was too stale to be used at this time before any intelligent, respectable people. The object of such stuff had long since been exposed, and could only now dupe and delude the most ignorant part of the community. He was astonished to find how much gentlemen on this floor had undervalued the intelligence and independent spirit of the honest, plain people of the country—they could not, in his honest judgment, and would not, be so easily played upon by mere professions and tricks of gentlemen here. They will look, as a test of gentlemen's fidelity here, at their actions; and by them we shall all have to be judged, by a just and intelligent people. They cannot be much longer imposed upon by gentlemen professing one thing, and, as soon as they are out of sight, acting another. Sir, said he, such a course of conduct has involved this country in the very difficulties under which it now labors. Let the people correct these evils, and we are again the happiest and freest people on the globe.

Mr. WISE said he agreed with his colleague, [Mr. GORDON,] that this was no pitiful administration or anti-administration question. It was a national question, and, in that view, he, for one, had voted for it. But Mr. W. said he rose more especially to notice a remark of another colleague, [Mr. GORDON,] who had said this amendment vested legislative powers in the Executive; that it unites the purse with the sword. This position he denied. He asked how we were situated at the commencement of the last war with Great Britain? Was not the same cry then heard? And how did we then find ourselves prepared for the emergency? He defied the gentleman, as a lawyer—a constitutional lawyer—to show in what respect the legislative power was placed in the hands of the Executive. Mr. W. said he was as much opposed as his honorable colleague could be to the overweening and all-grasping tendency of executive power. He did not distinctly recollect whether his colleague [Mr. GORDON] voted for the "peace resolution" of his other colleague, [Mr. ARCHER.] Mr. W. said for himself he could say he did vote for it. But he believed in the propriety of in peace preparing for war. He did believe there absolutely existed a danger—a prospect of war; and, in the event of its occurrence, every fortification on your coast was liable to fall into the hands of a strong maritime Power. He wished to give his constituents information; and he regretted that he was compelled to use the time of that House to tell them that such was the danger in which their interests stood. He believed the appropriation to be politic and necessary, and he would adhere to it.

Mr. McKENNAN here moved the previous question; which was seconded.

The main question was then put on the motion of Mr. GORDON to recede from the amendment of the House appropriating $3,000,000 for the support of fortifications, and taken by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Quincy Adams, Heman Allen, Chilton Allan, Archer, Ashley, Barber, Barnitz, Barringer, Beatty, Bouldin, Campbell, Chambers, Chinn, Claiborne, William Clark, Clowney, Corwin, Crane, Crockett, Darlington, Davis, Davenport, Deberry, Dickson, Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Ewing, Felder, Fillmore, Foster, Philo C. So the House refused to recede from its amendment.

JUDICIAL CIRCUITS.

The House went again into committee on the judiciary bill.

Mr. BEARDSLEY sent an amendment to the Chair, being an additional section to the bill, providing for certain alterations in the circuit of New York, and making it the second circuit; also, that the places of holding the same should be at Albany and Utica.

Mr. B. gave a brief explanation of the reasons which had induced him to prepare this amendment. The northern district of New York had now nothing more than one district court, and an extension was greatly desired. It might be inquired, what were the population and business that the proposed circuit embraced. It contained twelve or fourteen hundred thousand inhabitants, who employed as much capital as any other region of the same size in the country. The bill provided for the erection of two new circuit courts in the Western country—a measure of which Mr. B. was decidedly in favor. The first of these two circuits comprised the States of Missouri, Indiana, and Illinois. These three States were represented by twelve members in that House—less than one half of the delegation to Congress from the northern district of New York. The second circuit was intended to embrace Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi, who were there represented by nine members, and all of which were considerably less in population than one half of the northern district of New York. In all these States, and throughout the whole region of country, they already enjoyed all the benefits of the judicial system. Mr. B. appealed to his Western friends, that while they were anxious, and justly so, to obtain so desirable a matter for themselves, they would not be unmindful of the claims of so large a section of country as that for which he was now advocating.

Mr. FILLMORE begged leave to suggest to his honorable colleague to make one of the places of holding the court farther west. Utica was nearly four hundred miles from the western part of the State of New York; and Albany was still further objectionable, from the same ground. Mr. F. would suggest Rochester or Buffalo. He moved to strike out Albany, and insert Buffalo.

Mr. BEARDSLEY explained, that he had inserted Albany, because it was the capital of the State; and Utica already had one term a year, and it would be better to continue it there. Personally, he would say, he had no objection to the amendment, but he was convinced the public benefit would be better consulted by fixing it as he had done, and he hoped the amendment would not be adopted.

Mr. FOSTER wished to remind gentlemen that there was one hour and three quarters remaining of the session, and he hoped further discussion would be dropped.

Mr. FILLMORE said the bill proposed to establish two circuits within one hundred miles of each other and leave other and not less important parts of the State at a distance of four hundred miles.

Mr. FILLMORE'S amendment was adopted without a division.

Mr. BEARDSLEY'S amendment, as amended, was also adopted: Yeas 80, nays 46.

The bill, as amended, was then laid aside; and the committee took up and considered the following bills:

A bill to increase the engineer corps.

A bill for the relief of David Beard. The amendment to this was agreed to.

A bill relative to accounts of our consul at London.

A bill to continue the subsistence department.

A bill for the relief of the corporations of Washington, Alexandria, and Georgetown.

All which bills were severally agreed to, and laid aside to be reported to the House.

The committee then took up the bill to carry into effect the convention with Spain.

The question was on concurring with the Senate in their amendment to this bill.

Mr. CAMBRELENG explained that the character of the bill had been materially changed by the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

The committee then rose, and the chairman (Mr. SPEIGHT) reported the foregoing bills to the House.

BRANCHES OF THE MINT.

The bill from the Senate to establish branches of the mint of the United States, was read a third time and passed, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. J. Q. Adams, John Adams, John J. FORTIFICATION BILL.

A message to the following effect was received from the Senate:

The Senate adhere to their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications, appropriating three millions of dollars, &c.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the House adhere to the amendment.

Mr. MERCER moved that the House recede from the amendment; which motion, he said, was first in order.

Mr. POLK said the motion to adhere had priority to the other.

The CHAIR decided that the question must be first taken on the motion to recede.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD said, if the House adhered, there could be no further intercourse with the Senate on the subject. If it was in order, he would move that the House insist, and ask a conference with the Senate.

Mr. LYTLE objected entirely, he said, to any conciliatory proposition. The House had gone as far as prudence and patriotism would justify them in going to conciliate the Senate. The only question was, where the responsibility of the loss of the bill should lodge. Let it be with that body which is determined to act, not only against the spirit of the executive recommendation, but against this House as the representatives of the people. This body, which was intimately connected with the people, and might be supposed to represent their sentiments, had unanimously agreed to a declaration which would honor and distinguish this House in all time. We have (said Mr. L.) gone further, and put the seal on our professions by making an appropriation of three millions. Let the other body now take the the responsibility of defeating it; that body which was already groaning under the weight of a responsibility which it cannot much longer sustain.

[Order! order! was vociferated from every part of the House.]

Mr. LYTLE. What are the exceptionable words?

Mr. MERCER. I will repeat them. The gentleman says, the Senate of the United States is groaning under the weight, &c.

Mr. LYTLE. I said no such thing. I said the other body.

Mr. MERCER appealed to the Chair to decide whether the words were in order.

The CHAIR decided that the gentleman was 'not in order in alluding to the proceedings of the "other body."

Mr. LYTLE. I have heard the allusion made here a thousand times, without interruption from the Chair or the House.

The CHAIR. The gentleman can make use of no language which is likely to lead to an interruption of harmony between the two Houses.

Mr. LYTLE proceeded. He had not, he said, departed from the courtesy due to the other body. All he had to say was, that he wished the responsibility to abide in the proper place. The House had sustained the sense and spirit of the message of the President, the wisdom and policy of which had been verified by events. But, sir, another body has placed itself in opposition to the views of the Executive, and is now heaping upon itself a responsibility which I unequivocally declare it cannot sustain.

[Cries of order! order!]

This House will have its full share of the glory attending the successful termination of the controversy with France, and the gentleman from Massachusetts will have a full share in it. The people of the country will sanction the action of this House, and award to it the glory of the action. I say, then, said Mr. LYTLE, I will not depart, as a member of this body, from the elevated stand we have taken. I hold the appropriation to be the consummation of the proceedings of the last three days. It will send out to the world irresistible evidence of a national feeling on the subject, on the part of this House. It will leave no room for cavil or doubt; and, sir, the country will sustain us, while it puts the seal of its condemnation on those who resist us. If, then, the House retreats now, it will deserve to be considered as the most pusillanimous body in the world.

Mr. HAWES moved the previous question.

Mr. HUBBARD said, if the House adhered, the bill would be lost. He moved that the House appoint a committee of conference.

Mr. LEWIS said it was not the amount of the appropriation, but the principle, which was objected to by the Senate. A committee of conference might, therefore, adjust the disagreement. The manner of the appropriation was too loose. It was not specific. It put every thing into the hands of the Executive. He asked, what would be the effect of the previous question?

The CHAIR replied, only to preclude debate.

The previous question was then taken on the motion of Mr. MERCER to recede, and decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Q. Adams, Heman Allen, Chilton Allan, Archer, Ashley, Barber, Barnitz, Barringer, Beaty, Bouldin, Briggs, Bull, Campbell, Chambers, Chinn, William Clark, Clowney, Corwin, Crane, Crockett, Darlington, Davis, Devenport, Deberry, Dickson, Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Ewing, Felder, Fillmore, Foster, Philo C. Mr. HUBBARD then moved that the House insist upon their amendment, and asked a joint committee of conference.

The motion to insist was agreed to, and Messrs. CAMBRELENG, LEWIS, and HUBBARD, appointed on the part of the House.

Mr. HARDIN asked if the House was not virtually dissolved, by the expiration of the term for which this Congress was elected.

The CHAIR said it was not a question of order, and the Chair could not decide it.

CUMBERLAND ROAD BILL.

The Cumberland road bill was taken up and read a third time.

Mr. McKAY moved that a message be sent to the other House, informing them that this House, having completed its business, is ready to adjourn.

The CHAIR said the motion was not in order, the question being on the passage of the bill.

The Clerk proceeded to take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill to continue and repair the Cumberland road, and

Mr. GILMER, when his name was called, rose and said he considered that he had no right to vote, the term for which he was elected having expired at 12 o'clock this night; and he therefore declined voting.

The question was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John Quincy Adams, Chilton Allan, W. Allen, Anthony, Ashley, Barber, Barnitz, Beardsley, Beaty, Boon, Briggs, Bull, Carmichael, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Samuel Clark, William Clark, Corwin, Coulter, Cramer, Crane, Darlington, Day, Evans, Edward Everett, Horace Everett, Ewing, William K. Mr. MANN rose and said it was past 12 o'clock, and the functions of this House had ceased.

Several members addressed the Chair.

Mr. JARVIS made a point of order. He asked whether the functions of the House had not ceased, according to the constitution and usage.

The CHAIR said the question could only be decided by moving an adjournment. The House must decide the question for itself.

Mr. JARVIS. Is it not a question of order whether the House is in existence or not?

The CHAIR said the gentleman was not in order.

Mr. JARVIS offered a resolution declaring that the functions of the House had ceased.

Mr. CLAY said the bill to extend the judiciary system was the business next in order.

Mr. POLK. I submit whether this House can transact business after 12 o'clock. The gentleman from Maine has sent to the Chair a resolution declaring that the functions of the House have ceased, and I ask for its consideration.

The CHAIR. If the House is in existence it must proceed by parliamentary rules, and the gentleman knows the rules of the House must be suspended in order to offer the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Georgia, moved an adjournment.

Twenty members addressed the Chair at the same time; the Chair in vain attempting to preserve order.

Mr. WARDWELL said the House could not adjourn until they advised the Senate and the President that it was ready to adjourn.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS said it was not the fact that the functions of this House ceased at 12 o'clock, according to the constitution. The constitution said not a word on the subject.

The confusion in the House increasing,

The CHAIR called upon members to assist him in preserving order and decorum.

Mr. EVANS concurred with the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and added, that it would be disrespectful to the Senate and the President to adjourn without the usual notice to them.

Mr. JONES, of Georgia, withdrew the motion to adjourn. Several motions for sending the usual notice to the Senate were made and withdrawn.

Mr. J. Q. ADAMS said, if the assertion that the House was not in existence was true, a motion could not be made.

Mr. J. Y. MASON said, as the House was about to separate, he hoped they would render an act of simple justice to one of its members, by passing the resolution to pay the honorable ROBERT P. LETCHER his compensation for the last session. He moved a suspension of the rule, in order to take up the resolution. The motion was agreed to, and the resolution proposing to direct payment to Mr. LETCHER for attendance at the last session was read.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved to strike out the preamble; which was agreed to.

The question being on the motion of Mr. R. M. JOHNSON to amend the resolution by embracing the name of THOMAS P. MOORE,

Mr. WILDE moved the previous question; which was seconded, 69 to 65.

The main question was ordered, (on agreeing to pay Mr. LETCHER,) and was taken by yeas and nays, when there appeared yeas 113, nays 3, (several members refusing to vote, though present, on the ground that it was past twelve o'clock.) No quorum voting, the resolution was lost.

Mr. JARVIS now moved an adjournment; on which question Mr. WILDE asked the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the names, and Mr. BEARDSLEY and others not answering,

Mr. GARLAND rose to a point of order. He asked whether gentlemen were not obliged to vote one way or another, being present.

Mr. BEARDSLEY said he would state, for himself, that, making all reasonable allowance for variation in time, it was now considerably after one o'clock. The constitutional term of the existence of this Congress having expired, he could not vote.

Mr. PIERCE said the gentlemen who thought they had no right to vote had better withdraw. They had no right to be in the hall, if they had no right to vote.

The yeas and nays having been taken, there appeared yeas 15, nays 102.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER, by consent, laid before the House sundry annual communications from heads of Departments.

The SPEAKER also presented a communication from the Postmaster General, (Mr. Barry,) which he said he had not had time to read, and the contents of which he was therefore not able to state to the House.

Mr. CONNOR moved that it be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. EVANS said he had run his eye over the paper, and discovered that it was in the nature of an appeal to the public against the report of a committee of this House. The first sentence of the paper styled the report of that committee "an aspersion." The paper asked nothing of this House, and, on its face, professed to be an appeal to the public; and he (Mr. E.) thought this House was not the proper channel of communication between the Postmaster General and the public.

Mr. CONNOR said he had not read the document, but he had understood from one of his colleagues on the committee, (Mr. BEARDSLEY,) that it was respectful in its tone and tenor. As it regarded himself, as a member of the committee animadverted upon by the Postmaster General, he would say that he was perfectly willing to afford him an opportunity to correct any error into which the committee in their report might have fallen.

Mr. MILLER said, if there was time, he would be glad to have the document read, in order that the House might be assured in regard to its character. But he recollected distinctly that this House ordered both the majority and minority reports of the committee on the Post Office investigation to be printed, without the reading of either. The reports contained allegations which went to implicate the Postmaster General in the charge adduced of mismanagement; and now that officer wished to make an explanation to the House. If he was correctly informed, the Postmaster General was not allowed to make any explanation before the committee, nor to be present at their deliberations. Mr. M. held that, when an investigation was going on which implicated the official character of an individual, the individual had a right to be present.

[Here Mr. M. was requested to give way, in order that the report of the committee of conference on the fortification bill might be made.]

Mr. M. said he would yield the floor to that report, if he thought the act which it proposed would be of any use to the country. But he apprehended that it would be useless. As to the communication from the Postmaster General, if the House would not take time to read it, it would, he hoped, be printed, and permitted to be sent to the country. He himself had voted for the largest number proposed to be printed of both of the reports from the Post Office Committee, and he insisted on the printing of this explanation, especially as the Postmaster General was not allowed to be present at the investigation.

[It is proper to mention here that the committee of conference, on the part of the House, had returned some time before Mr. MILLER made the above remarks, and that the substance of the report was informally known to the House.]

Here a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. Lowrie, their Secretary, communicating a resolution of that body in the following words:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the honorable the House of Representatives, respectfully to remind the House of the report of the committee of conference appointed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill respecting the fortifications of the United States.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that the committee of conference of the two Houses had met, and had concurred in an amendment which was very unsatisfactory to him. It proposed an unconditional appropriation of three hundred thousand dollars for arming the fortifications, and five hundred thousand dollars for repairs of and equipping our vessels of war—an amount totally inadequate, if it should be required, and more than was necessary, if it should not be. When he came into the House from the conference, they were calling the ayes and noes on the resolution to pay the compensation due the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. LETCHER.] He voted on that resolution, but there was no quorum voting. On a subsequent proposition to adjourn, the ayes and noes were called, and again there was no quorum voting. Under such circumstances, and at two o'clock in the morning, he did not feel authorized to present to the House an appropriation of eight hundred thousand dollars. He regretted the loss, not only of the appropriation for the defence of the country, but of the whole fortification bill; but let the responsibility fall where it ought—on the Senate of the United States. The House had discharged its duty to the country. It had sent the fortification bill to the Senate with an additional appropriation, entirely for the defence of the country. The Senate had rejected that appropriation, without even deigning to propose any amendment whatever, either in form or amount. The House sent it a second time, and a second time no amendment was proposed, but the reverse; the Senate adhered, without condescending to ask even a conference. Had that body asked a conference in the first instance, some provision would have been made for defence, and the fortification bill would have been saved before the hour arrived which terminated the existence of the present House of Representatives. As it was, the committees did not concur till this House had ceased to exist—the ayes and noes had been twice taken without a quorum—the bill was evidently lost, and the Senate must take the responsibility of leaving the country defenceless. He could not feel authorized to report the bill to the House, situated as it was, and at this hour in the morning, but if any other member of the committee of conference proposed to do it, he should make no objection, though he believed such a proposition utterly ineffectual at this hour; for no member could, at this hour in the morning, be compelled to vote.

Mr. LEWIS (another member of the committee of conference) took the report from Mr. CAMBRELENG, with the apparent intention of offering it to the House. But he first asked the Chair whether there was a quorum present or not.

The CHAIR, to ascertain whether there was a quorum, asked the members to pass through tellers.

The tellers reported 113 members.

The CHAIR, upon the suggestion of a member, counted the members visible in the hall, and reported that he could count no more than 114.

Mr. FILLMORE moved an adjournment; but afterwards withdrew the motion.

Mr. CARMICHAEL renewed the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WILDE asked the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered.

The question was then taken on the motion, and decided in the negative: Yeas 35, nays 76. So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SMITH moved that a message be sent to the Senate, informing that body that the House, having completed its business, was ready to adjourn.

Mr. WILDE asked the gentleman from Maine to withdraw the motion. He was certain, he said, that there was a quorum present, and he wished once more to give the House an opportunity to pass the resolution for paying Mr. LETCHER. To refuse or neglect this would be the most flagrant injustice to that individual.

[Great impatience was here manifested by the House.]

Mr. MERCER remarked that he had been here as a member eighteen years, and he was ready to assure the House that the doctrine asserted to-night, that the functions of the House ceased at 12 o'clock, had no foundation in usage any more than in the constitution. It was usual for the House to act one, two, and even four hours after 12 o'clock. He adjured the House to preserve the usual forms, from motives of respect to the other branch of the Legislature, to the Executive and to the Speaker, whose ability and impartiality had this day received the unanimous and well-merited approbation of the House.

Mr. HARDIN entered into a legal argument, the purport of which was that, according to the meaning of the constitution, the existence of Congress terminated at 12 o'clock. He adduced high legal authority to prove that a man born on the 4th of March, (the day when the Government went into operation,) would be one-and-twenty on the 3d of March. [Much laughter.] The constitutional term of this Congress had, he insisted, actually expired, and all legislation here now would be a nullity.

Mr. PARKER said that the first Congress met at 10 or 11 o'clock in the morning, and our time, therefore, said he, don't end till to-morrow at 10 or 11 o'clock. He asked this question: Did the gentlemen who formed the committee on conference, on the part of the House, mean to report or not?

Mr. BRIGGS, after a few words, which the reporter, in the general tumult, could not catch, remarked that his distinguished colleague [Mr. ADAMS] had said, the other day, that on the 3d of March this House would be numbered with the dead. But here we were on the 4th of March, and, if we were dead, we were the most noisy dead he ever heard of.

The resolution to pay Mr. LETCHER was here taken up.

Mr. MANN, of New York, called for the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. BARRINGER said as the gentleman had refused to vote, he had no right to make a motion.

Mr. MANN said he had as much right to make a motion as any gentleman on the floor.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the question being taken, there appeared yeas 72, nays 3—no quorum.

Mr. BRIGGS moved that the House do now adjourn; but gave way to.

Mr. SMITH, who renewed his motion to send to the Senate a message, informing that body that the House, having completed its business, was ready to adjourn.

Mr. PARKER. How can we pretend to say that we have completed the business before us? and how can we adjourn without passing the fortification bill? This House had passed the bill. The Senate made a large addition to it. The House had added another appropriation. The Senate disagreed to it; a committee of conference was appointed, and that committee had refused to report to this House. Shall we go away, said he, and leave this bill, at a time when there is an apprehension of war?

Mr. PHILLIPS. What is the situation of the business of the committee of conference?

The CHAIR stated, in reply, that, as he understood, the report had been made.

Mr. LYON moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SMITH,] so as to make it read, that the House, having no quorum, was ready to adjourn.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. There has not been a quorum for an hour or two.

Mr. REED said the committee of conference had agreed to a report, and, as a quorum was undoubtedly present, it ought to be acted upon. He was opposed to the adjournment, because the House had not yet done its duty. [Order! order!] Mr. REED said: The proposed amendment declared what is not the fact. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LEWIS moved a call of the House.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. I protest against the right to call the House. What member will answer to his name? ["I will, I will," exclaimed many members.] I am as much in favor (said Mr. C.) of the fortification bill as is the gentleman from New Jersey; but I say that the responsibility of its failure rests upon the Senate, and not upon us. The bill was defeated by the Senate. ["No!" "no!" "not so!" was exclaimed by many voices.]

Mr. BARRINGER. The bill was defeated by an intrigue here in this House. If gentlemen desired names, Mr. B. said he would give them. But, if this was declined, he would say that there were members, who now sat in their seats, and would not answer to their names, who did so in consummation of the intrigue. Mr. B. called for tellers on the motion.

The members were requested to pass through tellers, and there appeared yeas 56, nays 26—no quorum.

Mr. J. Y. MASON informed the House that the Senate had adjourned.

The fact announced was questioned; but it being confirmed, the House agreed, on motion of Mr. BARRINGER, to adjourn.

The SPEAKER [Mr. BELL] then rose and addressed the House as follows:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives: It is a late hour, but I hope I may be allowed one word, in acknowledgment of the many obligations I am under to this House.

Duly sensible, as I am, of the value of that testimony of respect for your presiding officer which you have this night ordered to be placed upon the journals of the House, and as much bound as I am by that compliment to express my sensibility to your kindness, I am still more solicitous, upon this occasion, the last that may offer to me, to express a yet deeper and more abiding sense of gratitude, for that continued indulgence to my faults, that marked forbearance and tenderness to my many deficiencies, which have been manifest, on your part, from the first moment I took this chair, and which have continued to be manifested up to this, the last allotted hour of the present Congress. The feelings inspired by a recollection of so much generosity I am unable adequately to express, but they shall have a place in this bosom as long as there is a pulsation there.

But this is not the extent of the obligations I am under to you, gentlemen. If the public service had suffered essentially from any defect in me, the memory of your generous indulgence would afford me but a qualified pleasure; but you have, upon every occasion, given to me, your presiding officer, liable to err and actually erring, as he often did, your firm support in his efforts to prevent the effect of what seemed to him to be error in others; and thus you reconciled your continued forbearance towards him with your duty to the public, in supporting the regularity and dignity of the proceedings of the House.

It is needless to declare to you how feeble, how utterly incompetent, the efforts of any one must be to discharge the duties of this station, without the cordial support of the members of this House. The satisfaction I derive from the reflection that I have had your cordial and necessary support is greatly heightened by two considerations—the one personal to myself, the other of a public nature. Inexperienced as I was, when the duties of the Chair were suddenly devolved upon me, I could deserve your support, in attempting to maintain the just authority and respect of the Chair, only by bringing to the discharge of its various duties a resolute determination to perform them with impartiality, and a suitable firmness and decision. However I may have failed in these purposes in particular instances, unconsciously and through the weakness of our common nature, I feel a proud satisfaction in believing that you have always duly appreciated my intentions and my desires.

But I have a yet higher gratification, founded upon the experience I have had in the chair, whatever may be the occasional disorders and intemperance incident to times highly excited by party conflicts, we have just reason to hope that there will always remain a collective, an aggregate feeling and determination in this House to forbear those extremes, those excesses, which, if indulged, would justly forfeit the respect and confidence of the country.

None will question, that whatever concerns the character and respectability of this House, as a co-ordinate branch of the legislative department of the Government, concerns likewise the interests, the very being, of free institutions, and the rights and happiness of the human family. Whether this House shall continue to hold and actually exercise its due proportion of the powers of this Government; whether it shall continue to contribute its due weight and authority in shaping the policy of this great country, and in elevating it to that high destiny which the friends of political and civil liberty in every part of the world, so devoutly desire; whether, indeed, such a destiny shall ever be ours, depends greatly upon the rank which this House shall continue to hold in the affections, the respect, and confidence, of the great body of the people.

The recollection that, while I have had the honor to fill this station, I have had your co-operation and confidence in my feeble efforts to sustain the due importance and respectability of this House will be a source of high gratification to me in the future vicissitudes of my life, whatever they may be. And now, at the moment of a separation, which, with many of us, may be permanent, I may be permitted to say that, if, upon any occasion, I have seemed to fail in that respect which is always due from the Chair to the House, and to all its members, I can, with the utmost sincerity, affirm that it was never intentional; and I beg to express my ardent wishes for the continued and uninterrupted health and happiness of every individual of which this House is composed.

The SPEAKER then adjourned the House, at half past three o'clock, without day.

ADDENDUM.

[The following speech was received too late for publication in its proper place, and is therefore inserted here.]

Speech of Mr. TALLMADGE, of New York, on EXECUTIVE PATRONAGE, delivered in the Senate of the United States, on the 20th of February, 1835.

The bill introduced by Mr. CALHOUN, to repeal the four years' law, and on the power of removal from office, being under consideration,

Mr. TALLMADGE said this bill is supposed to involve important constitutional principles. The whole doctrine of the power of removal from office by the Executive has been deemed, by those who have taken part in the discussion, to be embraced in its provisions. Under this impression I feel called upon to give my views, and more especially as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] challenged a refutation of the argument he advanced, but was unwilling to yield the floor to me, after the challenge had been accepted, unless I would confine myself to one insulated position. I now take the earliest opportunity to give my views on the general question, and will embrace in them a refutation of the particular argument on which that Senator relied.

Mr. President, much declamation has been indulged in by gentlemen who have advocated this bill. It has afforded them a convenient opportunity to bestow upon the present incumbent of the executive chair some of the most odious epithets which have been engendered by the violence of the times; and such, too, as would be deemed unjust and improper to apply to the worst Emperors of Rome in her most degenerate days. But, sir, it is a subject which does not admit of declamation. It calls for argument. We should endeavor, in discussing it, to divest ourselves of all considerations connected with the present incumbents of office, whether high or low. We are attempting to settle great constitutional principles; principles which cannot be changed, and which cannot yield to party violence or to temporary expedients. I know that our feelings in reference to men, on political subjects, often influence our judgments in relation to principles. - But, to whatever extent this influence may be felt, it is only another evidence of the weakness of our nature. Conscious of this infirmity, our efforts should be the greater to guard against its effects. We should be controlled, on this subject, neither by prejudice nor partiality. We should put out of view those who administer the Government, and look solely to the great principles on which it ought to be administered. Whatever may be the feelings of others on this occasion, I hope to soar above the atmosphere of prejudice, and to breathe the pure air of equal justice and of constitutional law. In this discussion, the constitution, and the constitution alone, is my chart, and by it alone shall I be guided. I am to argue on the side of executive power, a power which has been attempted to be rendered odious in this debate, but which I will endeavor to show is not of that odious character with which it has been invested by the distempered imaginations of gentlemen; a power, on the contrary, given by the constitution, exercised under the constitution, and for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the constitution.

Mr. President, it is my purpose to argue from the constitution as it is, and not as some gentlemen suppose it ought to be. In this way much of the argument of those who have preceded me, on the other side, is disposed of. They have argued from what they term the abuse of power. Sir, the abuse of power does not show that the power does not exist. On the contrary, it is conclusive evidence of its existence; for where there is no such power, there can be no such abuse of it. I will not dwell on alleged abuses, which form the groundwork of much, very much, of what has been said in this debate. They are all the creations of a lively fancy. They are the productions of an overheated imagination. Such allegations do not go to the merits of the question. Their refutation is not necessary to my argument.

In the outset, then, I claim for the Executive no power except what is granted to him by the constitution itself. He has no power except what is derived from that instrument. What is there granted I claim for him: I claim no more, and will take no less. I stand upon the constitution, and upon the constitution alone. I have made this avowal to guard against misapprehension. An overweening desire has been manifested, on the part of some, to attribute to others an attempt to derive this power from other sources than the constitution itself, and, in their anxiety to accomplish this purpose, they have ascribed to others arguments and motives which they never used nor entertained. If, therefore, in what I have to say, a word be not as fitly chosen as it ought to be, let it not be deemed to imply what is not intended by it. With these preliminary observations, observations designed to guard against misapprehension and misrepresentation, I proceed to the immediate subject under consideration.

It is agreed on all hands, that the power of removal exists under the constitution. It is essential to the due administration of the Government. The only question is, how and where it is to be found, and by whom it is to be exercised. In order to arrive at a correct conclusion on this subject, it may not be amiss to examine the circumstances of the times in which this constitution had its origin. It primarily grew out of the defective organization of the old continental Congress. This body, which was composed of delegates from the several colonies, exercised all the ordinary powers of Government, legislative, executive, and judicial. The power of appointment and removal from office was a part of its executive power, and, in its judicial capacity, it reserved to itself the right of appeal from prize courts, which it had recommended to be established in the respective colonies. The defects of this organization were so palpable, that it was soon found necessary to resort to a different one for a remedy; and the continental Congress was superseded by the confederation. Here, again, the greatest difficulties were experienced from the defects which still existed in this new, and, as was supposed, improved system of government, and none was more sensibly felt than "the organization of the whole powers of the general Government in a single assembly, without any separate or distinct distribution of the executive, judicial, and legislative functions." To remedy this defect, amongst others which existed, was the object of our present constitution. Under the confederation, it will be perceived, there was no national Executive. "The whole powers of the national Government," says a distinguished commentator, "were vested in a Congress consisting of a single body; and that body was authorized to appoint a Committee of the States, to sit in the recess, and to delegate to them such of their own powers, not requiring the consent of nine States, as nine States should consent to. This want of a national Executive was deemed a fatal defect in the confederation."

The establishment of a national Executive seems to have been a primary object with the convention which formed the constitution. In regard to its importance, there was no diversity of opinion. But, on the question whether it should consist of a single person, some difference did exist. The principle of unity instead of plurality in the Executive, was, however, adopted by a strong vote. The convention was of opinion that the former would secure energy, decision, activity, and all the qualities so essential in the due administration of the Government. The inefficiency of the executive power under the continental Congress, as well as under the confederation, left no room to doubt about vesting that power in a single head. Unity, then, in the executive department, was a leading feature of the new constitution; and it follows that any construction which tends to divide or share this power, beyond what is expressly given by the constitution, is against the very spirit of the principle on which the executive department is founded. This principle may be invaded and violated in two ways: first, by the creation of an executive officer, by legislative power, and declaring him independent of the President, who is, by the constitution, the Chief Executive of the nation; second, by taking from the President, by like legislative authority, his power of removal from office.

This presents the inquiry, Has the President the power of removal?

The old Congress exercised the power of appointment as well as the power of removal. They are, in their nature, executive powers. These, with the legislative and judicial powers exercised by that body, were designed to be distributed by the provisions of the new constitution. It was intended to confer the executive power, including, of course, the power of appointment and removal, on the President, except when specially restricted by the constitution. The power of removal, being neither a legislative nor a judicial power, was a portion of the executive power thus intended to be given him. Accordingly, the constitution says: "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

In regard to the other departments of the Government, it says: "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." It is proper to observe the precision of the language used in the constitution in reference to this distribution of powers. The executive and judicial power is "vested." The legislative power is said to be "herein granted." The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] seemed to be aware of the difficulty which his argument encountered by the difference of the phraseology in the language of the constitution, in reference to these powers. But, with characteristic boldness, he marched directly to his object, and surmounted all obstacles, by at once amending the constitution, by adding to the clause conferring executive power the words "herein granted," the same as they are found in the grant of legislative power. "I consider," says he, "the language of this article, therefore, precisely equivalent to that in which the Legislature is created; that is to say, I understand the constitution as saying that 'the executive power, herein granted, shall be vested in a President of the United States.'" The words "herein granted," as applied to the clause in relation to executive power, let it be remembered, are an interpolation of the honorable Senator himself. They are not to be found in that clause of the constitution where the Senator has taken the liberty of introducing them, and, after what we have heard from that gentleman, about the violated constitution and laws, I am unwilling that he shall introduce so important an amendment without going through with the forms prescribed by the constitution itself. I will undertake to show that the framers of the constitution had good reason for the precise phraseology which they used in reference to these different powers of the Government. It is not a correct rule of construction to add words to one clause which, from the manner in which they are used in another, were intentionally omitted. If the gentleman cannot sustain his argument without changing the constitution, he must consent to let the executive power go to the President, where the constitution intended to vest it.

But why this difference in phraseology? I will endeavor to show. The Government of the United States, under the constitution, is one of limited powers. It possesses no power except what is derived from the States. They were separate, independent, and sovereign, and possessed all the powers of separate, independent, and sovereign States. They still possess those powers, except that portion which has been granted to the United States. The United States, therefore, is a Government of delegated powers. It takes by grant from the States, and it possesses those powers which the States have parted with, and have granted to it. Hence, in the grant of legislative power, the words "herein granted" are used, because the Government is one limited to the powers granted, and can take nothing beyond. In the general Government, therefore, there can be no legislative power, unless it be granted. It can be granted in no way except by the constitution. Hence it is, that, in that instrument, it is spoken of as a power "herein granted." But how stands the case in regard to executive and judicial powers? The constitution does not speak of them as "herein granted," but says they shall be "vested," the one in the President, the other in a Supreme Court. Executive as well as judicial power necessarily follows the grant of legislative power. It exists, under the constitution, from the grant of legislative power. It requires no specific grant by name. Wherever there is legislative power, there must be, ex necessitate, executive and judicial power. The first is merely declaratory of the intentions of the legislative body; the second enforces those intentions; and the third expounds them, if there be any doubt as to how they should be carried into execution. If the constitution were entirely silent in relation to executive and judicial power, it would still exist, under the constitution, from the grant of legislative power. For when the States parted with a certain portion of legislative power by specific grant, they also, by the same act, parted with enough of executive and judicial power to expound and enforce that grant. Hence the constitution does not in terms grant those powers, but vests them. In regard to legislative power, it both grants and vests. If the constitution had not vested the executive power, it might have been vested by the legislative power; the grant of it being incident to the grant of legislative power; but, being vested by the constitution, the Legislature cannot interfere with it.

I have said that the power of removal was, by its very nature, an executive power, and that it could not be classed with legislative or judicial powers. If it be an executive power, it is, of course, vested in the President by the constitution, and cannot be divested by the Legislature. But the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] denies that it is an executive power; says it partakes of the judicial character; and, in the next breath, assimilates it to a legislative power. There seems to be a confusion of ideas with the honorable Senator on this subject. He has a remarkable facility in transferring powers from one department to another, and even giving them a new baptismal name, if the one which the constitution has given be not in accordance with his taste. I well recollect, on a memorable occasion, when the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States was under discussion here, that the Senator from Kentucky, unwilling to recognise the Treasury Department as an executive department, and unable to discover in it any similarity to the legislative or judicial department, very complacently christened it an administrative department! But, Mr. President, powers in their nature executive are executive powers, no matter by what name they are called, nor by what department they may be exercised; and, as the executive power is vested in the President, it is to be exercised by him in all cases, except where the constitution has expressly otherwise provided. The old Congress, we have seen, exercised this power. It was no less executive, by reason of its being exercised by a body which also exercised the legislative power. Sir, it is denied that the power of removal is an executive power. What is executive power? It is a power which executes. It implies more than a power to accomplish, to fulfil, or to perform. It involves the idea of active measures, and the one who executes is the executor or executive. It is the giving effect to the behests of other powers which have a right to command. Says a learned writer, "one executes according to the intentions of others. A soldier executes the orders of his general, a merchant executes the commissions of his correspondent." The President, I may add, executes the laws of Congress, passed in conformity to the powers granted to that body by the constitution. He executes, as the word implies, according to their intentions. If their intentions are not understood, or are disputed, then the Judiciary comes in, and expounds and settles their meaning. These intentions of Congress cannot be executed without the power of removal. For, if officers should refuse or neglect to execute the laws, the President, whose duty it is to see the laws faithfully executed, can effect it in no other way than by removing them from office. The power of removal, therefore, is an executive power. It follows, then, that the power necessary to execute the legislative behests of Congress is vested in the President, though not by name specifically granted in the constitution. The words "herein granted," on which the Senator from Massachusetts based his arguments, were, therefore, an intentional omission. Because, if they were in this clause of the constitution, and the constitution had enumerated the executive as it did the legislative powers, and the power of removal had not been expressly granted, then it might be, as it has been, argued that the power of removal was not in the President. But, when we see that the words "herein granted" are not contained in that clause of the constitution, then the general executive power being vested in the President, the power of removal must be vested as a part of it.

Mr. President, permit me to illustrate my position by a reference to the constitutions of the several States. They are all very similar in this respect. I will, therefore, take the constitution of the State of New York as an example of the whole. That constitution declares that "the legislative power of this State shall be vested in a Senate and Assembly." It does not say the legislative power herein granted, because, no grant was necessary. The power resided in, and was inherent in, the people. They therefore merely vested it in a legislative body, which they created for that purpose. But, when the States delegated certain powers to the general Government, the constitution said, "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States," because there existed in that Government no legislative powers except those granted to it by the States—and, of course, no such powers could be vested till they were granted. Again, the constitution of New York says, "the executive power shall be vested in a Governor." Here, too, there is no grant. The power resides in the people, and it necessarily exists where legislative power exists: The people, through their respective State conventions, having expressly granted a portion of legislative power to the United States, of necessity, as I have already remarked, granted a portion of executive power, and so much, without specification, as was necessary to execute the legislative grant. There is no danger, then, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] supposes, that the President may take all the executive powers of the States; for whenever you define how much legislative power is granted, that determines the measure of executive power. There need be no apprehensions, therefore, on this subject; for the legislative power of the Government is to be ascertained by what is expressly granted in the constitution. Again, the constitution of New York says, "he (the Governor) shall take care that the laws are faithfully executed." How, it will be asked? I answer, by virtue of the executive power vested in him. The same may be said of the President; and, as I have before observed, he cannot execute the laws without the power of removal. It must, therefore, be vested in him as a part of the executive power. Those who deny this position are bound to show that the power of removal is expressly vested in some other department of the Government.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] attempts to avoid this difficulty by assuming that the power of removal is incident to, and a part of, the power of appointment, and that whoever holds the one, holds the other also; that the power of appointment being vested in the President and Senate, the power of removal must be vested in them likewise; that both are derived from the same source. What is that source? "He (the President) shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint."

It has been already demonstrated that the power of appointment and the power of removal are executive powers; and as the executive power is vested in the President, it follows that both these powers are vested in him, unless restricted in the constitution by some other special grant of power which is in derogation of them. Is there any such grant? There is none as to the power of removal. Of course, it must be in the President; and as to the power of appointment there is a mere qualification or restriction upon it. The power of appointment is substantially and technically in the President alone, notwithstanding the restriction. He shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint. The appointment is, therefore, in fact, made by him. He is the agent, under the constitution, to make it, and the Senate have a mere negative on his agency. But for this negative, the Senator from Massachusetts concedes that the power of appointment, as also the power of removal, is in the President. Does this negative alter the case? There is no principle better settled in the construction of the constitution or laws than this. Where a general power is vested, any participation in that power is an exception to a general principle, and must be taken strictly. No one understands this principle better than the Senator from Massachusetts. This participation, then, by the Senate, is such an exception, and, of course, must be confined to the terms of the exception. It is only in derogation of the power of appointment, and not the power of removal.

Mr. President, by a fair construction of the constitution, I am satisfied that the power of removal is vested in the Executive; and it appears to me that such a construction is supported by weighty reasons, reasons which show it ought to be so. Our Government is a Government of responsibility. The people are the source of power, and the fountain of honor. All officers should be mediately or immediately responsible to them. The power of removal should rest where the responsibility rests, on the President. He is responsible to the people for a faithful execution of the laws. "He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." This is an injunction of the constitution which he has sworn to support. It is an injunction of duty. How shall he perform that duty? How can he be answerable for a faithful execution of the laws, if an officer is appointed, and he has not the power to remove him? What is the object in giving the Senate a participation in the appointment? It must be for the purpose of ensuring, with greater certainty, competent officers. The President appoints, but he must first get the advice and consent of the Senate. When the appointment is complete, the incumbent is presumed to be more certainly a suitable man for the station than he might have been if the President alone had the power of appointment. The President would not desire to displace such a man, and one of his own appointment, too, without good cause. If, for good cause, he sees fit to remove him, there is not much danger of getting a bad man in his place, because it is presumed that the Senate will not advise and consent to any other than a proper appointment. Appointment to office concerns the public—removal from office concerns the individual. The public have an interest, and a deep interest, too, in having all offices filled by suitable and proper men. If an officer is removed, the presumption is that, with the advice and consent of the Senate, a worthy man will be appointed to succeed him. There is not the same reason, therefore, for the interference or participation of the Senate in removals as appointments. The reason, we may presume, why the constitution did not give the Senate a participation in removals from office was, that it was not necessary to secure proper incumbents in office, and it might interfere with the faithful execution of the laws.

But let us return to the question of responsibility. If the power of removal was divided between the President and Senate, there would be no responsibility. The people cannot reach this body. Their voice is not heard here; and even if it were, responsibility, when thus divided, amounts to nothing. The people cannot hold the President responsible, for he has done all in his power. The result is, that there is responsibility nowhere, under such a construction of the constitution. It will not be contended that the Senate has the right to interfere with the execution of a law in the enactment of which it, as a branch of the legislative power, has participated. Suppose such a law to exist, a law which enjoins a certain duty on an officer in the executive department of the Government, and he refuses to perform it? What is the remedy? The President is bound to see the law executed. It is an injunction of the constitution which, on entering upon his elevated station, he swore to support. How is he to do it? It can only be done through the officer, and he refuses to obey the orders of the President. He has no other way than to remove the officer, and to appoint one in his stead who will obey his directions. But if the Senate refuse to advise and consent to the removal, then the refractory officer remains. The law becomes a dead letter on the statute book; and the Senate, in effect, abrogates an act of Congress. It may be said that I have supposed a case that would never occur. If it is one that might occur, it shows the fallacy of a construction of the constitution which, in its results, involves such an absurdity.

Mr. President, there are other reasons. The public interest as well as the public convenience might require an immediate removal; and the delay in convening the Senate, in order to get its advice and consent, might be productive of the greatest injury to the public service. Gentlemen on the other side have been aware of this objection, and have endeavored to obviate it. The Senator from Massachusetts supposes, that if the removing power belonged to the President and Senate, the Senate would of course be more in session than it now is, and thus the inconvenience would in a measure be obviated. Sir, the duties of the Senate, beyond its legislative duties, do not require it to be in session any longer than the House of Representatives. From its limited number of members, compared with those of the House, it is enabled to despatch more business in a given time than the more numerous branch. That is always the case in all legislative bodies. Hence it is no burden for the Senate to discharge its other duties during the same session with the House. Besides, it is not conformable to the spirit of our institutions that either branch of the Legislature should protract the sittings, so as to even approach the character of a permanent body. The expense attending such sittings, if it must be convened for executive business, would not be justified by public sentiment. The Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] however, has proposed another remedy, namely, that the President should suspend the officer until the Senate should be regularly convened, so as to avoid the inconvenience to the members, and the expense to the public. The objection to this is, that the public interest might require that the officer be forthwith removed, and another appointed to supply his place. Hence it is that the constitution has given to the President the power of appointment where a vacancy occurs in the recess. This provision is founded on the supposed necessity of prompt action. A suspension is not a vacancy, and therefore the office could not be filled. I can imagine a case where the state of our foreign relations might be such as to require a public functionary to be removed, and his place forthwith supplied. The power of suspension would not meet such a case, and it might be one that required great secrecy and despatch. So that the suggestions of either of the honorable Senators would not at all meet the objections which are raised to the participation of the Senate in the power of removal.

Again: The President being responsible for the faithful discharge of the executive duties of his station, it is both the theory and the practice of the Government that he shall have the selection of his cabinet ministers, who are his constitutional advisers in the performance of those duties. If the doctrine contended for by the friends of this bill be correct, no one can fail to perceive the dilemma in which the President might be placed.

[SENATE.]

He may have come into power after a severe political struggle, a struggle based on great principle, on which the people have divided, and would of course be expected, by the majority which elevated him to that high station, to carry out those principles in his administration of the Government. But, on taking the oath of office, he finds himself surrounded by the cabinet of his predecessor, to whom the people have given leave to retire; and, in the conscientious discharge of their duties, they believe the interests of the country require their continuance in office, and they can only be removed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. After what we have seen for a few years past, it would be no great stretch of the imagination to suppose that there might be a majority in the Senate equally conscientious with the cabinet ministers themselves, and who might refuse to advise and consent to their removal. Of course, the President must be surrounded by constitutional advisers in whom he has no confidence, whose principles are diametrically opposed to his own, and to those of the people who elected him to carry those principles into effect. It may be said that the case which I have stated is one not likely to occur; that gentlemen entertaining such opposite views to the President's would not consent to hold their places under him; and that the Senate would not impose upon him those who were not of his own selection. Such, Mr. President, might be the case, and, generally speaking, would be. But I can imagine an instance, during what has been not inaptly termed the panic session, where I believe the Secretary would have held on to his place, against the wishes of the President, and where the Senate would have refused to remove him, if the President had attempted it. The probability, nay, I may say, the possibility, that such a case might occur, must be a satisfactory reason to every candid and unprejudiced mind, why the construction of the constitution, as to the removing power, contended for on the other side, cannot and ought not to prevail. If such a construction could for one moment be admitted, what would be the result? Why, that the Senate, a body not responsible to the people, would control the President, who is solely responsible to them, and through him control the people themselves, and set at defiance their wishes, as well as trample under foot their principles.

I will now, said Mr. T., briefly notice the argument of the Senator from South Carolina, [MR. CALHOUN,] the refutation of which he challenged with such an air of triumph, and offered to yield the floor to any one who would undertake to answer him. I accepted his challenge, and was proceeding in the answer, when he claimed the floor, because my argument was likely to cover more ground than he was willing I should occupy at that time. The Senator resumed his speech, and I now take the first opportunity to show the fallacy of his reasoning, and the utter destitution of any constitutional principles on which he attempted to found it. The novelty of his position struck me, as it must have struck every Senator, with surprise. The Senator himself claimed the merit of the discovery; admitted it was a new reading of the constitution; that it was a view which was never taken by any one before; that even the sages of the first Congress (some of whom were members of the convention that framed the constitution, and who discussed with great force and deliberation this very power of removal, and decided it as belonging to the President) were entirely ignorant of it; and that it had been reserved for him to settle a question of constitutional construction which had baffled the efforts of all the most eminent statesmen, from the earliest period of our political history to the present time! What, then, Mr. President, is this great discovery? Why, sir, it is this: that the power of removal is to be found in that clause of the constitution which says "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," (those granted to Congress itself,) "and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officers thereof." The Senator contends that the power of removal is not expressly granted by the constitution to the President, and that it cannot therefore exist, except as a power necessary and proper to execute some power expressly granted by that instrument; and that if it exists in that character, it belongs to Congress, and not to the Executive, under that clause of the constitution already quoted. My objection to this argument, Mr. President, the fallacy of which I apprehend no difficulty in demonstrating, is twofold. First, the power of removal, though not expressly granted to the President in terms, is still vested in the President, as I have heretofore shown, as a part of the executive power. Second, that the clause cited by the Senator, as conferring the power on Congress, instead of the Executive, has no possible bearing on the question. The power of removal must exist somewhere. If it exists in Congress, it must exist, according to the Senator's own argument, by virtue of this clause. If, then, this clause were not in the constitution, the power of removal would not exist in Congress, but would be vested in the President, unless there be some other clause expressly granting it. It is conceded there is no such clause, and therefore it exists by virtue of this clause, if it exists at all. It follows, then, that if this clause had never been inserted in the constitution, Congress could not claim to exercise the power of removal. So, if this clause, although inserted, conferred no additional power, then it is the same as if it had never been inserted. What, Mr. President, are the facts in relation to it? When the constitution was under discussion, before the people of the several States, for their ratification, this very clause was looked upon with a jealous eye, and was objected to as covertly containing powers which ought not to be granted to the new Government. What was the answer to these suggestions and suspicions; and by whom was the answer to them given? By Alexander Hamilton—the great oracle of the constitution—one of its most prominent framers, and one of its ablest expounders. What said he in relation to this clause? Why, sir, "that it conferred no new or additional power; that the constitutional operation of the intended Government would be precisely the same, if this clause had been entirely obliterated, as if it had been repeated in every article; that it was only declaratory of a truth which would have resulted by necessary and unavoidable implication from the very act of constituting a federal Government, and vesting it with certain specified powers. This is so clear a proposition," said he, "that moderation itself can scarcely listen to the railings which have been so copiously vented against this part of the plan, without emotions which disturb its equanimity." Such was the indignant language of Hamilton towards those who attempted, at that early day, before the adoption of the constitution, to pervert its meaning, and to discover important and hidden powers in a clause which contained none, and conferred no new ones. What then must be our emotions, when, after a lapse of near half a century, we see an effort made to grasp, under this clause, one of the most important powers of this Government, and forcibly to transfer it from the executive to the legislative department? But, it may be asked, if the constitution be the same without as with this clause, why was it introduced? I will answer this interrogatory in the language of the same great expounder of the constitution, "that it could only have been done for greater caution, and to guard against all cavilling refinements in those who might hereafter feel a disposition to curtail and evade the legislative authorities of the Union."

But, Mr. President, I go one step farther, and say, even if this clause does confer any power which was not contained in the constitution without it, that still it does not confer upon Congress the power of removal from office. Let us look again at the clause, "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." What powers, I ask? Why, powers which are expressly conferred on Congress, and which are specifically enumerated, namely: to lay and collect taxes; to borrow money on the credit of the United States; to regulate commerce, &c.; but we find no executive powers enumerated amongst them. Of course, the power of removal is not to be found in this member of the clause to which I have referred. Is it contained in what follows, to wit: "and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof?" We have seen the power of removal is not amongst the powers conferred on Congress, and, therefore, Congress cannot assume to exercise it. It is not vested in Congress, and must, of course, be vested in some other branch of this Government. We have seen that it is an executive power, and that the executive power is vested in the President. Congress, then, under this clause of the constitution, can do no more than to pass the necessary and proper laws to carry into execution a power thus vested in the Executive.

I have, thus far, Mr. President, endeavored to argue this question as if it were now for the first time presented for the consideration of Congress. I have attempted to discuss it on strict constitutional principles, without reference to any precedent which may have been established by the action of the Government, or the practice of any of the departments of it. The conclusion to which I have arrived on principle, is also sustained by precedent. In saying this, I do not mean to be understood as attaching any peculiar sanctity to any precedent, merely because it is one. But a precedent, in reference to the circumstances under which it was established, as well as the character of those by whom it was adopted, may be entitled to high consideration—and more especially when it is supported by reasons which justify its origin, and sanction its continuance. Such, in my judgment, is the case under consideration. The power of removal from office was a principle which came up for the determination of the first Congress which assembled under our present constitution. A Congress composed of the sages of the Revolution, and many of its members having been prominent and efficient members of the convention which framed it. This was the celebrated Congress of 1789, which enrolled amongst its number James Madison, who, by way of eminence, has been called the father of the constitution. The question of removal from office came up on the bill to establish the Treasury Department. I will not attempt to present or recapitulate the arguments which were used on that occasion. Suffice it to say, that it was the intention of Congress to settle for ever the construction of the constitution on this point. This is evinced by the fact that objections were strenuously urged against any interference on the part of Congress in giving a construction to the constitution in regard to a power about the exercise of which a difference of opinion existed. It was urged that there was no necessity for the interference of the legislative department—that the question should be left till it arose in the regular operation of the Government, and should then be submitted to the decision of the Judiciary, or be decided by the President and Senate whenever it occurred. It was answered, on the other hand, that it was a question difficult to be brought before the Judiciary, and it was important to decide it at that early day, in order to avoid any conflict between the President and Senate—and that the House of Representatives, representing the people, ought to make an expression on the subject, which coming, as it were, from the people themselves, would be the means of quieting it for ever, and of avoiding great difficulties in the future action of the Government. Under this impression, and with this view, the bill for establishing the Treasury Department was so amended as to show the power of removal as already existing in the President, and that it should not appear to be granted by Congress. This decision has been acquiesced in ever since, and the practice of every administration has been in accordance with it. Congress has, in various instances, recognised it as the true and settled construction of the constitution. I will not detain the Senate by citing the numerous acts of legislation by which it has been so recognised and settled; but it may not be amiss to call the attention of the Senate to the act of 1820, which is proposed by this bill to be repealed, and which contains the very principle for which I am contending. The question then recurs, shall this precedent, thus sanctioned by time and experience, confirmed by the uniform practice of the Government, and founded, as it appears to me, on the most weighty reasons, be now overturned? I trust not. I have too great a veneration for the memories of those great men who composed the first Congress, and who established the principle which is now attempted to be subverted. The precedent was made by a body which best knew what were the intentions of the framers of the constitution. It was made before the people were divided into distinct political parties, as they have ever since been. It was, of course, settled without party feeling. The state of the times was favorable to a fair and impartial discussion of it. It cannot now be discussed without party bias. Enough has already been evinced to satisfy every candid observer that this is not the time for an impartial discussion, or an impartial decision, of the question. The statute which is proposed to be repealed by this bill was passed at a period much more favorable to a correct determination as to its passage than the present time is to its repeal. It was passed in 1820, during what was then termed "the era of good feelings." It was under the administration of Mr. Monroe, when the strife of party was hushed in the dead political calm which prevailed throughout the country. Such a state of things, however undesirable it may be in other respects, is at least favorable to the correct determination of a principle like that contained in the act of 1820, and which the bill under consideration proposes to repeal. Why, then, when parties are so excited as they now are, when the "times are out of joint," shall we undertake to overturn a principle so long established? If the construction of the constitution, in relation to the power of removal, be not settled after a lapse of nearly half a century, and after the uniform action of the Government during that period, when, I would ask, will it be settled? I have been astonished and amazed at the course of some Senators who have advocated this bill. It was but a short time gone by, when they evinced a holy horror at the mere suggestion of the unconstitutionality of the Bank of the United States, after it had so long been settled by precedent; and now they are rampant to overturn a precedent which is coeval with the Government itself. They are impatient, whenever the constitutionality of the bank, the tariff, or internal improvements, is contested—which has been contested, in relation to them all, whenever they have been before Congress—whilst the power of removal, after it was settled in 1789, has not been attempted to be disturbed from that period till the present time.

[SENATE.]

On this subject, Mr. President, let me not be misunderstood. I do not contend that this precedent, or any other, can make that constitutional which was before unconstitutional. It is the mere evidence of the constitution. Precedents, in this respect, may be likened to judicial decisions. Such decisions are not the law, but are merely evidence of the law. Suppose this question should come before the Judiciary, what would probably be their decision? Would not their doubts, if they entertained any, in relation to the original construction of the constitution, yield to the settled and uniform practice of every department of the Government? I cannot for one moment doubt it. What, then, ought to be our determination? Shall we maintain the principles of the constitution, as settled and established by the sages of the Revolution, or shall we lay sacrilegious hands on this venerated structure of our ancestors? Shall the Vandalism of modern times destroy the classic and fine proportions, and mar the beauty and grandeur, of this mighty edifice of constitutional liberty, erected by their toil and cemented by their blood? I trust not. But, if there be any one here, who, like the strong man, dares to embrace its pillars and to pull down the constitution along with it, I will at least have the consolation to know that there is one who has not contributed to its destruction, although it may be buried in its ruins.

Mr. President, it was my intention, in connexion with the question of the constitutional power of removal, to consider at large the other provisions of the bill. From the manner in which this discussion has been protracted, I feel a great reluctance to occupy the farther time of the Senate. But, as there seem to me to be some views of those provisions which have not been fully presented by gentlemen who have preceded me, I am induced to state, as briefly and as concisely as possible, those which I entertain. As more immediately connected with the power of removal, I will consider the third section of the bill, which requires that in all nominations, made by the President to the Senate, to fill vacancies occasioned by the exercise of the President's power to remove certain officers mentioned in said bill, the fact of the removal shall be stated to the Senate at the same time that the nomination is made, with a statement of the reasons for which such officer may have been removed.

On this branch of the subject, my first objection is, that if the President has the power of removal, he cannot be required to assign reasons. That he has the power has been already demonstrated, and, in relation to the class of officers to which the third section of the bill refers, the bill itself concedes him that power. That power, then, I contend, is absolute, unless the constitution has specially restricted it. No such restriction or condition can be found in the constitution. The appointment of officers is given to the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. This is the general grant of power, as relates to appointments. This is the general principle. I have heretofore shown that the participation of the Senate is an exception to the general principle, and must be taken strictly. There is a still farther exception, by which even this participation, as to "inferior officers," may be taken away from the Senate by Congress. "Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments." If the appointment of such "inferior officers" should be given to the President alone, thus taking away from the Senate a participation or power expressly granted, will it be pretended that Congress can, at the same time, confer upon that body a participation in the power of removal which is not granted? The executive power is, in general terms, vested in the President. The appointment of "inferior officers" is in derogation of that power; and of course

Congress may dispose of them as it pleases. Congress may also limit the term of certain officers—may repeal the law creating the office—may give the appointment and removal to the other department; but whenever the appointment of an officer is given to the President alone, or to the President and Senate, then the President has the power of removal, and no law can take it from him. The requirement of reasons, then, is an infringement of his power of removal. This power is a political power, and, like all political powers, is to be exercised at his discretion. There is no principle better settled than that in the exercise of this discretion he is subject to no control, and answerable only to his country and to his own conscience.

It is, however, urged that Congress has power to annex conditions to the President's power of removal. If there be any power which can require him to give his reasons, then there must be a power to enforce that requirement. Let us test the matter by this rule. If this assignment of reasons be a condition, as is alleged, then the act to which it is a condition cannot be perfect and complete until the condition be performed. Suppose you pass this section, and the President makes a removal, and does not send his reasons to the Senate with the nomination of a successor, is the office vacant? Most assuredly it is. No one in his senses can doubt it. The officer thus removed can no longer exercise any of the powers appertaining to the office. If so, then the condition is not performed. It is in fact no condition, else the removal would not be complete without performance; and it is evident there is no power to annex the condition, else there would be a power to compel performance. Again: if Congress has power to compel the President to assign reasons for a removal, much more has it the power to make the Senate assign reasons for a rejection. How can the Senate assign them, it may be asked? Different members reject for different reasons. Unsuccessful efforts have been made to get the Senate to enter reasons on the journal. On the other hand it may be urged, that unity being the feature of the executive branch of the Government, the same rule would not apply to him, as to the Senate, for withholding reasons. But the principle is the same, and if the Executive had consisted of a plurality, as was strongly urged in the convention that formed the constitution, the difficulty would have been as great as with the Senate, and still the right to call for reasons would have remained the same.

What, Mr. President, is the object of reasons? If to influence the action of the Senate, it must be satisfied that they are either true or not true. This can only be done by an investigation of the facts alleged, upon which such reasons are founded. Such an investigation, to be satisfactory, must give an opportunity to all concerned to be heard. Such an investigation or examination, the Senate, from the nature of its organization and its business, cannot undertake; of course, the truth of the reasons, as to which, peradventure, the President may be mistaken, cannot be satisfactorily ascertained by the Senate, and its action cannot therefore be founded on them. But, it is said, these reasons are necessary to enable the Senate to act on the nomination of the successor to the one removed. Are not, then, the reasons of the Senate equally necessary to enable the President to judge of another nomination, after one has been rejected? If the President remove a foreign minister, it might be necessary for the public interest that his reasons be kept secret during the pendency of a negotiation with a foreign Power. Would you, in this way, hazard the results of such a negotiation? If it be said that the Senate would keep the reasons secret, the answer is, that the same reasons which would induce the President to withhold from the Senate the secret ne negotiation itself till a treaty is formed, ought to induce him to withhold his reasons for removal till the negotiation is ended. There may be cases, too, where reasons ought not to be given. By a provision in the constitution of the State of New York, "all officers holding their offices during good behaviour may be removed by joint resolution of the Houses of the Legislature, if two thirds of all the members elected to the Assembly, and a majority of all the members elected to the Senate, concur therein." This, it will be perceived, includes the chancellor, judges of the supreme court, and circuit judges, all of whom may be removed in the manner specified, and without the assignment of any reasons for such removal. It was urged in the convention that adopted this provision, that the reasons should be entered on the journals of the two Houses of the Legislature. But that proposition was rejected, on the ground that there might be cases where reasons ought not to be assigned. The incumbent might be removed for bodily infirmity or mental imbecility, which, out of regard to the memory of the individual, as well as to the feelings of his friends, ought not to be perpetuated on the public journals of such a body. Do not the same reasons apply as strongly to the case under consideration? I cannot doubt that they do. What, then, it may be asked, is the remedy for improper removals? I answer, in the first place, the President is responsible to the people on a re-election. For an improper exercise of any of the powers vested in him by the constitution, he has to pass the ordeal of the popular will. And a people jealous of their rights, and watchful of their constitutional privileges, will not pass unnoticed any breach or infraction of those rights and privileges, much less any usurpation of power by the Executive, which is not granted by the constitution. In the next place, I answer that, for a wicked and corrupt exercise of the power of removal, the President is liable to impeachment. This has been characterized, by gentlemen on the other side, as an idle remedy, because the same people that elect the House of Representatives, by whom an impeachment is to be preferred, also elect the President, and therefore will not impeach him. Let it be recollected that, when the President is chosen, he is presumed to stand fair before the people. If he is impeachable, it must be for acts after his election. If any just cause shall occur after he has entered upon the duties of his office, the people will not fail to discover it, and, through their representatives, will apply the remedy. It is worse than idle, then, to say that, because the same people that elect the Representatives elect also the President, before any cause of impeachment exists against him, therefore those Representatives will not impeach him after such a cause exists. The people are pure and honest, and the few impeachments we have had is a strong evidence of the purity, instead of the corruption, of our public men. In those few instances where impeachments have been preferred by the House of Representatives, there have been no convictions by the Senate. Even if the impeaching power was as little to be trusted as gentlemen have described it, it is a constitutional provision nevertheless, and cannot, for its inefficiency in practice, be set aside to introduce a doubtful legislative power to supply the defects of a power expressly granted by the constitution.

At the time of the adoption of the constitution, the legislative department was deemed the most dangerous department in the Government. The effort now making to subject the executive department to its control is only verifying the predictions of some of the wisest and ablest men who lived at the time of the adoption of the constitution. I cannot better give their views of the dangers of legislative encroachments on the other departments of the Government, than by quoting the language of a distinguished commentator on the constitution, in which those views are embodied and set forth.

[Mr. T. here quoted from Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, vol. 2, pages 15 to 18.]

Such were some of the reasons for the jealousy and fears entertained of the legislative department. These fears are more than confirmed by the recent strides of legislative power, and more especially by the efforts now making to wrest from the Executive powers vested in him by the constitution, and confer them upon Congress, to which they were never granted; thereby unsettling that which has been settled from the foundation of the Government. Pass this section, requiring reasons for removals, and we shall next see the power of removal itself given to the Senate conjointly with the President. This is but the entering wedge of legislative usurpations. Let us pause before it is too late.

By the act of the year 1820, the term of office of certain officers therein mentioned, namely, district attorneys, collectors of the customs, naval officers and surveyors of the customs, navy agents, receivers of public moneys for lands, registers of the land offices, paymasters in the army, the apothecary general, the assistant apothecaries general, and the commissary general of purchases, is limited to four years, and the said officers removable at pleasure. The first section of the bill under consideration proposes to repeal this provision. A few remarks on this proposition, and I will detain the Senate no longer. Ours is a Government of the people. Their will should pervade the whole body politic, as the blood pervades the human system. Like the heart, its pulsations should be felt to the remotest extremities. The true test of legislation is, whether it tends to promote this great object. If it does, it is salutary; if it does not, it is detrimental. The same principle holds in regard to the appointing power. The question should be, in all cases, is the appointment such as the people will approve? The same, too, as to continuance in office. Now, sir, let us apply this principle. Are short terms of office the general sentiment of the people of this country? An examination of the State constitutions, where the people have spoken through their conventions, will give an affirmative answer to this interrogatory. The terms of most of the offices in the different States of this Union are short. In some of the States, the judges of the highest judicial tribunals are appointed for short periods. In others, they are elected for limited terms. In many, sheriffs, clerks, registers, and justices of the peace, are elected for terms from two to four years; and generally the sheriff made ineligible for the next term. In a great portion of the States, even the governors are ineligible after a limited period, or till another term has intervened. Other officers, after receiving the patronage and emoluments of office, are made to retire, and give place to those equally deserving. This is the prevailing principle throughout the Union, in regard to elective officers; why is it not correct as to those conferred by the appointing power? Both classes should rest on the will of the people. That will, we have seen, is in favor of limited terms. A contrary doctrine is establishing a privileged order, which is repugnant to the genius of our Government, and to the spirit of our institutions. It is virtually appointing officers for life. It must have been on this principle that Hamilton maintained the right of the Senate to unite in removals. He submitted a proposition, in the convention that formed the constitution, for an Executive and Senate for life. What, sir, are the duties of the officers whose terms are to be made perpetual, as it were, by this bill? They are principally collecting and disbursing officers.

Executive Patronage.

[SENATE.]

What is the term of office by which officers of this character hold in the several States? The treasurers, through whom all the current funds of the States are collected and disbursed, are, I believe, in every State in the Union, chosen or appointed annually; whilst the officers enumerated in this bill, being also collecting and disbursing officers, are not to be reappointed at all.

Again, Mr. President, I am for rotation in office. It is a republican principle. It is generally adopted in the States, and ought to be adopted in the Union. It is no new principle. It is older than the constitution itself. It was familiar to the people at the time of the adoption of the constitution. It prevailed in the different States, and was incorporated in their fundamental law. And one objection, amongst others, strongly urged in some of the States against the ratification of the constitution, was "the want of a suitable provision for a rotation in office, to prevent persons enjoying them for life." This objection, like many others, was overcome by the urgency of the times, and from the necessity of organizing a Government more efficient than the old confederation, and under the full persuasion that this great principle, which had been adopted by every State, would be carried out in practice by the new Government. The act of 1820 was intended to promote that object. The bill under consideration is designed to defeat it.

I have thus, Mr. President, endeavored to show that this bill ought not to pass, on the ground of expediency. I have also attempted to prove that it involves constitutional difficulties which ought to prevent its passage. In all that I have said, I have had no reference to the present incumbent of the executive chair. My object has been to guard against modern innovations, and to preserve the principles of the constitution in their original purity, so that when our venerated Chief Magistrate shall retire to that calm retreat, hallowed by so many endearing recollections, from which he was called by the voice of his country, he shall leave the high station, to which he has been elevated by the gratitude of a free people, unshorn of any of its constitutional privileges.

APPENDIX

TO THE REGISTER OF DEBATES IN CONGRESS.

TWENTY-THIRD CONGRESS—SECOND SESSION.

MESSAGE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES TO BOTH HOUSES OF CONGRESS,

At the commencement of the Second Session of the Twenty-third Congress.

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives :

In performing my duty at the opening of your present session, it gives me pleasure to congratulate you again upon the prosperous condition of our beloved country. Divine Providence has favored us with general health, with rich rewards in the fields of agriculture and in every branch of labor, and with peace to cultivate and extend the various resources which employ the virtue and enterprise of our citizens. Let us trust that, in surveying a scene so flattering to our free institutions, our joint deliberations to preserve them may be crowned with success.

Our foreign relations continue, with but few exceptions, to maintain the favorable aspect which they bore in my last annual message, and promise to extend those advantages which the principles that regulate our intercourse with other nations are so well calculated to secure.

The question of the northeastern boundary is still pending with Great Britain, and the proposition made in accordance with the resolution of the Senate for the establishment of a line according to the treaty of 1783, has not been accepted by that Government. Believing that every disposition is felt on both sides to adjust this perplexing question to the satisfaction of all the parties interested in it, the hope is yet indulged that it may be effected on the basis of that proposition.

With the Governments of Austria, Russia, Prussia, Holland, Sweden, and Denmark, the best understanding exists. Commerce, with all, is fostered and protected by reciprocal good will, under the sanction of liberal conventional or legal provisions.

In the midst of her internal difficulties, the Queen of Spain has ratified the convention for the payment of the claims of our citizens arising since 1819. It is in the course of execution on her part, and a copy of it is now laid before you for such legislation as may be found necessary to enable those interested to derive the benefits of it.

Yielding to the force of circumstances, and to the wise counsels of time and experience, that Power has finally resolved no longer to occupy the unnatural position in which she stood to the new Governments established in this hemisphere. I have the great satisfaction of stating to you that, in preparing the way for the restoration of harmony between those who have sprung from the same ancestors, who are allied by common interests, profess the same religion, and speak the same language, the United States have been actively instrumental. Our efforts to effect this good work will be persevered in while they are deemed useful to the parties, and our entire disinterestedness continues to be felt and understood. The act of Congress to countervail the discriminating duties, levied to the prejudice of our navigation in Cuba and Porto Rico, has been transmitted to the minister of the United States at Madrid, to be communicated to the Government of the Queen. No intelligence of its receipt has yet reached the Department of State. If the present condition of the country permits the Government to make a careful and enlarged examination of the true interests of these important portions of its dominions, no doubt is entertained that their future intercourse with the United States will be placed upon a more just and liberal basis.

The Florida archives have not yet been selected and delivered. Recent orders have been sent to the agent of the United States at Havana, to return with all that he can obtain, so that they may be in Washington before the session of the Supreme Court, to be used in the legal questions there pending, to which the Government is a party.

Internal tranquillity is happily restored to Portugal. The distracted state of the country rendered unavoidable the postponement of a final payment of the just claims of our citizens. Our diplomatic relations will be soon resumed, and the long subsisting friendship with that Power affords the strongest guaranty that the balance due will receive prompt attention.

The first instalment due under the convention of indemnity with the King of the Two Sicilies, has been duly received, and an offer has been made to extinguish the whole by a prompt payment—an offer I did not consider myself authorized to accept, as the indemnification provided is the exclusive property of individual citizens of the United States. The original adjustment of our claims, and the anxiety displayed to fulfil at once the stipulations made for the payment of them, are highly honorable to the Government of the Two Sicilies. When it is recollected that they were the result of the injustice of an intrusive Power, temporarily dominant in its territory, a repugnance to acknowledge and to pay which would have been neither unnatural nor unexpected, the circumstances cannot fail to exalt its character for justice and good faith in the eyes of all nations.

The Treaty of Amity and Commerce between the United States and Belgium, brought to your notice in my last annual message, as sanctioned by the Senate, but the ratifications of which had not been exchanged, owing to a delay in its reception at Brussels, and a subsequent absence of the Belgian Minister of Foreign Affairs, has been, after mature deliberation, finally disavowed by that Government as inconsistent with the powers and instructions given to their minister who negotiated it. This disavowal was entirely unexpected, as the liberal principles embodied in the convention, and which form the groundwork of the objections to it, were perfectly satisfactory to the Belgian representative, and were supposed to be not only within the powers granted, but expressly conformable to the instructions given to him. An offer, not yet accepted, has been made by Belgium to renew negotiations for a treaty less liberal in its provisions, on questions of general maritime law.

Our newly established relations with the Sublime Porte promise to be useful to our commerce, and satisfactory, in every respect, to this Government. Our intercourse with the Barbary Powers continues without important change, except that the present political state of Algiers has induced me to terminate the residence there of a salaried consul, and to substitute an ordinary consulate, to remain so long as the place continues in the possession of France. Our first treaty with one of these Powers—the Emperor of Morocco—was formed in 1786, and was limited to fifty years. That period has almost expired. I shall take measures to renew it with the greater satisfaction, as its stipulations are just and liberal, and have been, with mutual fidelity and reciprocal advantage, scrupulously fulfilled.

Intestine dissensions have too frequently occurred to mar the prosperity, interrupt the commerce, and distract the Governments of most of the nations of this hemisphere, which have separated themselves from Spain. When a firm and permanent understanding with the parent country shall have produced a formal acknowledgment of their independence, and the idea of danger from that quarter can be no longer entertained, the friends of freedom expect that those countries, so favored by nature, will be distinguished for their love of justice and their devotion to those peaceful arts, the assiduous cultivation of which confers honor upon nations, and gives value to human life. In the mean time, I confidently hope that the apprehensions entertained, that some of the people of these luxuriant regions may be tempted, in a moment of unworthy distrust of their own capacity for the enjoyment of liberty, to commit the too common error of purchasing present repose by bestowing on some favorite leaders the fatal gift of irresponsible power, will not be realized. With all these Governments, and with that of Brazil, no unexpected changes in our relations have occurred during the present year. Frequent causes of just complaint have arisen upon the part of the citizens of the United States; sometimes from the irregular action of the constituted subordinate authorities of the maritime regions, and sometimes from the leaders or partisans of those in arms against the established Governments. In all cases, representations have been, or will be made; and so soon as their political affairs are in a settled position, it is expected that our friendly remonstrances will be followed by adequate redress.

The Government of Mexico made known, in December last, the appointment of commissioners and a surveyor, on its part, to run, in conjunction with ours, the boundary line between its territories and the United States, and excused the delay for the reasons anticipated—the prevalence of civil war. The commissioners and surveyors not having met within the time stipulated by the treaty, a new arrangement became necessary, and our chargé d'affaires was instructed, in January last, to negotiate, at Mexico, an article additional to the pre-existing treaty. This instruction was acknowledged, and no difficulty was apprehended in the accomplishment of that object. By information just received, that additional article to the treaty will be obtained, and transmitted to this country, as soon as it can receive the ratification of the Mexican Congress.

The re-union of the three States of New Granada, Venezuela, and Equador, forming the Republic of Colombia, seems every day to become more improbable. The commissioners of the two first are understood to be now negotiating a just division of the obligations contracted by them when united under one Government. The civil war in Equador, it is believed, has prevented even the appointment of a commissioner on its part.

I propose, at an early day, to submit, in the proper form, the appointment of a diplomatic agent to Venezuela. The importance of the commerce of that country to the United States, and the large claims of our citizens upon the Government, arising before and since the division of Colombia, rendering it, in my judgment, improper longer to delay this step.

Our representatives to Central America, Peru, and Brazil, are either at, or on their way to, their respective posts.

From the Argentine Republic, from which a minister was expected to this Government, nothing further has been heard. Occasion has been taken, on the departure of a new consul to Buenos Ayres, to remind that Government that its long delayed minister, whose appointment had been made known to us, had not arrived.

It becomes my unpleasant duty to inform you that this pacific and highly gratifying picture of our foreign relations does not include those with France at this time. It is not possible that any Government and people could be more sincerely desirous of conciliating a just and friendly intercourse with another nation, than are those of the United States with their ancient ally and friend. This disposition is founded, as well on the most grateful and honorable recollections associated with our struggle for independence, as upon a well grounded conviction that it is consonant with the true policy of both. The people of the United States could not, therefore, see, without the deepest regret, even a temporary interruption of the friendly relations between the two countries—a regret which would, I am sure, be greatly aggravated, if there should turn out to be any reasonable ground for attributing such a result to any act of omission or commission on our part. I derive, therefore, the highest satisfaction from being able to assure you that the whole course of this Government has been characterized by a spirit so conciliatory and forbearing, as to make it impossible that our justice and moderation should be questioned, whatever may be the consequences of a longer perseverance, on the part of the French Government, in her omission to satisfy the conceded claims of our citizens.

The history of the accumulated and unprovoked aggressions upon our commerce, committed by the authority of the existing Governments of France, between the years 1800 and 1817, has been rendered too painfully familiar to Americans to make its repetition either necessary or desirable. It will be sufficient here to remark that there has, for many years, been scarcely a single administration of the French Government by whom the justice and legality of the claims of our citizens to indemnity were not, to a very considerable extent, admitted, and yet near a quarter of a century has been wasted in ineffectual negotiations to secure it.

Deeply sensible of the injurious effects resulting from this state of things upon the interests and character of both nations, I regarded it as among my first duties to cause one more effort to be made to satisfy France that a just and liberal settlement of our claims was as well due to her own honor as to their incontestable validity. The negotiation for this purpose was commenced with the late Government of France, and was prosecuted with such success, as to leave no reasonable ground to doubt that a settlement of a character quite as liberal as that which was subsequently made, would have been effected, had not the revolution, by which the negotiation was cut off, taken place. The discussions were resumed with the present Government, and the result showed that we were not wrong in supposing that an event by which the two Governments were made to approach each other so much nearer in their political principles, and by which the motives for the most liberal and friendly intercourse were so greatly multiplied, could exercise no other than a salutary influence upon the negotiation. After the most deliberate and thorough examination of the whole subject, a treaty between the two Governments was concluded and signed at Paris on the 4th of July, 1831, by which it was stipulated that "the French Government, in order to liberate itself from all the reclamations preferred against it by citizens of the United States, for unlawful seizures, captures, sequestrations, confiscations, or destruction of their vessels, cargoes, or other property, engages to pay a sum of twenty-five millions of francs to the United States, who shall distribute it among those entitled, in the manner and according to the rules it shall determine;" and it was also stipulated on the part of the French Government, that this twenty-five millions of francs should "be paid at Paris in six annual instalments of four million one hundred and sixty-six thousand six hundred and sixty-six francs and sixty-six centimes each, into the hands of such person or persons as shall be authorized by the Government of the United States to receive it." The first instalment to be paid "at the expiration of one year next following the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, and the others at successive intervals of a year, one after another, till the whole shall be paid. To the amount of each of the said instalments shall be added interest at four per centum thereupon, as upon the other instalments then remaining unpaid, the said interest to be computed from the day of the exchange of the present convention."

It was also stipulated, on the part of the United States, for the purpose of being completely liberated from all the reclamations presented by France, on behalf of its citizens, that the sum of 1,500,000 francs should be paid to the Government of France, in six annual instalments, to be deducted out of the annual sums which France had agreed to pay, interest thereupon being in like manner computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications. In addition to this stipulation, important advantages were secured to France by the following article, viz. "The wines of France, from and after the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention, shall be admitted to consumption in the States of the Union, at duties which shall not exceed the following rates by the gallon, (such as it is used at present for wines in the United States,) to wit: six cents for red wines in casks; ten cents for white wines in casks; and twenty-two cents for wines of all sorts in bottles. The proportion existing between the duties on French wines thus reduced, and the general rates of the tariff which went into operation the 1st January, 1829, shall be maintained, in case the Government of the U. States should think proper to diminish those general rates in a new tariff."

In consideration of this stipulation, which shall be binding on the U. States for ten years, the French Government abandons the reclamations which it had formed in relation to the 8th article of the treaty of cession of Louisiana. It engages, moreover, to establish on the long staple cottons of the U. States, which, after the exchange of the ratifications of the present convention, shall be brought directly thence to France by the vessels of the U. States, or by French vessels, the same duties as on short staple cottons."

This treaty was duly ratified in the manner prescribed by the constitutions of both countries, and the ratification was exchanged at the city of Washington, on the 2d of February, 1832. On account of its commercial stipulations, it was, within five days thereafter, laid before the Congress of the U. States, which proceeded to enact such laws favorable to the commerce of France as were necessary to carry it into full execution; and France has, from that period to the present, been in the unrestricted enjoyment of the valuable privileges that were thus secured to her. The faith of the French nation having been thus solemnly pledged, through its constitutional organ, for the liquidation and ultimate payment of the long deferred claims of our citizens, as also for the adjustment of other points of great and reciprocal benefits to both countries, and the United States having, with a fidelity and promptitude by which their conduct will, I trust, be always characterized, done every thing that was necessary to carry the treaty into full and fair effect on their part, counted, with the most perfect confidence, on equal fidelity and promptitude on the part of the French Government. In this reasonable expectation we have been, I regret to inform you, wholly disappointed. No legislative provision has been made by France for the execution of the treaty, either as it respects the indemnities to be paid, or the commercial benefits to be secured to the United States; and the relations between the United States and that Power, in consequence thereof, are placed in a situation threatening to interrupt the good understanding which has so long and so happily existed between the two nations.

Not only has the French Government been thus wanting in the performance of the stipulations it has so solemnly entered into with the United States, but its omissions have been marked by circumstances which would seem to leave us without satisfactory evidences that such performance will certainly take place at a future period. Advice of the exchange of ratifications reached Paris prior to the 8th April, 1832. The French Chambers were then sitting, and continued in session until the 21st of that month; and although one instalment of the indemnity was payable on the 2d of February, 1833, one year after the exchange of ratifications, no application was made to the Chambers for the required appropriation, and, in consequence of no appropriation having then been made, the draft of the United States Government for that instalment was dishonored by the Minister of Finance, and the United States thereby involved in much controversy. The next session of the Chambers commenced on the 19th November, 1832, and continued until the 25th April, 1833. Notwithstanding the omission to pay the first instalment had been made the subject of earnest remonstrance on our part, the treaty with the United States, and a bill making the necessary appropriations to execute it, were not laid before the Chamber of Deputies until the 6th of April, nearly five months after its meeting, and only nineteen days before the close of the session. The bill was read, and referred to a committee, but there was no further action upon it. The next session of the Chambers commenced on the 26th of April, 1833, and continued until the 26th of June following. A new bill was introduced on the 11th of June, but nothing important was done in relation to it during the session. In the month of April, 1834, nearly three years after the signature of the treaty, the final action of the French Chambers upon the bill to carry the treaty into effect was obtained, and resulted in a refusal of the necessary appropriations. The avowed grounds upon which the bill was rejected, are to be found in the published debates of that body, and no observations of mine can be necessary to satisfy Congress of their utter insufficiency. Although the gross amount of the claims of our citizens is probably greater than will be ultimately allowed by the commissioners, sufficient is, nevertheless, shown, to render it absolutely certain that the indemnity falls far short of the actual amount of our just claims, independently of damages, and interest for the detention. That the settlement involved a sacrifice, in this respect, was well known at the time—a sacrifice which was cheerfully acquiesced in by the different branches of the Federal Government, whose action upon the treaty was required, from a sincere desire to avoid further collision upon this old and disturbing subject, and in the confident expectation that the general relations between the two countries would be improved thereby.

The refusal to vote the appropriation, the news of which was received from our minister in Paris about the 15th day of May last, might have been considered the final determination of the French Government not to execute the stipulations of the treaty, and would have justified an immediate communication of the facts to Congress, with a recommendation of such ultimate measures as the interest and honor of the United States might seem to require. But with the news of the refusal of the Chambers to make the appropriation, were conveyed the regrets of the King, and a declaration that a national vessel should be forthwith sent out, with instructions to the French minister to give the most ample explanations of the past, and the strongest assurances for the future. After a long passage, the promised despatch vessel arrived. The pledges given by the French minister, upon receipt of his instructions, were, that as soon after the election of the new members as the charter would permit, the Legislative Chambers of France should be called together, and the proposition for an appropriation laid before them; that all the constitutional powers of the King and his Cabinet should be exerted to accomplish the object; and that the result should be made known early enough to be communicated to Congress at the commencement of the present session. Relying upon these pledges, and not doubting that the acknowledged justice of our claims, the promised exertions of the King and his Cabinet, and, above all, that sacred regard for the national faith and honor for which the French character has been so distinguished, would secure an early execution of the treaty in all its parts, I did not deem it necessary to call the attention of Congress to the subject at the last session.

I regret to say that the pledges made through the minister of France have not been redeemed. The new Chambers met on the 31st July last; and although the subject of fulfilling treaties was alluded to in the speech from the throne, no attempt was made by the King or his Cabinet to procure an appropriation to carry it into execution. The reasons given for this omission, although they might be considered sufficient in an ordinary case, are not consistent with the expectations founded upon the assurances given here, for there is no constitutional obstacle to entering into legislative business at the first meeting of the Chambers. This point, however, might have been overlooked, had not the Chambers, instead of being called to meet at so early a day that the result of their deliberations might be communicated to me before the meeting of Congress, been prorogued to the 29th of the present month—a period so late that their decision can scarcely be made known to the present Congress prior to its dissolution. To avoid this delay, our minister in Paris, in virtue of the assurance given by the French minister in the United States, strongly urged the convocation of the Chambers at an earlier day, but without success. It is proper to remark, however, that this refusal has been accompanied with the most positive assurances, on the part of the Executive Government of France, of their intention to press the appropriation at the ensuing session of the Chambers.

The executive branch of this Government has, as matters stand, exhausted all the authority upon the subject with which it is invested, and which it had any reason to believe could be beneficially employed.

The idea of acquiescing in the refusal to execute the treaty will not, I am confident, be for a moment entertained by any branch of this Government; and further negotiation upon the subject is equally out of the question.

If it shall be the pleasure of Congress to await the further action of the French Chambers, no further consideration of the subject will, at this session, probably be required at your hands. But if, from the original delay in asking for an appropriation, from the refusal of the Chambers to grant it when asked, from the omission to bring the subject before the Chambers at their last session, from the fact that, including that session, there have been five different occasions when the appropriation might have been made, and from the delay in convoking the Chambers until some weeks after the meeting of Congress, when it was well known that a communication of the whole subject to Congress at the last session was prevented by assurances that it should be disposed of before its present meeting, you should feel yourselves constrained to doubt whether it be the intention of the French Government in all its branches to carry the treaty into effect, and think that such measures as the occasion may be deemed to call for should be now adopted, the important question arises, what those measures shall be.

Our institutions are essentially pacific. Peace and friendly intercourse with all nations are as much the desire of our Government as they are the interest of our people. But these objects are not to be permanently secured, by surrendering the rights of our citizens, or permitting solemn treaties for their indemnity in cases of flagrant wrong, to be abrogated or set aside.

It is undoubtedly in the power of Congress seriously to affect the agricultural and manufacturing interests of France by the passage of laws relating to her trade with the United States. Her products, manufactures, and tonnage, may be subjected to heavy duties in our ports, or all commercial intercourse with her may be suspended. But there are powerful, and, to my mind, conclusive objections to this mode of proceeding. We cannot embarrass or cut off the trade of France, without, at the same time, in some degree, embarrassing or cutting off our own trade. The injury of such a warfare must fall, though unequally, upon our own citizens, and could not but impair the means of the Government, and weaken that united sentiment in support of the rights and honor of the nation which must now pervade every bosom. Nor is it impossible that such a course of legislation would introduce once more into our national councils those disturbing questions in relation to the tariff of duties which have been so recently put to rest. Besides, by every measure adopted by the Government of the United States with the view of injuring France, the clear perception of right which will induce our own people, and the rulers and people of all other nations, even of France herself, to pronounce our quarrel just, will be obscured, and the support rendered to us in a final resort to more decisive measures will be more limited and equivocal. There is but one point in the controversy, and upon that the whole civilized world must pronounce France to be in the wrong. We insist that she shall pay us a sum of money, which she has acknowledged to be due; and of the justice of this demand there can be but one opinion among mankind. True policy would seem to dictate that the question at issue should be kept thus disembarrassed, and that not the slightest pretence should be given to France to persist in her refusal to make payment, by any act on our part affecting the interests of her people. The question should be left as it is now, in such an attitude that, when France fulfils her treaty stipulations, all controversy will be at an end.

It is my conviction that the United States ought to insist on a prompt execution of the treaty, and, in case it be refused, or longer delayed, take redress into their own hands. After the delay on the part of France of a quarter of a century in acknowledging these claims by treaty, it is not to be tolerated that another quarter of a century is to be wasted in negotiating about the payment. The laws of nations provide a remedy for such occasions. It is a well settled principle of the international code, that where one nation owes another a liquidated debt, which it refuses or neglects to pay, the aggrieved party may seize on the property belonging to the other, its citizens or subjects, sufficient to pay the debt, without giving just cause of war. This remedy has been repeatedly resorted to, and recently by France herself, towards Portugal, under circumstances less unquestionable.

The time at which resort should be had to this, or any other mode of redress, is a point to be decided by Congress. If an appropriation shall not be made by the French Chambers at their next session, it may justly be concluded that the Government of France has finally determined to disregard its own solemn undertaking, and refuse to pay an acknowledged debt. In that event, every day's delay on our part will be a stain upon our national honor, as well as a denial of justice to our injured citizens. Prompt measures, when the refusal of France shall be complete, will not only be most honorable and just, but will have the best effect upon our national character.

Since France, in violation of the pledges given through her minister here, has delayed her final action so long that her decision will not probably be known in time to be communicated to this Congress, I recommend that a law be passed, authorizing reprisals upon French property, in case provision shall not be made for the payment of the debt at the approaching session of the French Chambers. Such a measure ought not to be considered by France as a menace. Her pride and power are too well known to expect any thing from her fears, and preclude the necessity of a declaration that nothing partaking of the character of intimidation is intended by us. She ought to look upon it as the evidence only of an inflexible determination on the part of the United States to insist on their rights. That Government, by doing only what it has itself acknowledged to be just, will be able to spare the United States the necessity of taking redress into their own hands, and save the property of French citizens from that seizure and sequestration which American citizens so long endured without retaliation or redress. If she should continue to refuse that act of acknowledged justice, and, in violation of the law of nations, make reprisals on our part the occasion of hostilities against the United States, she would but add violence to injustice, and could not fail to expose herself to the just censure of civilized nations, and to the retributive judgments of Heaven.

— Collision with France is the more to be regretted, on account of the position she occupies in Europe in relation to liberal institutions. But, in maintaining our national rights and honor, all Governments are alike to us. If, by a collision with France, in a case where she is clearly in the wrong, the march of liberal principles shall be impeded, the responsibility for that result, as well as every other, will rest on her own head.

Having submitted these considerations, it belongs to Congress to decide whether, after what has taken place, it will still await the further action of the French Chambers, or now adopt such provisional measures as it may deem necessary and best adapted to protect the rights and maintain the honor of the country. Whatever that decision may be, it will be faithfully enforced by the Executive, as far as he is authorized so to do.

According to the estimates of the Treasury Department, the revenue accruing from all sources, during the present year, will amount to twenty million six hundred and twenty-four thousand seven hundred and seventeen dollars, which, with the balance remaining in the Treasury on the 1st of January last, of eleven million seven hundred and two thousand nine hundred and five dollars, produces an aggregate of thirty-two million three hundred and twenty-seven thousand six hundred and twenty-three dollars. The total expenditure during the year for all objects, including the public debt, is estimated at twenty-five million five hundred and ninety-one thousand three hundred and ninety dollars, which will leave a balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1835, of six million seven hundred and thirty-six thousand two hundred and thirty-two dollars. In this balance, however, will be included about one million one hundred and fifty thousand dollars of what was heretofore reported by the department as not effective.

Of former appropriations, it is estimated that there will remain unexpended at the close of the year, eight million two thousand nine hundred and twenty-five dollars; and that, of this sum, there will not be required more than five million one hundred and forty-one thousand nine hundred and sixty-four dollars, to accomplish the objects of all the current appropriations. Thus it appears that, after satisfying all those appropriations, and after discharging the last item of our public debt, which will be done on the 1st of January next, there will remain unexpended in the Treasury an effective balance of about four hundred and forty thousand dollars. That such should be the aspect of our finances, is highly flattering to the industry and enterprise of our population, and auspicious of the wealth and prosperity which await the future cultivation of their growing resources. It is not deemed prudent, however, to recommend any change for the present in our impost rates, the effect of the gradual reduction now in progress in many of them not being sufficiently tested to guide us in determining the precise amount of revenue which they will produce.

Free from public debt, at peace with all the world, and with no complicated interests to consult in our intercourse with foreign Powers, the present may be hailed as that epoch in our history the most favorable for the settlement of those principles in our domestic policy, which shall be best calculated to give stability to our republic, and secure the blessings of freedom to our citizens. Among these principles, from our past experience, it cannot be doubted that simplicity in the character of the Federal Government, and a rigid economy in its administration, should be regarded as fundamental and sacred. All must be sensible that the existence of the public debt, by rendering taxation necessary for its extinguishment, has increased the difficulties which are inseparable from any exercise of the taxing power; and that it was, in this respect, a remote agent in producing those disturbing questions which grew out of the discussions relating to the tariff. If such has been the tendency of a debt incurred in the acquisition and maintenance of our national rights and liberties, the obligation of which all portions of the Union cheerfully acknowledged, it must be obvious, that whatever is calculated to increase the burdens of Government without necessity, must be fatal to all our hopes of preserving its true character. While we are felicitating ourselves, therefore, upon the extinguishment of the national debt, and the prosperous state of our finances, let us not be tempted to depart from those sound maxims of public policy, which enjoin a just adaptation of the revenue to the expenditures that are consistent with a rigid economy, and an entire abstinence from all topics of legislation that are not clearly within the constitutional powers of the Government, and suggested by the wants of the country. Properly regarded, under such a policy, every diminution of the public burdens arising from taxation, gives to individual enterprise increased power, and furnishes to all the members of our happy confederacy new motives for patriotic affection and support. But, above all, its most important effect will be found in its influence upon the character of the Government, by confining its action to those objects which will be sure to secure to it the attachment and support of our fellow-citizens.

Circumstances make it my duty to call the attention of Congress to the Bank of the United States. Created for the convenience of the Government, that institution has become the scourge of the people. Its interference has postponed the payment of a portion of the national debt, that it might retain the public money appropriated for that purpose, to strengthen it in a political contest—the extraordinary extension and contraction of its accommodations to the community—its corrupt and partisan loans—its exclusion of the public directors from a knowledge of its most important proceedings—the unlimited authority conferred on the president to expend its funds in hiring writers, and procuring the execution of printing, and the use made of that authority—the retention of the pension money and books after the selection of new agents—the groundless claim to heavy damages, in consequence of the protest of the bill drawn on the French Government, have, through various channels, been laid before Congress. Immediately after the close of the last session, the Bank, through its president, announced its ability and readiness to abandon the system of unparalleled curtailment, and the interruption of domestic exchanges, which it had practised upon from the 1st of August, 1833, to the 30th June, 1834, and to extend its accommodations to the community. The grounds assumed in this annunciation amounted to an acknowledgment that the curtailment, in the extent to which it had been carried, was not necessary to the safety of the Bank, and had been persisted in merely to induce Congress to grant the prayer of the Bank in its memorial relative to the removal of the deposits, and to give it a new charter. They were substantially a confession that all the real distresses which individuals and the country had endured for the preceding six or eight months, had been needlessly produced by it, with the view of affecting, through the sufferings of the people, the legislative action of Congress. It is a subject of congratulation that Congress and the country had the virtue and firmness to bear the infliction; that the energies of our people soon found relief from this wanton tyranny, in vast importations of the precious metals from almost every part of the world; and that, at the close of this tremendous effort to control our Government, the Bank found itself powerless, and no longer able to loan out its surplus means. The community had learned to manage its affairs without its assistance, and trade had already found new auxiliaries; so that, on the 1st of October last, the extraordinary spectacle was presented of a National Bank, more than one-half of whose capital was either lying unproductive in its vaults, or in the hands of foreign bankers.

To the needless distresses brought on the country during the last session of Congress, has since been added the open seizure of the dividends on the public stock, to the amount of one hundred and seventy thousand and forty-one dollars, under pretence of paying damages, cost, and interest, upon the protested French bill. This sum constituted a portion of the estimated revenues for the year 1834, upon which the appropriations made by Congress were based. It would as soon have been expected that our collectors would seize on the customs, or the receivers of our land offices on the moneys arising from the sale of public lands, under pretences of claims against the United States, as that the Bank would have retained the dividends. Indeed, if the principle be established; that any one who chooses to set up a claim against the United States may, without authority of law, seize on the public property or money, wherever he can find it, to pay such claim, there will remain no assurance that our revenue will reach the Treasury, or that it will be applied, after the appropriation, to the purposes designated in the law. The paymasters of our army, and the pursers of our navy, may, under like pretences, apply to their own use moneys appropriated to set in motion the public force, and in time of war leave the country without defence. This measure, resorted to by the Bank, is disorganizing and revolutionary, and, if generally resorted to by private citizens in like cases, would fill the land with anarchy and violence.

It is a constitutional provision, that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." The palpable object of this provision is to prevent the expenditure of the public money, for any purpose whatsoever, which shall not have been first approved by the representatives of the people and the States, in Congress assembled. It vests the power of declaring for what purposes the public money shall be expended in the Legislative Department of the Government, to the exclusion of the Executive and Judicial; and it is not within the constitutional authority of either of those departments to pay it away without law, or to sanction its payment. According to this plain constitutional provision, the claim of the Bank can never be paid without an appropriation by act of Congress. But the Bank has never asked for an appropriation. It attempts to defeat the provision of the constitution, and obtain payment without an act of Congress. Instead of awaiting an appropriation passed by both Houses, and approved by the President, it makes an appropriation for itself, and invites an appeal to the Judiciary to sanction it. That the money had not technically been paid into the Treasury, does not affect the principle intended to be established by the constitution. The Executive and Judiciary have as little right to appropriate and expend the public money without authority of law, before it is placed to the credit of the Treasurer, as to take it from the Treasury. In the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in his correspondence with the president of the Bank, and the opinions of the Attorney General accompanying it, you will find a further examination of the claims of the Bank, and the course it has pursued.

It seems due to the safety of the public funds remaining in that Bank, and to the honor of the American people, that measures be taken to separate the Government entirely from an institution so mischievous to the public prosperity, and so regardless of the constitution and laws. By transferring the public deposits; by appointing other pension agents, as far as it had the power; by ordering the discontinuance of the receipt of Bank checks in payment of the public dues after the first day of January next, the Executive has exerted all its lawful authority to sever the connexion between the Government and this faithless corporation.

The high-handed career of this institution imposes upon the constitutional functionaries of this Government, duties of the gravest and most imperative character—duties which they cannot avoid, and from which, I trust, there will be no inclination on the part of any of them to shrink. My own sense of them is most clear, as is also my readiness to discharge those which may rightfully fall on me. To continue any business relations with the Bank of the United States, that may be avoided without a violation of the national faith, after that institution has set at open defiance the conceded right of the Government to examine its affairs; after it has done all in its power to deride the public authority in other respects, and to bring it into disrepute at home and abroad; after it has attempted to defeat the clearly expressed will of the people, by turning against them the immense power entrusted to its hands, and, by involving a country, otherwise peaceful, flourishing, and happy, in dissension, embarrassment, and distress, would make the nation itself a party to the degradation so sedulously prepared for its public agents, and do much to destroy the confidence of mankind in popular Governments, and to bring into contempt their authority and efficiency. In guarding against an evil of such magnitude, considerations of temporary convenience should be thrown out of the question, and we should be influenced by such motives only as look to the honor and preservation of the republican system. Deeply and solemnly impressed with the justice of these views, I feel it to be my duty to recommend to you that a law be passed authorizing the sale of the public stock; that the provision of the charter requiring the receipt of notes of the Bank in payment of public dues, shall, in accordance with the power reserved to Congress in the 14th section of the charter, be suspended until the Bank pays to the Treasury the dividends withheld; and that all laws connecting the Government or its officers with the Bank, directly or indirectly, be repealed; and that the institution be left hereafter to its own resources and means.

Events have satisfied my mind, and I think the minds of the American people, that the mischiefs and dangers which flow from a National Bank far overbalance all its advantages. The bold effort the present Bank has made to control the Government, the distresses it has wantonly produced, the violence of which it has been the occasion in one of our cities famed for its observance of law and order, are but premonitions of the fate which awaits the American people should they be deluded into a perpetuation of this institution, or the establishment of another like it. It is fervently hoped that, thus admonished, those who have heretofore favored the establishment of a substitute for the present Bank, will be induced to abandon it, as it is evidently better to incur any inconvenience that may be reasonably expected, than to concentrate the whole moneyed power of the republic in any form whatsoever, or under any restrictions.

Happily it is already illustrated that the agency of such an institution is not necessary to the fiscal operations of the Government. The State banks are found fully adequate to the performance of all services which were required of the Bank of the United States, quite as promptly, and with the same cheapness. They have maintained themselves, and discharged all these duties, while the Bank of the United States was still powerful, and in the field as an open enemy; and it is not possible to conceive that they will find greater difficulties in their operations, when that enemy shall cease to exist.

The attention of Congress is earnestly invited to the regulation of the deposits in the State banks, by law. Although the power now exercised by the Executive Department in this behalf is only such as was uniformly exerted through every administration, from the origin of the Government up to the establishment of the present Bank, yet, it is one which is susceptible of regulation by law, and, therefore, ought so to be regulated. The power of Congress to direct in what places the Treasurer shall keep the moneys in the Treasury, and to impose restrictions upon the Executive authority in relation to their custody and removal, is unlimited, and its exercise will rather be courted than discouraged by those public officers and agents on whom rests the responsibility for their safety. It is desirable that as little power as possible should be left to the President or Secretary of the Treasury over those institutions; which, being thus freed from Executive influence, and without a common head to direct their operations, would have neither the temptation nor the ability to interfere in the political conflicts of the country. Not deriving their charters from the national authorities, they would never have those inducements to meddle in general elections, which have led the Bank of the United States to agitate and convulse the country for upwards of two years.

The progress of our gold coinage is creditable to the officers of the mint, and promises in a short period to furnish the country with a sound and portable currency, which will much diminish the inconvenience to travellers of the want of a general paper currency, should the State banks be incapable of furnishing it. Those institutions have already shown themselves competent to purchase and furnish domestic exchange for the convenience of trade, at reasonable rates, and not a doubt is entertained that, in a short period, all the wants of the country in bank accommodations and in exchange will be supplied as promptly and cheaply as they have heretofore been by the Bank of the United States. If the several States shall be induced gradually to reform their banking systems, and prohibit the issue of all small notes, we shall, in a few years, have a currency as sound, and as little liable to fluctuations, as any other commercial country.

The report of the Secretary of War, together with the accompanying documents from the several bureaux of that department, will exhibit the situation of the various objects committed to its administration.

No event has occurred since your last session rendering necessary any movements of the army, with the exception of the expedition of the regiment of dragoons into the territory of the wandering and predatory tribes inhabiting the western frontier, and living adjacent to the Mexican boundary. These tribes have been heretofore known to us principally by their attacks upon our own citizens, and upon other Indians entitled to the protection of the United States. It became necessary for the peace of the frontiers to check these habitual inroads, and I am happy to inform you that the object has been effected without the commission of any act of hostility. Colonel Dodge, and the troops under his command, have acted with equal firmness and humanity, and an arrangement has been made with those Indians, which it is hoped will assure their permanent pacific relations with the United States and the other tribes of Indians upon that border. It is to be regretted that the prevalence of sickness in that quarter has deprived the country of a number of valuable lives, and particularly that General Leavenworth, an officer well known and esteemed for his gallant services during the late war, and for subsequent good conduct, has fallen a victim to his zeal and exertions in the discharge of his duty.

The army is in a high state of discipline. Its moral condition, so far as that is known here, is good, and the various branches of the public service are carefully attended to. It is amply sufficient, under its present organization, for providing the necessary garrisons for the seaboard and for the defence of the internal frontier, and also for preserving the elements of military knowledge, and for keeping pace with those improvements which modern experience is continually making. And these objects appear to me to embrace all the legitimate purposes for which a permanent military force should be maintained in our country. The lessons of history teach us its danger, and the tendency which exists to an increase. This can be best met and averted by a just caution on the part of the public itself, and of those who represent them in Congress.

From the duties which devolve on the Engineer Department, and upon the Topographical Engineers, a different organization seems to be demanded by the public interest, and I recommend the subject to your consideration.

No important change has, during this season, taken place in the condition of the Indians. Arrangements are in progress for the removal of the Creeks, and will soon be for the removal of the Seminoles. I regret that the Cherokees east of the Mississippi have not yet determined to remove. How long the personal causes which have hitherto retarded that ultimately inevitable measure, will continue to operate, I am unable to conjecture. It is certain, however, that delay will bring with it accumulated evils, which will render their condition more and more unpleasant. The experience of every year adds to the conviction that emigration, and that alone, can preserve from destruction the remnant of the tribes yet living among us. The facility with which the necessities of life are procured, and the treaty stipulations providing aid for the emigrant Indians in their agricultural pursuits, and in the important concern of education, and their removal from those causes which have heretofore depressed all and destroyed many of the tribes, cannot fail to stimulate their exertions and to reward their industry.

The two laws passed at the last session of Congress on the subject of Indian affairs, have been carried into effect, and detailed instructions for their administration have been given. It will be seen by the estimates for the present session that a great reduction will take place in the expenditures of the department in consequence of these laws. And there is reason to believe that their operation will be salutary, and that the colonization of the Indians on the western frontier, together with a judicious system of administration, will still further reduce the expenses of this branch of the public service, and at the same time promote its usefulness and efficiency.

Circumstances have been recently developed, showing the existence of extensive frauds under the various laws granting pensions and gratuities for revolutionary services. It is impossible to estimate the amount which may have been thus fraudulently obtained from the National Treasury. I am satisfied, however, it has been such as to justify a re-examination of the system, and the adoption of the necessary checks in its administration. All will agree, that the services and sufferings of the remnant of our revolutionary band should be fully compensated. But while this is done, every proper precaution should be taken to prevent the admission of fabricated and fraudulent claims. In the present mode of proceeding, the attestations and certificates of the judicial officers of the various States, form a considerable portion of the checks which are interposed against the commission of frauds. These, however, have been, and may be, fabricated, and in such a way as to elude detection at the examining offices. And independently of this practical difficulty; it is ascertained that these documents are often loosely granted; sometimes even blank certificates have been issued; sometimes prepared papers have been signed without inquiry; and, in one instance at least, the seal of the court has been within reach of a person most interested in its improper application. It is obvious that, under such circumstances, no severity of administration can check the abuse of the law; and information has, from time to time, been communicated to the Pension Office, questioning or denying the right of persons placed upon the pension list, to the bounty of the country. Such cautions are always attended to, and examined. But a far more general investigation is called for. And I therefore recommend, in conformity with the suggestion of the Secretary of War, that an actual inspection should be made, in each State, into the circumstances and claims of every person now drawing a pension. The honest veteran has nothing to fear from such a scrutiny, while the fraudulent claimant will be detected, and the public treasury relieved to an amount, I have reason to believe, far greater than has heretofore been suspected. The details of such a plan could be so regulated as to interpose the necessary checks, without any burdensome operation upon the pensioners. The object should be twofold:

1. To look into the original justice of the claims, so far as this can be done under a proper system of regulations, by an examination of the claimants themselves, and by inquiring, in the vicinity of their residence, into their history, and into the opinion entertained of their revolutionary services.

2. To ascertain, in all cases, whether the original claimant is living, and this by actual personal inspection.

This measure will, if adopted, be productive, I think, of the desired results, and I therefore recommend it to your consideration, with the further suggestion, that all payments should be suspended till the necessary reports are received.

It will be seen, by a tabular statement annexed to the documents transmitted to Congress, that the appropriations for objects connected with the War Department, made at the last session, for the service of the year 1834, excluding the permanent appropriation for the payment of military gratuities under the act of June 7, 1832, the appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars for arming and equipping the militia, and the appropriation of ten thousand dollars for the civilization of the Indians, which are not annually renewed, amounted to the sum of nine million three thousand two hundred and sixty-one dollars, and that the estimates of appropriations necessary for the same branch of service, for the year 1835 amount to the sum of five million seven hundred and seventy-eight thousand nine hundred and sixty-four dollars, making a difference in the appropriations of the current year over the estimates of appropriations for the next, of three million two hundred and twenty-four thousand two hundred and ninety-seven dollars.

The principal causes which have operated at this time to produce this great difference, are shown in the reports and documents, and in the detailed estimates. Some of these causes are accidental and temporary, while others are permanent, and, aided by a just course of administration, may continue to operate beneficially upon the public expenditures.

A just economy, expending where the public service requires, and withholding where it does not, is among the indispensable duties of the Government.

I refer you to the accompanying report of the Secretary of the Navy, and to the documents with it, for a full view of the operations of that important branch of our service, during the present year. It will be seen that the wisdom and liberality with which Congress have provided for the gradual increase of our navy material, have been seconded by a corresponding zeal and fidelity on the part of those to whom has been confided the execution of the laws on the subject, and that but a short period would now be required to put in commission a force large enough for any exigency into which the country may be thrown.

When we reflect upon our position in relation to other nations, it must be apparent that, in the event of conflicts with them, we must look chiefly to our navy for the protection of our national rights. The wide seas which separate us from other Governments, must of necessity be the theatre on which an enemy will aim to assail us, and, unless we are prepared to meet him on this element, we cannot be said to possess the power requisite to repel or prevent aggressions. We cannot, therefore, watch with too much attention this arm of our defence, or cherish with too much care the means by which it can possess the necessary efficiency and extension. To this end our policy has been heretofore wisely directed to the constant employment of a force sufficient to guard our commerce, and to the rapid accumulation of the materials, which are necessary to repair our vessels, and construct with ease such new ones as may be required in a state of war.

In accordance with this policy, I recommend to your consideration the erection of the additional dry dock described by the Secretary of the Navy, and also the construction of the steam batteries to which he has referred, for the purpose of testing their efficiency as auxiliaries to the system of defence now in use.

The report of the Postmaster General, herewith submitted, exhibits the condition and prospects of that department. From that document, it appears that there was a deficit in the funds of the department, at the commencement of the present year, beyond its available means, of three hundred and fifteen thousand five hundred and ninety-nine dollars and ninety-eight cents, which, on the 1st of July last, had been reduced to two hundred and sixty-eight thousand and ninety-two dollars and seventy-four cents. It appears, also, that the revenues for the coming year will exceed the expenditures about two hundred and seventy thousand dollars, which, with the excess of revenue which will result from the operations of the current half year, may be expected, independently of any increase in the gross amount of postages, to supply the entire deficit before the end of 1835. But as this calculation is based on the gross amount of postages which had accrued within the period embraced by the times of striking the balances, it is obvious that, without a progressive increase in the amount of postages, the existing retrenchments must be persevered in through the year 1836, that the department may accumulate a surplus fund sufficient to place it in a condition of perfect ease.

It will be observed that the revenues of the Post Office Department, though they have increased, and their amount is above that of any former year, have yet fallen short of the estimates more than a hundred thousand dollars. This is attributed, in a great degree, to the increase of free letters growing out of the extension and abuse of the franking privilege. There has been a gradual increase in the number of executive officers to which it has been granted; and, by an act passed in March, 1833, it was extended to members of Congress throughout the whole year. It is believed that a revision of the laws relative to the franking privilege, with some enactments to enforce more rigidly the restriction under which it is granted, would operate beneficially to the country, by enabling the department, at an earlier period, to restore the mail facilities that have been withdrawn, and to extend them more widely as the growing settlements of the country may require.

To a measure so important to the Government, and so just to our constituents, who ask no exclusive privileges for themselves, and are not willing to concede them to others, I earnestly recommend the serious attention of Congress.

The importance of the Post Office Department, and the magnitude to which it has grown, both in its revenues and in its operations, seem to demand its reorganization by law. The whole of its receipts and disbursements have hitherto been left entirely to Executive control and individual discretion. The principle is as sound in relation to this as to any other department of the Government, that as little discretion should be confided to the executive officer who controls it, as is compatible with its efficiency. It is therefore earnestly recommended that it be organized with an Auditor and Treasurer of its own, appointed by the President and Senate, who shall be branches of the Treasury Department.

Your attention is again respectfully invited to the defect which exists in the judicial system of the United States. Nothing can be more desirable than the uniform operation of the Federal Judiciary throughout the several States, all of which, standing on the same footing as members of the Union, have equal rights to the advantages and benefits resulting from its laws. This object is not attained by the judicial acts now in force, because they leave one-fourth of the States without circuit courts.

It is undoubtedly the duty of Congress to place all the States on the same footing in this respect, either by the creation of an additional number of associate judges, or by an enlargement of the circuits assigned to those already appointed, so as to include the new States.

Whatever may be the difficulty in a proper organization of the judicial system, so as to secure its efficiency and uniformity in all parts of the Union, and at the same time to avoid such an increase of judges as would encumber the supreme appellate tribunal, it should not be allowed to weigh against the great injustice which the present operation of the system produces.

I trust that I may be also pardoned for renewing the recommendation I have so often submitted to your attention, in regard to the mode of electing the President and Vice President of the United States. All the reflection I have been able to bestow upon the subject increases my conviction that the best interests of the country will be promoted by the adoption of some plan which will secure, in all contingencies, that important right of sovereignty to the direct control of the people. Could this be attained, and the terms of those officers be limited to a single period of either four or six years, I think our liberties would possess an additional safeguard.

At your last session I called the attention of Congress to the destruction of the public building occupied by the Treasury Department. As the public interest requires that another building should be erected, with as little delay as possible, it is hoped that the means will be seasonably provided, and that they will be ample enough to authorize such an enlargement and improvement in the plan of the building as will more effectually accommodate the public officers, and secure the public documents deposited in it from the casualties of fire.

I have not been able to satisfy myself that the bill entitled "An act to improve the navigation of the Wabash river," which was sent to me at the close of your last session, ought to pass, and I have, therefore, withheld from it my approval, and now return it to the Senate, the body in which it originated.

There can be no question connected with the administration of public affairs, more important or more difficult to be satisfactorily dealt with, than that which relates to the rightful authority and proper action of the Federal Government upon the subject of internal improvements. To inherent embarrassments have been added others resulting from the course of our legislation concerning it.

I have heretofore communicated freely with Congress upon this subject; and, in adverting to it again, I cannot refrain from expressing my increased conviction of its extreme importance, as well in regard to its bearing upon the maintenance of the constitution, and the prudent management of the public revenue, as on account of its disturbing effect upon the harmony of the Union.

We are in no danger from violations of the constitution by which encroachments are made upon the personal rights of the citizen. The sentence of condemnation long since pronounced by the American people upon acts of that character, will, I doubt not, continue to prove as salutary in its effects as it is irreversible in its nature. But against the dangers of unconstitutional acts which, instead of menacing the vengeance of offended authority, proffer local advantages, and bring in their train the patronage of the Government, we are, I fear, not so safe. To suppose that because our Government has been instituted for the benefit of the people, it must therefore have the power to do whatever may seem to conduce to the public good, is an error, into which even honest minds are too apt to fall. In yielding themselves to this fallacy, they overlook the great considerations in which the Federal Constitution was founded. They forget that, in consequence of the conceded diversities in the interest and condition of the different States, it was foreseen, at the period of its adoption, that although a particular measure of the Government might be beneficial and proper in one State, it might be the reverse in another—that it was for this reason the States would not consent to make a grant to the Federal Government of the general and usual powers of Government, but of such only as were specifically enumerated, and the probable effects of which they could, as they thought, safely anticipate; and they forget also the paramount obligation upon all to abide by the compact, then so solemnly, and, as it was hoped, so firmly established. In addition to the dangers to the constitution, springing from the sources I have stated, there has been one which was perhaps greater than all. I allude to the materials which this subject has afforded for sinister appeals to selfish feelings, and the opinion heretofore so extensively entertained of its adaptation to the purposes of personal ambition. With such stimulants it is not surprising that the acts and pretensions of the Federal Government in this behalf should sometimes have been carried to an alarming extent. The questions which have arisen upon this subject have related—

1st. To the power of making internal improvements within the limits of a State, with the right of territorial jurisdiction, sufficient at least for their preservation and use.

2d. To the right of appropriating money in aid of such works when carried on by a State, or by a company in virtue of State authority, surrendering the claim of jurisdiction; and

3d. To the propriety of appropriations for improvements of a particular class, viz. for light-houses, beacons, buoys, public piers, and for the removal of sand bars, sawyers, and other temporary and partial impediments in our navigable rivers and harbors.

The claims of power for the General Government upon each of these points certainly present matter of the deepest interest. The first is, however, of much the greatest importance, inasmuch as, in addition to the dangers of unequal and impropident expenditures of public moneys, common to all, there is superadded to that the conflicting jurisdictions of the respective Governments. Federal jurisdiction, at least to the extent I have stated, has been justly regarded by its advocates as necessarily appurtenant to the power in question, if that exists by the constitution. That the most injurious conflicts would unavoidably arise between the respective jurisdictions of the State and Federal Governments, in the absence of a constitutional provision marking out their respective boundaries, cannot be doubted. The local advantages to be obtained would induce the States to overlook, in the beginning, the dangers and difficulties to which they might ultimately be exposed. The powers exercised by the Federal Government would soon be regarded with jealousy by the State authorities, and, originating as they must from implication or assumption, it would be impossible to affix to them certain and safe limits. Opportunities and temptations to the assumption of power incompatible with State sovereignty would be increased, and those barriers which resist the tendency of our system towards consolidation greatly weakened. The officers and agents of the General Government might not always have the discretion to abstain from intermeddling with State concerns; and if they did, they would not always escape the suspicion of having done so. Collisions and consequent irritations would spring up; that harmony which should ever exist between the General Government and each member of the confederacy, would be frequently interrupted; a spirit of contention would be engendered, and the dangers of disunion greatly multiplied.

Yet we all know that, notwithstanding these grave objections, this dangerous doctrine was at one time apparently proceeding to its final establishment with fearful rapidity. The desire to embark the Federal Government in works of internal improvement, prevailed, in the highest degree, during the first session of the first Congress that I had the honor to meet in my present situation. When the bill authorizing a subscription on the part of the United States for stock in the Maysville and Lexington Turnpike Company, passed the two Houses, there had been reported, by the Committees on Internal Improvements, bills containing appropriations for such objects, inclusive of those for the Cumberland road, and for harbors and light-houses, to the amount of about one hundred and six millions of dollars. In this amount was included authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe for the stock of different companies to a great extent, and the residue was principally for the direct construction of roads by this Government. In addition to these projects, which had been presented to the two Houses under the sanction and recommendation of their respective Committees on Internal Improvements, there were then still pending before the committees, and in memorials presented, but not referred, different projects for works of a similar character, the expense of which cannot be estimated with certainty, but must have exceeded one hundred millions of dollars.

Regarding the bill authorizing a subscription to the stock of the Maysville and Lexington Turnpike Company as the entering wedge of a system, which, however weak at first, might soon become strong enough to rive the bands of the Union asunder, and believing that, if its passage was acquiesced in by the Executive and the people, there would no longer be any limitation upon the authority of the General Government in respect to the appropriation of money for such objects, I deemed it an imperative duty to withhold from it the Executive approval. Although, from the obviously local character of that work, I might well have contented myself with a refusal to approve the bill upon that ground, yet, sensible of the vital importance of the subject, and anxious that my views and opinions in regard to the whole matter should be fully understood by Congress, and by my constituents, I felt it my duty to go further. I therefore embraced that early occasion to apprise Congress that, in my opinion, the constitution did not confer upon it the power to authorize the construction of ordinary roads and canals within the limits of a State, and to say, respectfully, that no bill admitting such a power could receive my official sanction. I did so in the confident expectation that the speedy settlement of the public mind upon the whole subject would be greatly facilitated by the difference between the two Houses and myself, and that the harmonious action of the several departments of the Federal Government in regard to it would be ultimately secured.

So far at least as it regards this branch of the subject, my best hopes have been realized. Nearly four years have elapsed, and several sessions of Congress have intervened, and no attempt, within my recollection, has been made to induce Congress to exercise this power. The applications for the construction of roads and canals, which were formerly multiplied upon your files, are no longer presented; and we have good reason to infer that the current of public sentiment has become so decided against the pretension as effectually to discourage its reassertion. So thinking, I derive the greatest satisfaction from the conviction that thus much at least has been secured upon this important and embarrassing subject.

From attempts to appropriate the national funds to objects which are confessedly of a local character, we cannot, I trust, have any thing further to apprehend. My views in regard to the expediency of making appropriations for works which are claimed to be of a national character, and prosecuted under State authority, assuming that Congress have the right to do so, were stated in my annual message to Congress in 1830, and also in that containing my objections to the Maysville Road bill.

So thoroughly convinced am I that no such appropriations ought to be made by Congress, until a suitable constitutional provision is made upon the subject, and so essential do I regard the point to the highest interests of our country, that I could not consider myself as discharging my duty to my constituents in giving the Executive sanction to any bill containing such an appropriation. If the people of the United States desire that the public treasury shall be resorted to for the means to prosecute such works, they will concur in an amendment of the constitution, prescribing a rule by which the national character of the works is to be tested, and by which the greatest practicable equality of benefits may be secured to each member of the confederacy. The effects of such a regulation would be most salutary in preventing unprofitable expenditures, in securing our legislation from the pernicious consequences of a scramble for the favors of Government, and in repressing the spirit of discontent which must inevitably arise from an unequal distribution of treasures which belong alike to all.

There is another class of appropriations for what may be called, without impropriety, internal improvements, which have always been regarded as standing upon different grounds from those to which I have referred. I allude to such as have for their object the improvement of our harbors, the removal of partial and temporary obstructions in our navigable rivers, for the facility and security of our foreign commerce. The grounds upon which I distinguished appropriations of this character from others have already been stated to Congress. I will now only add that at the first session of Congress under the new constitution, it was provided, by law, that all expenses which should accrue from and after the 15th day of August, 1789, in the necessary support, and maintenance, and repairs of all light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, erected, placed, or sunk, before the passage of the act, within any bay, inlet, harbor, or port of the United States, for rendering the navigation thereof easy and safe, should be defrayed out of the Treasury of the United States; and, further, that it should be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide, by contracts, with the approbation of the President, for rebuilding, when necessary, and keeping in good repair the light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, in the several States, and for furnishing them with supplies. Appropriations for similar objects have been continued from that time to the present, without interruption or dispute. As a natural consequence of the increase and extension of our foreign commerce, ports of entry and delivery have been multiplied and established, not only upon our seaboard, but in the interior of the country, upon our lakes and navigable rivers. The convenience and safety of this commerce have led to the gradual extension of these expenditures; to the erection of light-houses; the placing, planting, and sinking of buoys, beacons, and piers, and to the removal of partial and temporary obstructions in our navigable rivers, and in the harbors upon our great lakes, as well as on the seaboard. Although I have expressed to Congress my apprehension that these expenditures have sometimes been extravagant, and disproportionate to the advantages to be derived from them, I have not felt it to be my duty to refuse my assent to bills containing them, and have contented myself to follow, in this respect, in the footsteps of all my predecessors. Sensible, however, from experience and observation, of the great abuses to which the unrestricted exercise of this authority of Congress was exposed, I have prescribed a limitation for the government of my own conduct, by which expenditures of this character are confined to places below the ports of entry or delivery established by law. I am very sensible that this restriction is not as satisfactory as could be desired, and that much embarrassment may be caused to the Executive Department in its execution, by appropriations for remote, and not well understood, objects. But as neither my own reflections, nor the lights which I may properly derive from other sources, have supplied me with a better, I shall continue to apply my best exertions to a faithful application of the rule upon which it is founded. I sincerely regret that I could not give my assent to the bill entitled "An act to improve the navigation of the Wabash river;" but I could not have done so without receding from the ground which I have, upon the fullest consideration, taken upon this subject, and of which Congress has been heretofore apprised, and without throwing the subject again open to abuses which no good citizen, entertaining my opinions, could desire.

I rely upon the intelligence and candor of my fellow-citizens, in whose liberal indulgence I have already so largely participated for a correct appreciation of my motives in interposing, as I have done, on this, and other occasions, checks to a course of legislation which, without, in the slightest degree, calling in question the motives of others, I consider as sanctioning improper and unconstitutional expenditures of public treasure.

I am not hostile to internal improvements, and wish to see them extended to every part of the country. But I am fully persuaded, if they are not commenced in a proper manner, confined to proper objects, and conducted under an authority generally conceded to be rightful, that a successful prosecution of them cannot be reasonably expected. The attempt will meet with resistance, where it might otherwise receive support, and, instead of strengthening the bonds of our confederacy, it will only multiply and aggravate the causes of disunion.

ANDREW JACKSON.

DECEMBER 1, 1834.

DOCUMENTS ACCOMPANYING THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

WAR DEPARTMENT, NOV 27, 1834.

To the President of the United States :

SIR: The annual period for submitting to you a statement of the proceedings of this Department having arrived, I have the honor, in conformity with your instructions, to lay before you an abstract of its operations, together with the reports and estimates from the various bureaux, exhibiting the condition of those branches of the public service connected with its administration.

Since my last annual report, no military movement of any importance, with the exception of the expedition of the regiment of dragoons, has been rendered necessary. The reports and information which have reached the Department respecting the situation of the Army are highly gratifying. In its discipline, its moral character, and the general performance of its duties, the Government and the country have every reason to be satisfied with its condition and prospects. As a safeguard for the frontiers, as a school of practical instruction, as a depository of military information, and as the means of preparing and providing in peace for the exigencies of war, the present military establishment has fully answered the objects of its organization and support. And it is but an act of justice to state that, in all the essential requisites of capacity and conduct, the officers of the American Army do honor to themselves and their country.

It is known to you that some of the Western tribes of Indians, roaming through the extensive prairies West of Arkansas and Missouri, particularly the Camanches and Kiawas, have, for some years, interrupted the peace of that quarter by predatory attacks upon our citizens, and upon the indigenous and emigrant Indians whom we are under obligations to protect. Their war parties have annoyed our citizens in their intercourse with the Mexican States, and have rendered the communication difficult and hazardous. It became necessary to put a stop to this state of things, either by amicable representations or by force. Those remote tribes have little knowledge of the strength of the United States, or of their own relative weakness, and it was hoped that the display of a respectable military force, for the first time in their country, would satisfy them that further hostilities would lead to their destruction.

The dragoons being peculiarly adapted to this service, were ordered to penetrate into that region, and to endeavor, by peaceable remonstrances, to establish permanent tranquillity; and, if these should fail, to repel any hostile demonstrations which might be made. Fortunately, the efforts to introduce amicable relations were successful, and the object of the expedition was obtained without a single act of hostility. Colonel Dodge, who led the expedition, and his whole command, appear to have performed their duties in the most satisfactory manner; and they encountered, with firmness, the privations incident to the harassing service upon which they were ordered. It is to be regretted that the prevalence of sickness prevented the whole regiment from joining in this duty, as the same zeal for the public interest pervaded the whole; that sickness deprived the country of some valuable lives, and, among others, of Brigadier General Leavenworth. Impelled by his anxiety to forward the views of the Government, he exposed himself, while yet weak, to the hardships of the border campaign, and sunk under the malady which these induced. His high personal character, his services during the late war, and his exemplary official conduct since, are too well known to you to require from me any thing more than this brief allusion to his worth and fate.

Among the accompanying documents will be found a full statement of the proceedings of Col. Dodge, and of the satisfactory result of his expedition.

The report of the Chief Engineer contains a summary of the various objects entrusted to his supervision, and of their progress and condition. It will be seen that the Cumberland road, East of Wheeling, will be soon completed in the manner required by an act of last session, and for the amount allowed by law. No further appropriation will be asked for. As much progress has been made in the other works, as the advanced state of the season when the appropriations were made would permit.

I beg leave to ask your particular attention to that part of the report of the Chief Engineer, which recommends an addition to the number of officers of his corps. I believe the public service requires this measure. New duties have recently been imposed upon the Engineer corps, by express acts of Congress; while, in other cases, it has been found necessary, by executive regulation, to require from the officers services not originally contemplated in the organization of the department. The erection of fortifications, the construction of roads, the establishment of fixed points by astronomical observations in boundary lines, and the improvement of harbors and rivers, are among the objects committed to the Engineer officers. And I feel bound to report to you, that, as far as my observation or information has extended, their duties have been performed in the most satisfactory and exemplary manner. In scientific acquirements, and in their practical application, these officers are deserving of high commendation, and it is very desirable that their numbers should be so far augmented, as to insure their personal attention to all the objects within the control of the Engineer Department. This cannot now be done; and the public service suffers in consequence of it.

Similar reasons call for a re-organization of the topographical corps, and the officer at the head of it has submitted a projet for this purpose; which, while it will render that corps more efficient, will not increase the public expense. I ask for it your favorable consideration. The duties connected with this branch of the service require peculiar attainments, and great practical experience. They can best be performed by officers devoting their whole time and attention to the subject. A system of detail requiring periodical changes, however proper it may be with relation to a just routine of military duties, so long as temporary assistants are selected from, and continued in the line of the army, it is still not calculated to ensure the best execution of the functions appropriately belonging to the topographical engineers. The remedy would be to remodel the corps, and permanently to attach to it as many officers as may be necessary; and, by consolidating with it the civil engineers, the general operations would be simplified, and the duties of the corps might embrace all the objects connected with surveys for civil or military purposes. There is in this corps a fund of experience and information, which cannot but be useful to the country.

It will be seen, by adverting to the report of the officer in charge of the Topographical Bureau, that difficulties have occurred in the execution of the joint resolution of Congress, passed at the last session, and providing for the construction of a railroad through the public grounds at Harper's Ferry. Some modification will be necessary, before the object of Congress and of the Company can be attained; and this may probably be effected by requiring the latter to pay the value of any improvements injured by the road; or by giving authority to replace them in other positions, should they be deemed of sufficient importance to require being paid for or removed.

The present condition of the work at the Delaware Breakwater, is shown in the report of the Quartermaster General, and in that of the commission lately instituted by your orders to examine it. It has been known, for some time, that gradual depositions were making in the vicinity of this work, by which the depth of water was somewhat reduced; but, until this season, the process was so slow and uncertain, that no anxiety was felt with respect to its final effect upon this great national improvement. Recently, however, the accumulation of sand in the artificial harbor has been much more rapid, and indicated the necessity of a thorough examination by scientific persons, in order to ascertain, if possible, the causes of this occurrence, and to check or obviate them. The views of the officers selected for this purpose will be found in their report, and, agreeably to your directions, they have been adopted by the Department. An estimate for one hundred thousand dollars, to be applied to this work, is among the annual estimates of the Department, and, if approved by Congress, that sum will be appropriated in the manner pointed out by the report, to the completion of that part of the work already begun, and yet unfinished. In the mean time, by a series of observations frequently and carefully taken, the probable operation of the tides and currents may be ascertained, and the best remedy to counteract them pointed out.

The act of March 21, 1829, "to continue the present mode of supplying the army of the United States," expires, by its own limitation, on the 2d of March next. The Subsistence Department, which was continued by this act, has been found highly useful to the army and beneficial to the public, by the efficiency and economy of its administration. From my own knowledge of its officers and operations, as well as from what I have otherwise learned of these, I feel called upon to present this subject particularly to your attention, satisfied that the continuance of the department is demanded by the best interests of the service.

The reports of the Major General, and of the other heads of bureaux, will communicate all necessary information in relation to subjects respectively committed to them. I am not aware that there is any particular matter requiring your special attention. These reports are satisfactory in the views they exhibit of the course of administration, and of the reduced expenditures which are required for the service of the coming year.

At the last session of Congress, so much of the laws as authorized the conferring of brevets for ten years' service in one grade was repealed, and the nominations of all officers, who had completed that term prior to the repeal, was confirmed. This change seems to bear with some severity upon those who had served during the greater portion, tho' not the whole, of such term. The existing laws, and the practice under them, held out to all officers, as an inducement to good conduct, the prospect of promotion after ten years' faithful services in one grade. In military life the hope of professional distinction is essential to a high and honorable discharge of the duties to which its members are devoted. If this is destroyed or neglected, little more than a mechanical execution of these duties can be expected. In our army this sentiment is as dear and as much cherished as in any other, and if not the cause, it is certainly the accompaniment, of anxious devotion to the public interest. All the officers who, before the repeal of this law, had entered upon what may be termed their probation, expected, and had a right to expect, that if at its termination they should have complied with the condition by faithful service, the reward held out would be granted to them. I venture respectfully to suggest, whether justice does not require such a modification of this law as to authorize the granting of brevets to every one, whose term of ten years had commenced before its repeal, at the end of such term, if the conditions of the law shall be fulfilled: This would insure the ultimate abolition of the practice which Congress had in view, while it would seem to be giving due weight to claims founded, if not in right, certainly in strong considerations connected with the services and situation of the officers. This valuable class of the community is exposed to every vicissitude incident to climate and situation, and the pecuniary considerations they receive is barely sufficient to enable them to meet the demands to which they are liable.

Disclosures have been made during the past season, showing the necessity of a thorough investigation into the operation of the laws granting pensions and gratuities for military services. It is ascertained that many frauds have been committed, some in the application for pensions, and others in the continuance of these payments. As these disclosures have been the result of accident, it is impossible to judge to what extent frauds may have been committed, but enough has occurred to satisfy me that some new mode of proceeding is essentially necessary to detect and check these abuses.

In the administration of the laws on this subject, the parties are required to make certain declarations before the judicial tribunals; and the opinions of these tribunals are requested, in order to determine the validity of the application. In the administrative examination of the papers submitted in support of a claim, if the name of the applicant is found upon the recorded muster rolls, and his identity is established by his own declaration and the proper certificates, the pension is granted as a matter of course.

In far the greater number of cases, however, no muster rolls of the corps exist, and frequently where they do exist, they are defective, and a resort to other testimony, in the examination of the claim, becomes therefore necessary. Here, a more detailed statement of services is required from the party—combining the various circumstances connected with such duty, best calculated to enable the proper examining officers to compare the statement with the records of the office, and with other facts known to them, and thus to assist in detecting frauds, if any exist. In addition to this, a certificate of two respectable persons acquainted with the party is made necessary, stating his age, and the opinion, in the neighborhood where he resides, that he is a soldier of the Revolution, and their concurrence therein; and to this must be added the certificate and opinion of the proper court upon the whole matter.

Besides this course of proceeding, which is applicable more particularly to the militia claimants, very few muster rolls of which remain, the testimony of two persons actually acquainted with the services of the applicant is necessary wherever he served in the regular army, and his name is not to be found on a muster roll, as in that case evidence is necessary to rebut the presumption against him.

This system was adopted upon great consideration, and it is difficult to see how the law can be administered, if farther requisites are demanded. But experience has shown that the prescribed certificates are sometimes granted without due caution, and that persons desirous of converting the provisions of the law to their own benefit, have been enabled to procure official attestations, and even the seal of the court, under circumstances calculated to weaken, if not to destroy, the public confidence in these safeguards. Seals have likewise been taken from useless attestations, and affixed to others, and direct forgeries have been committed in the preparation of the whole papers. And these proceedings have been resorted to not only to establish the original claim, by placing the applicant upon the roll, but also to establish his right to each semi-annual payment, by proving his identity. It is obvious that a system depending, for its correctness, upon the conduct of such a variety of persons and officers, not responsible to the General Government, and where frequently a natural sympathy for the claims of the time and war-worn veterans would lead to much practical relaxation, must be liable to abuse; although, till very recently, the extent to which such abuses may have gone was not suspected. Some plan is now necessary by which a re-examination may be made, a plan which, while it ensures to the honest and gallant survivors of the Revolution all that they expect, and all that the country has provided, shall, at the same time, lay open the frauds which have been committed, and prevent their recurrence hereafter.

In the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, his views upon the subject are given, which appear to me practical and judicious; and as such, I ask for them your favorable recommendation to Congress. An examination at the residence, or in the neighborhood of each person now drawing a pension, into the circumstances of his case, appears to me to present the only effectual means of accomplishing the desired object. Undertaken by proper persons, and conducted with proper discretion, it could scarcely fail to confirm the grants made to honest applicants, and to detect those which have been fraudulently obtained by dishonest ones. It appears to me that the expense of such a measure ought not to delay its immediate adoption. It is impossible even to conjecture the amount of surreptitious claims. It may be far greater than the data now before the office enable us to estimate. And possibly, conjecture and recent disclosures may have led to the suspicion that the ratifications of the system have been more extended, and the abuses greater, than a rigid inquiry may confirm. In the one case, the beneficial result would be the relief of the Treasury from fraudulent payments, and the punishment of those concerned in them, and, in the other, it would be satisfactory to know that, while the bounty of the Government has been justly appropriated, it has not been improperly applied.

The provision of law for the establishment of a Pension Office, as a branch of this department, expires, by its own limitation, at the end of the present session of Congress. It is essential, to a due execution of the duties, connected with the system of pensions and gratuities for military services, that this arrangement should be renewed and continued. The applicants and grantees are so numerous, the aggregate amount disbursed so great—equaling at least three million two hundred thousand dollars annually; and the doubtful questions, both of fact and principle, so frequent and complicated, that unless a branch of administration carefully superintended is devoted exclusively to this service, the public interest must materially suffer.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has exhibited, in detail, the transactions in the important branch of the public service confided to his superintendence. It is only necessary that I should advert to the more prominent subjects which have received, or which require, the action of the Government.

The commission for the adjustment of unsettled relations with the Indians west of the Mississippi, terminated, by the provisions of the act instituting it, in July last. Important benefits have resulted from the labors of the commissioners, in the adjustment of difficult questions connected with the Indians of that region, and in the treaty arrangements which have been entered into by them. The country assigned for the permanent residence of the eastern Indians has been so apportioned among them, that little difficulty is anticipated from conflicting claims, or from doubtful boundaries. And, both in equality and extent, there can be no doubt but that the region allotted to them will be amply sufficient for their comfortable subsistence during an indefinite period of time.

An important council has been held at Fort Gibson, by Col. Dodge, and by Maj. Armstrong, the superintendent of Indian affairs, with the chiefs of several of the tribes of that quarter, including some of the wandering bands, whose predatory operations have heretofore kept the frontier in alarm. At this council, the situation of the Indians was fully discussed, and amicable relations established. It is to be hoped that the feelings with which they separated will be permanent, and their intercourse hereafter uninterrupted.

The united tribe of Pottawatomies, Ottawas, and Chippewas, possessing the country in the vicinity of Chicago, have conditionally acceded to the alteration proposed in the boundaries of the tract assigned for them west of the Mississippi, by the treaty concluded in 1833. Should their proposition be accepted, an extensive and valuable region will be opened for settlement, and they will be removed to a district whose climate is suitable to their habits, and whose other advantages cannot fail to offer them strong inducements for moral and physical improvement.

An arrangement has been made with the Miamies for the cession of a part of their reservation in the State of Indiana. The tracts held by them are far more extensive than they require; and, as they appear to be not yet prepared for removal, this relinquishment, without injuring them, will relieve the State in some measure from the embarrassment caused by such large reservations as they possess, embracing a most valuable part of the country, and interrupting the settlements and communication.

Instructions were given immediately after the last session of Congress, for purchasing from the Wyandots in Ohio, if they were disposed to sell, the reservations secured to them in that State, and for their removal to the west. The commissioner, Governor Lucas, conducted the negotiation with great fairness and propriety, fully explaining to the Indians their own position, the wishes of the Government, and the course of circumstances urging their removal. The matter is not yet terminated, the Indians having requested time for further consideration.

The necessary appropriation will be asked for the removal of the Seminoles, agreeably to the treaty formed with them; and arrangements have been made for the emigration of the Creeks, as fast as they are prepared for a change of residence. There has not yet been sufficient time to ascertain the result of these measures.

I am not able to submit to you any more favorable views of the condition of the Cherokees than were embraced in my last annual report. While every dictate of prudence, and in fact of self-preservation, urges their removal, unhappy councils and internal divisions prevent the adoption of that course. Where they are, they are declining and must decline; while that portion of the tribe which is established in the west is realizing the benefits which were expected to result from a change of position. The system of removal, however, by enrollment is going on; and, during this season, about one thousand persons have passed to the West.

The treaty concluded the 24th of May last with the Chickasaws, has altered the relations in which they were placed with the United States. The proceeds derivable from a portion of their present possessions have been assigned to them, and reservations have also been provided for such as choose to become citizens of the United States. Their future condition now depends upon their own views and experience, as they have a right to remain or remove, in conformity with their own judgment. The means placed at their disposal are fully adequate to their permanent comfortable establishment, and it is to be sincerely hoped that they will apply them wisely.

The acts of the last session of Congress on the subject of Indian affairs, have introduced important changes into those relations. Many of the provisions of former laws had become inappropriate or inadequate, and not suited to the changes which time and circumstances have made. In the act regulating the intercourse with the various tribes, the principles of intercommunication with them are laid down, and the necessary details provided. In that for the re-organization of the department, the number of officers employed has been much reduced, and the current expenses diminished.

Any changes which experience may show to be necessary in these acts, can, from time to time, be provided, until they shall become fully adapted to the situation and condition of the Indians, and to the intercourse, both commercial and political, which ought to exist between them and our Government and citizens. The system of removal has changed essentially the prospects of the emigrants, and has imposed new obligations upon the United States. A vast tract of country, containing much more than one hundred millions of acres, has been set apart for the permanent residence of these Indians; and already about thirty thousand have been removed to it.

The Government is under treaty stipulations to remove nearly fifty thousand others to the same region, including the Illinois and Lake Michigan Indians, with whom a conditional arrangement has been made. This extensive district, embracing a great variety of soil and climate, has been divided among the several tribes, and definite boundaries assigned to each. They will there be brought into juxtaposition with one another, and also into contact, and possibly into collision, with the native tribes of that country; and it seems highly desirable that some plan should be adopted for the regulation of the intercourse among these divided communities, and for the exercise of a general power of supervision over them, so far as these objects can be effected consistently with the power of Congress, and with the various treaty stipulations existing with them. It is difficult, indeed, to conceive how peace can be preserved, and the guaranty of protection held out to the eastern Indians, fulfilled, without some legislative provision upon this subject.

It will be seen, by adverting to the estimates, that the ordinary expenditures of the Indian department have been reduced to the sum of fifty-nine thousand eight hundred dollars, a material diminution, which the provisions of the law of the last session, organizing that department, has rendered practicable, and which brings down its expenditures to a sum less by one-half than the average annual amount for some years past. The appropriations for annuities being fixed, and depending upon treaty stipulations, cannot be reduced by administration.

The resolution of the Senate of December 23d, 1833, requiring the correspondence of the Indian department, together with a detailed statement of expenditures for some years past, has been complied with. These documents will enable Congress to judge of the operations of this branch of the public service, both in its administrative and fiscal concerns.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
LEWIS CASS.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, NOV. 29, 1834.

To the President of the United States :

SIR : In laying before you at this time, a succinct view of the condition of our Navy and its operations during the past year, it affords me great pleasure to state, that its gradual increase and improvement are such as might have been anticipated from the ample means for that purpose which have been afforded by the liberal policy of Congress.

All the services required of our naval force have been promptly performed. Our commerce has been protected in the remote as well as the neighboring seas ; our national character has been sustained at home and abroad, while a large portion of our naval officers, seamen, and marines, have been kept in active service, under a strict discipline, calculated to fit them for all the duties which may be required of them, whether in defending our property on the ocean from pirates or open enemies, our shores from hostile aggression, or our flag from insult.

An inspection of our Navy Yards at Portsmouth, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and Norfolk, made in August and September last, in company with the Commissioners of the Navy Board, has afforded me the most satisfactory evidence of our means, in a short time, of increasing our Navy to any extent the exigencies of our country may require.

The officers in charge of those stations perform their duties with great ability and zeal ; the building and repairing of our ships are conducted with despatch and economy ; and the ample materials on hand for naval purposes are preserved with the greatest care, and by all the means which science and experience can suggest, to prevent decay.

Our naval force consists of six ships of the line, and seven frigates, now building, for the completion of which, additional appropriations, to the amount of $1,527,640, will be required ; of five ships of the line, two frigates, and six sloops of war in ordinary, requiring repairs which will cost $1,362,000, in addition to the materials on hand for that purpose ; and of one ship of the line, four frigates, eight sloops of war, and six schooners, in commission ; in all, twelve ships of the line, thirteen frigates, fourteen sloops of war, and six schooners. Besides which, the frames of ships procured, or under contract, for the gradual increase of the Navy, and other materials on hand or under contract for that purpose, will afford the means of bringing into the service, as soon as it can probably be required, an additional force of five ships of the line, eleven frigates, seven sloops of war, and two schooners, the building of which may be immediately commenced on launching our vessels now upon the stocks.

Our vessels in commission during the past year have been employed, as heretofore, in protecting our commerce in the Mediterranean, in the West Indies, on the coast of Brazil, and in the Pacific Ocean.

The ship of the line Delaware, the frigates United States and Constellation, the sloop of war John Adams, and the schooner Shark, have been thus employed in the Mediterranean ; and the frigate Potomac, after her return from the Pacific and Indian Oceans, was repaired, and sailed on the 20th of last month, to join the Mediterranean squadron, from which the frigate Constellation had been ordered to return. This frigate arrived at Norfolk on the 20th inst. The sloop of war John Adams returned to the United States in February, from the Mediterranean, and sailed again for that station in August last, after receiving necessary repairs.

On the West India station, the loops of war Vandalia, St. Louis, and Falmouth, and the schooners Grampus and Experiment have been employed. The St. Louis returned to Norfolk in July last, where she has been repaired, and from whence she sailed on the 14th instant, to resume her station in the West Indies. The Vandalia returned in August last to Norfolk, where she is undergoing considerable repairs, which it is believed will be completed early next month, when she will return to the West India squadron.

The sloops of war Natchez, Ontario, Eric, Lexington, and Peacock, and the schooners Enterprise and Boxer, composed our squadron on the coast of Brazil. The Erie did not sail for this station until August last. The Lexington returned to the United States in April, and the Peacock in May last. The Enterprise returned in April, and sailed again for the Brazilian station in July last, in which month the Boxer returned to the United States, and, after being repaired, sailed for the Pacific. The Peacock is now undergoing considerable repairs, and is expected to be ready for sea early in February next.

For our station in the Pacific, the frigate Brandywine sailed on the 2d of June last, to co-operate with the sloops of war Fairfield and Vincennes, and the schooner Dolphin, and, with the Boxer, now on her way to that station, from which the Falmouth returned on the 1st of February, and, after having been repaired, sailed for the West India station in March last.

Our naval force, consisting of commissioned and warrant officers, petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen and boys, amounts to 6,072 ; and our marine corps, under its new organization, will consist of commissioned officers, non commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, to the number of 1,283 ; making a total of 7,355.

The Dry Docks at Boston and Norfolk have fully answered the most sanguine expectations that were formed of their usefulness. They are now deemed indispensable to a speedy and economical repair of our larger vessels. But the two already finished are not sufficient for the purposes of our Navy. An additional Dry Dock, at some intermediate point between Boston and Norfolk, would greatly promote the purposes for which our Navy is established and maintained. As a site for such additional Dry Dock, the harbor of New York presents greater advantages than are to be found in any other situation, among which may be enumerated the great commerce of the place, the facilities which the city of New York affords for recruiting seamen, and for procuring all materials, as well as for employing skillful mechanics and laborers necessary for repairing vessels.

The experience acquired in making the two dry docks already finished, cannot fail to be of great advantage in the construction of a third.

I would respectfully repeat a recommendation of my predecessor, that authority be given to construct two or three steam batteries, as the means of testing the application of steam to the purposes of national defence.

It can hardly be doubted that the power of steam is soon to produce as great a revolution in the defence of rivers, bays, coasts, and harbors, as it has already done in the commerce, intercourse, and business of all classes of men, in Europe as well as America. This subject has already attracted the attention of the maritime powers of Europe ; and our honor as well as safety requires that no nation whose fleets may come in conflict with ours, should be in advance of us in the science and application of this power, upon which the success of our future wars with them may depend.

Should the power of steam, as a means of defence, produce all the effects that may be justly anticipated, it will diminish, in some instances, the necessity of permanent fortifications on our coasts, by substituting those which may be moved from place to place as they may be wanted, and in our own waters become the formidable engines of attack as well as defence. The heavy and cumbersome steam vessels and batteries, with their necessary apparatus and supplies, which may be brought into action with the most powerful effect by a nation near its own shores and harbors, cannot be transported over distant seas and oceans for the purpose of attacking its enemies. Should, therefore, the application of steam become a part of the system of maritime war, it is a consolation to reflect that it will greatly diminish the frequency as well as horrors of such war, inasmuch as it will hold out much greater advantages to the defending than to the attacking party, and take from the aggressor, in a great degree, his hope of success, and, of course, his motive for action.

I can add nothing to what has been frequently urged in favor of a peace establishment for our navy ; but must be permitted to state, what has often before been stated, that the compensation of the commanders of our ships on foreign stations is altogether inadequate to an honorable discharge of their duties. They are compelled to incur expenses beyond the amount of their pay and rations, or decline to receive and return civilities uniformly offered to them on such stations, and upon which our friendly relations with foreign nations may, in some degree, depend.

The course pursued by our officers, under such circumstances, has been such as national as well as professional pride has dictated, and, of course, they frequently return from their tours of service deeply in debt ; one evil consequence of which is, that it adds to the inducements of our officers, to prefer service on our home stations to service at sea ; whereas, the pecuniary consideration should always be in favor of the sea service.

Much inconvenience frequently arises from a want of power to make transfers of materials purchased for the navy, under certain appropriations, to the purposes of other appropriations, under which they are more immediately wanted. A power to make such transfers, guarded by limitations, similar to those imposed upon the power of making transfers of money from certain appropriations to others, would save much time and expense in the building and repairing of our ships.

Under the act of the 30th of June last, for the better organization of the United States Marine Corps, the appointments of officers authorized by the same have been made, and the additional number of privates required will be recruited with all convenient despatch.

So much of the military regulations, for the discipline of the marine corps, as were in force at the passage of the act, and not inconsistent with the same, will continue in force until superceded by regulations which shall be prescribed in conformity with the provisions of the eighth section of that act.

It is believed that the discipline and harmony of the officers and men of the navy proper, and of the marine corps, will be promoted by placing the marine barracks without the bounds of the different navy yards with which they may be connected. This arrangement would create but little additional expense to the Government. The marine barracks at Portsmouth, should it be thought proper to retain them as such, are at a sufficient distance, and might be easily separated from that part of the navy yard in which ships are built and repaired, and in which are placed the workshops and stores of that station.

The marine barracks at Boston are within the bounds of the navy yard, but so decayed and dilapidated as not to be worth repairing, and they occupy a space designated for another purpose in the yard. A situation for barracks, sufficiently near the yard, it is said, can be procured upon reasonable terms.

The marine barracks at the navy yard at New York were condemned in 1826, as unworthy of repair. The officers attached to this station have been allowed house rent in lieu of quarters. An appropriation of $30,000 has been made for the erection of marine barracks at that station, and $6,000 for the purchase of a site for the same ; but, as yet, the site has not been purchased nor selected.

At Philadelphia, the barracks are within the navy yard, but unfit for use as such. It will be necessary to construct new barracks at that station.

At Washington, the barracks are not within the bounds of the navy yard.

At Norfolk, the barracks are within the bounds of the navy yard, but inadequate to the accommodation of the force required there. Besides, they are much out of repair ; and the commanding officer has been, necessarily, allowed house rent in lieu of quarters.

At Penacola, no permanent marine barracks have been prepared. The officers have been allowed house rent, and the men have occupied temporary buildings. It is proper here to observe, that the plans of the navy yards, prepared and approved under the act for the gradual improvement of the navy, make no provision for barracks within the navy yards, except at Portsmouth.

Under the first section of the act concerning naval pensions and the navy pension fund, passed the 30th June last, fourteen pensions to widows have been renewed, and thirty-seven original pensions have been granted, in pursuance of the provisions of that act. These constitute a heavy charge upon that fund ; and require for their payment, annually, the sum of $16,062.

Under the second section of that act, the sum of $141,303 80 has been reimbursed to the fund for the cost of the stock of the Bank of Columbia, heretofore purchased by the commissioners of the fund, with interest thereon from the period at which said bank ceased to pay interest to the time of reimbursement. 141,300 dollars of the amount has been vested in the stock of the Bank of the United States, as authorized by the act of Congress of the 10th of July, 1832. The state of this fund will appear by documents annexed M, M 1, and M 2.

The number of invalid pensioners is two hundred and eighty-seven. Should all of them claim, which is improbable, the amount required for their annual payment will be 23,321 dollars.

The number of widow pensioners, including those under the act of the 30th of June last, is one hundred and nine; and the amount required for their annual payment is 24,023 dollars—making the annual charge, according to the present pension-roll, 47,254 dollars.

From the account of stocks, hereunto annexed, marked M, it will appear that the income of the fund arising from those stocks, and others to be purchased by excess of money on hand, will be about $70,000 per annum. It is believed, therefore, that the fund will be sufficient for all the ascertained claims upon it, under existing laws; and the surplus of next year, which may be estimated at from 15,000 dollars to 20,000 dollars, will, it is presumed be enough to meet the ordinary increase of pensions for several years.

Of the privateer pension fund, the act of Congress of the 19th of June last revived five years' pensions to widows of officers, seamen, and marines, slain or lost on board of private armed vessels.

In twenty-eight cases brought to the notice of this Department under this act, more than five years had elapsed from the date when their former pensions expired. They being sustained by satisfactory proof, were settled in the office of the Fourth Auditor, and the accounts certified by the Second Comptroller of the Treasury. The amount to pay these accounts was 15,480 dollars. Under the act, twenty-six pensions were renewed; of which, one expired on the 10th of October last, and one on the 28th instant. One will expire on the 4th of March, four on the 1st of February, and nineteen on the 1st of January, in the year 1835. The payments on these, to the 1st of July last, amounted to 11,995 dollars and 20 cents; and the sum required to complete five years' pensions to each, will be 1,320 dollars and 80 cents.

In addition to the above, there are thirty-four invalid pensioners on the roll, and the sum necessary to pay them will be 3,016 dollars per annum.

It will be seen in the annexed statement, marked N 1, that the amount in the Treasury on the 1st instant, to the credit of the fund, was	$1,261 46
Stock owned by the fund (N)	15,567 05
Total	$16,828 51

After paying the claims that have as yet been preferred under the act of the 19th of June last, and it is believed that but few additional claims under the act can now be brought forward, it is estimated that the fund will be sufficient to pay, for four or five years, all the invalid pensions now chargeable to it.

From the statement annexed, marked O, it will appear that the amount to the credit of the navy hospital fund, on the 1st instant, was 35,559 dollars and 4 cents. The increase of the fund arising from deductions in the settlement of accounts in the Fourth Auditor's office will be nearly 16,000 dollars per annum. The expenditures for several years will probably not exceed 13,000 dollars per annum. This will leave balances not wanted for current expenses. The propriety of authorizing, by law, the investment of such balances in some well-secured, productive stock, is respectfully suggested.

By the statement hereunto annexed, marked P, it appears that, of the appropriations heretofore made for the suppression of the slave trade, there remains in the Treasury a balance of 14,213 dollars and 91 cents. It is not believed that any further appropriation for this purpose is necessary at this time.

It will be perceived, by the estimates, that nothing is asked on account of the contingent expenses of the Secretary's office of this Department. A proper degree of economy has rendered any appropriation for those expenses for the ensuing year unnecessary. This circumstance affords me an apology for stating that some of the officers connected with this Department do not receive an adequate compensation for their services.

The chief clerk of the Commissioners of the Navy Board, and the warrant clerk, and the clerk keeping the register of correspondence of this Department, perform arduous duties, which require talent and experience. Their salaries, respectively, are less than are paid in other departments for services of no greater difficulty and responsibility than theirs, and are inadequate to the decent support of themselves and families.

An estimate for an increase of 100 dollars to the salary of the first, so as to make it 1,700 dollars per annum, and of four hundred dollars to the latter, so as to make them 1,400 dollars to each, is respectfully submitted.

The salaries of the chief clerks of the commandants of the navy yards at Boston, New York, Washington, and Norfolk, are evidently below what may be considered a fair compensation for their services. I, therefore, solicit a small increase of 150 dollars to their salaries respectively, so as to make them 900 dollars each, as stated in the estimates.

The superintendent of the southwest Executive building receives at present but 250 dollars, and the two watchmen for the same but 300 dollars each per annum. It is respectfully recommended that an increase of 250 dollars be made to the salary of the superintendent, and of 200 dollars to the salaries of each of the watchmen.

In the report of my predecessor, of the 30th of November last, an estimate of the expense of purchasing and maintaining a lithographic press was submitted, as a means of procuring charts and blank forms for this Department, as well as for the several navy yards and vessels in commission, as also for the purpose of multiplying copies of drawings connected with the survey of the coast. As, in my opinion, the employment of such a press would be a saving of time and money, in the duties now performed by clerks and draughtsmen in this Department, and the branches of service connected with it, I respectfully renew the application for the necessary appropriation for this press; and annex hereto copies of the letters of the Commissioners of the Navy Board, and of Lieutenant Charles Wilkes, jr., heretofore laid before Congress, in favor of this application.

The charge of the coast survey, now under the superintendence of Mr. Hassler, was, on the 11th day of March last, transferred from the Treasury to the Navy Department, to which it was thought more properly to belong. I have found this arrangement very onerous, as it imposed upon me new duties, which could not be performed without a careful examination of the accounts of what had heretofore been done on the survey, contained in a voluminous correspondence between the Treasury Department and the superintendent. This arrangement also caused a short interruption in the progress of the work, but which has, nevertheless, been prosecuted with diligence and zeal by those employed in it.

The report of Mr. Hassler, of the 17th of May last, and his supplementary report of the 11th of last month, with the maps, draughts, and sketches accompanying the same, herewith transmitted, show the progress already made in this work under the law of 1832, and its connexion with the progress made in the same in the year 1817.

The situation of the base line on the south side of Long island has been most fortunately selected. As any error in this line would be attended with corresponding errors in the whole work depending upon the same, the utmost care has been taken to have it measured with the greatest possible accuracy.

From what has been done in this survey, we may reasonably hope that this important work will advance with all the aid which science, skill, and industry can give it, and in a manner as honorable to the Government under whose auspices it was begun, and has been continued, as it will be useful to the present and to future ages.

The information wanted for accurate and detailed estimates of the necessary appropriations for the continuance of the coast survey cannot easily be obtained until further experience shall enable the officers engaged in it to introduce more system in the detail of duties and expenditures in their work than they have heretofore been able to do.

The sum of thirty thousand dollars was appropriated for this purpose the past year; and it is believed that an equal sum will be wanted for the ensuing year, as stated in the estimates.

Under the act of the 30th of June last, "authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to make experiments for the safety of the steam engine," preparations have been made for testing certain proposed improvements in steam boilers; but no such experiments have been exhibited or communicated to this Department, that could properly form the subject of a report.

Since the last annual report from this Department, the Legislature of Pennsylvania have, by their act of the 10th day of April last, ceded to the United States the jurisdiction over the territory now in their possession in the county of Philadelphia, and occupied for the purpose of a naval asylum for sick and disabled seamen, so long as the same shall be used by the Government of the United States for that purpose, with a reservation of the right to lay out a certain street, called Sutherland avenue, through the western part of said ceded territory; and with a proviso that all process, civil and criminal, of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, shall extend into, and be effected within, such territory.

The necessary references to papers and documents connected with this report, will be found in a schedule herewith annexed.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient, humble servant,

MAHLON DICKERSON.

REPORT OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

GENERAL POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Nov. 29, 1834.
To the President of the United States:

SIR: The report which I had the honor to make on the 30th November, 1832, exhibited a balance due from this Department on the 1st July, 1833, beyond the whole amount of its available funds, of $195,208 40.

The expenses for the transportation of the mail necessarily continued undiminished till the close of the year 1833, prior to which date the retrenchments stated in that report could not take effect; consequently the balance of debt against the Department continued to augment till that period.

The gross amount of postage was, from July 1 to December 31, 1833 - $1,375,437 28

Compensation to postmasters, including the contingent expenses of their offices during the same period, amounted to - $434,628 89

Incidental expenses of the Department during the same time, amounted to 47,797 29

The expense for transportation of the mail from July 1 to December 31, 1833, was - 1,013,402 68

Making the total expenses of the Department for that half year - $1,495,828 86

This sum, after deducting the gross amount of postages for that period, leaves a deficit for the six months ending 31st December, 1833, of 120,391 58

To this sum add the deficit existing on the 1st of July, 1833 - 195,208 40

And the balance of the debt against the Department, beyond the amount of its available funds, was, on the 1st of January, 1834 - 315,599 98

From the 1st of January, 1834, the retrenchments in the transportation of the mail, stated in my report of last year, began to take effect; and from that period the revenues of the Department have exceeded its expenses.

The gross amount of postages, was, from January 1 to June 30, 1834, - $1,448,269 69

Compensation to postmasters, including the contingent expenses of their offices within the same period, amounted to - $461,433 64

Incidental expenses of the Department for the same period, amounted to - 30,300 38

The transportation of the mail from January 1 to June 30, 1834, amounted to - 909,028 43

Making the total expenses of the Department for the half year ending the 30th of June, 1834 - 1,400,762 45

This sum, deducted from the gross amount of postages for that period, leaves a revenue beyond the amount of expenses for the half year from January 1 to June 30, 1834, of 47,507 24

This sum, deducted from the deficit existing January 1, 1834 - 315,599 98

Reduces the balance of debt which existed against the Department on the 1st of July, 1834, to $268,092 74

Such was the financial condition of the Department on the 1st day of July last. The amount of this debt has been continually diminishing to the present time, and it continues to diminish in an increased ratio.

On the 1st day of July, 1834, the balance of the account with banks was $398,616 99 against the Department, consisting of loans, $275,000, and overchecks to the amount of $123,616 99. In this statement, the difference between loans and overchecks is rather nominal than essential.

When overchecks are mutually agreed upon to a certain definite amount as a standing order, they are called loans; but when they vary indefinitely as to time and amount, they are called overchecks. In either case they are debts due from the Department to banks. This amount of balance against the Department has been considerably reduced since the 1st of July last. On the first day of the present month it stood as follows:

Documents accompanying the President's Message.

25d Cong. 2d Sess.

Amount due for loans from banks	$275,000 00
Amount of overchecks, November 1, 1834	55,969 09
Making, together, the sum of	330,969 09
On the same day the balances of bank deposits in favor of the Department, constituting the amount of cash on hand, amounted to	82,031 34
Making the actual balance of the accounts with banks, against the Department, on the 1st of November, 1834	$248,937 75

The contracts for the Southern section, including the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, and the Territory of Florida, which will expire with the current year, have been renewed to take effect from the 1st of January next, on such terms as will effect an annual saving from the amount now paid for transportation in that section, of about $120,000 00. Additional retrenchments have also been made in the expense of transportation subsequent to my last report, to the annual amount of about 59,000 00.

Making, together, an annual saving from the 1st of January next, of $179,000 00

From the savings thus effected, together with the current excess of revenue in favor of the Department, it may be safely calculated that, without any reliance upon an increase in the gross amount of postages, the revenues of the Department will exceed its expenditures during the ensuing calendar year, to the amount of $270,000.

From a careful estimate, it may be anticipated, with entire confidence, that, before the close of the year 1835, the whole balance of debt against the Department will be extinguished. No part of this debt was contracted upon the credit of the Treasury, nor upon any other credit or authority than that of the Department alone. It was never regarded by either of the parties in the character of a debt of the Government, but a mere expedient to anticipate the resources of the Department, based upon the credit of the resources alone. The means of its liquidation within a reasonable time were always within the legal control of the Department, and no other means have at any time been sought or desired by the Department.

In my report of November, 1833, the expense for transporting the mail, and for incidentals, from July 1 to December 31, 1833, was estimated at $1,061,644 71. The actual expense for that period, was 1,061,199 97

Varying from the estimate only $444 74

The nett proceeds for postages for the year ending 30th June, 1834, were then estimated at $2,057,410 81. The actual nett proceeds of postages for that year, were 1,927,644 44

Falling below the estimate by the sum of $109,766 37

Thus it appears that the expenses of the Department have not essentially varied from the estimate; but the nett revenue arising from postages has fallen short of the estimate then made more than a hundred thousand dollars. This is believed to be, in a very considerable degree, attributable to the great increase of free letters. The progressive increase of population naturally brings with it an accumulation of business in the Executive offices, which tends, in some measure, to increase their correspondence; and, in addition to this, a law passed in March, 1833, extending to members of Congress the privilege of franking during the whole recess. Every other year the session of Congress is protracted to a much greater length than in the alternate year, when a Congress terminates. The expenses for the delivery of free letters, at two cents each, have always amounted to a much greater sum during the year when the session is protracted than during the alternate year. To make a fair comparison between the amount of free letters before and after the extension of the franking privilege, it is necessary to take two entire years. Thus, the allowance to postmasters for the delivery of free letters for the two years ending July 30, 1832, (before the extension,) was $40,556 89. For the two years ending July 1, 1834, (after the extension,) it was 54,158 88

Making, since the extension, an increase of $13,601 99 or payment for the delivery of 680,099 free letters more than were delivered during the two preceding years. But no allowance is made for the delivery of free letters at post offices where the postmasters' commissions exceed $500 a quarter.

If the same proportion of free letters is delivered at offices where no allowances for them are made to postmasters, as at the smaller offices, then the increase since the franking privilege was extended is equal to 960,000 free letters more than what were delivered within the same period of time prior to that extension. The postage on each of these letters, if not free, would be from six cents to two dollars. The average, it is believed, would not be less than twenty-five cents each, exclusive of the postmasters' commissions. If estimated at this average they would amount to $240,000 00. To this add the allowance actually made for their delivery 13,601 99

And the increase of free letters within the last two years has actually cost the Department $253,601 99 which is more than equal to the balance of debt at this time existing against the Department.

Estimates have been obtained from several of the Executive offices, of the amount of their official correspondence carried on through the Post Office establishment, under the franking privilege of the officers by whom it is conducted; and it appears that, from the Departments of State, Treasury, War, and Navy, the official correspondence by mail, on which no postage is paid, is estimated to be equal to 2,685,235 single free letters in a year, and that by far the greater proportion of them are sent the full distance for which the highest rate of postage could be chargeable. The average postage on these letters, if not free, it is believed, would be not less than 18½ cents each, which would amount to $503,481 56. This estimate is exclusive of the offices of the Attorney General, Adjutant General, Commissary General, Inspectors General, Quartermaster General, Paymaster General, and Superintendent of the Patent Office, all of whom have the privilege of franking.

It is also estimated that the number of free letters passing under the frank of members of Congress amounts to 8,000 a day during the session. If the correspondence of the offices above mentioned, which are not embraced in the estimate, and the postages fairly estimated, which would be chargeable on the correspondence of members of Congress, if not free, should be added to the statement, it is believed that the annual amount of free letters would not fall short of a million of dollars, exclusive of the correspondence of the Post Office Department itself. This is an annual contribution by the Department to the Government.

Though the amount of revenue arising from postages for the year ending June 30, 1834, did not equal the estimate, yet there was a considerable increase above the amount of the preceding year. The gross amount of postage, for the year ending June 30, 1833, was

$2,616,538 27

For the year ending June 30, 1834, it was 2,823,706 97

Making an increase in the gross amount of $207,168 70

The nett amount of postages, after deducting the commissions to postmasters, and the contingent expenses of their offices, was, for the year ending June 30, 1833 - $1,790,254 65

For the year ending June 30, 1834, it was 1,927,644 44

Making an increase in the nett proceeds of $137,389 79

The finances of the Department continue to be in an improving condition; and the solicitude which has been shown to obtain mail contracts, the reduced rates at which they have been taken for the Southern section, and the zeal with which contractors generally persevere in their services to the Department, furnish ample demonstration that its credit is unimpaired.

The number of post offices in the United States was, on the first of July last, ten thousand six hundred and ninety-three, being an increase of five hundred and sixty-six over the number reported last year.

The annual amount of transportation has been but slightly varied since my last report. The mail is now carried in stages and steamboats about sixteen millions nine hundred thousand miles a year, and on horseback and in sulkies about eight millions six hundred thousand miles, making, together, about twenty-five millions five hundred thousand miles a year.

The celerity of the mail should always be equal to the most rapid transition of the traveller; and that which shortens the time of communication, and facilitates the intercourse between distant places, is like bringing them nearer together. While it affords convenience to men of business, it tends to counteract local prejudices, by enlarging the sphere of acquaintance. It perpetuates existing friendships, and creates new ones, by which the bands of union are strengthened, and the happiness of society promoted. These considerations have always had their full weight upon my mind in making improvements in mail operations. The multiplication of railroads in different parts of the country promises, within a few years, to give great rapidity to the movements of travellers, and it is a subject worthy of inquiry, whether measures may not now be taken to secure the transportation of the mail upon them. Already have the railroads between Frenchtown, in Maryland, and Newcastle, in Delaware, and between Camden and South Amboy, in New Jersey, afforded great and important facilities to the transmission of the great Eastern mail. The railroad between this city and Baltimore will soon be completed, and the distance from the post office in this place to that of Baltimore will not be materially varied from the present road, 38 miles. From Baltimore, by Port Deposit, in Maryland, to Coatesville, in Pennsylvania, the line for a railroad is located, and the stock subscribed for its completion; and from Coatesville to Philadelphia a railroad is made and in operation. The distance between Baltimore and Philadelphia, on this road, will be one hundred and seventeen miles, about eighteen miles greater than the present land route. From Philadelphia to Trenton bridge, about twenty-eight miles, the railroad is nearly completed; and from New Brunswick, in New Jersey, to Jersey City, on the west side of the Hudson river, opposite the city of New York, thirty miles, the railroad is in a state of progress. When these works shall be completed, the only interval will be between Trenton and New Brunswick, about twenty-six miles, to complete an entire railroad between this place and the city of New York; and it cannot be supposed that the enterprising State of New Jersey will long delay to perfect a communication of such great importance, passing through most of her largest and most flourishing towns.

When this shall be done, the whole distance between this city and New York, on a continuous railroad, will not exceed two hundred and forty miles, and the journey may be performed, at all times, with certainty, allowing ample time for stopping at important places on the road, in sixteen hours, and ordinarily in a shorter period. If provision can be made to secure the regular transportation of the mail upon this and upon other railroads which are constructing, and, in some instances, already finished, it will be of great utility to the public, otherwise these corporations may become exorbitant in their demands, and prove eventually to be dangerous monopolies.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your humble servant,
W. T. BARRY.

REPORT OF THE MAJOR GENERAL OF THE ARMY.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,

Washington, Nov. 28, 1834.

SIR: In compliance with the instructions contained in your letter of the 15th of August, I have the honor to submit, herewith, the undermentioned statements and returns:

1. A statement showing the organization of the army, marked A.
2. A return of the actual state of the army, marked B.
3. A return exhibiting the strength of the Eastern department, designating the posts and garrisons, marked C.
4. A return exhibiting the strength of the Western department, designating the posts and garrisons, marked D.
5. A statement showing the number of recruits enlisted in the army from the first of January to the 30th of September, 1834, marked E.
6. An estimate of the funds required for the recruiting service for the year 1835, marked F.
7. An estimate of the contingent expenses of the headquarters of the army, including those of the office of the Adjutant General, for the year 1835, marked G.

By these returns, it will be perceived that the several corps of the army are kept to their establishment, as nearly as practicable, without exceeding the numerical force authorized by law.

Since my last annual report, the five companies of the regiment of dragoons, which remained to be raised, have been recruited; and, after having been organized at Jefferson barracks, they took up their march to Fort Gibson, where the headquarters of the regiment were established, preparatory to entering the Indian country, in conformity to your instructions.

In consequence of the lateness of the arrival of these companies at Fort Gibson, and a variety of unforeseen difficulties in obtaining the proper arms and equipments for the regiment, the movement to the West was delayed until the 15th of June.

In the mean time, General Leavenworth, who had been appointed to the command of the troops on the Western frontier, south of the northern boundary of the State of Missouri, detached one company of that regiment as an escort to the caravan of traders to Santa Fe, in Mexico. He also employed detachments of the 3d and 7th regiments of infantry in opening roads between the posts on the Arkansas and Red rivers, and in establishing new posts beyond the settlements of the emigrated Indians, for the purpose of facilitating the movements of the expedition, and covering the country occupied by those Indians, in the event of a failure to secure a friendly intercourse with the wild tribes inhabiting the country beyond them.

These arrangements having been made, the expedition, consisting of nine companies, under Colonel Dodge, was put in motion, accompanied by a deputation from the several tribes of friendly Indians to act as guides and interpreters, and to aid in bringing about a general good understanding between the several nations; and in order that the friendly intercourse might be further promoted, two Indian girls, the one a Pawnee and the other a Kiowa, who had been captured by the Osages, also accompanied the expedition, for the purpose of being delivered to their friends.

Owing to the sickness which prevailed among the troops, the command, on reaching the river Washita, about 180 miles west of Fort Gibson, was so much reduced as to render a reorganization of the companies necessary. Colonel Dodge accordingly, out of the effective force, formed six companies, each forty-two strong, and under instructions from General Leavenworth, continued his march to the Pawnee village, situated on a branch of the Red river. Here Colonel Dodge held a council with the Camanches, the Pawnees, (or Toyasalas,) the Kiowas, and the deputation of Indians which accompanied him, amounting in all to about 2,000 persons. He explained the object of the expedition, and was instrumental in bringing about a friendly intercourse between several hostile tribes. He also obtained the surrender of the son of a Mr. Martin, an American citizen, who had been murdered by the Indians, and of a black boy, captured by them. A more particular account of the interview between Colonel Dodge and the assembled tribes will be found in the journal of the expedition annexed to this report.

After delivering the two Indian girls to their parents, Colonel Dodge, accompanied by several of the chiefs of the Camanches, Pawnees, and Kiowas, returned with his command to Fort Gibson, whence the regiment proceeded to take up the positions previously fixed on. Four companies, under Colonel Dodge, marched to Fort Leavenworth, on the Missouri; three companies, under Lieutenant Colonel Kearney, to the Des Moines; and three, under Major Mason, to a point on the Arkansas about eighty miles above Fort Gibson. These companies have arrived at their destinations, and are engaged in preparing their winter quarters.

The reports of the Inspectors General, as to the condition of the army, are highly favorable. The dispersed state of the troops prevents any great improvement in extended evolutions; but the police and administration are, in every respect, creditable to the officers in command. The character of the soldier is evidently improving. The law for bettering the condition of the rank and file seems to have already produced the most beneficial results. The vice of drunkenness has diminished, and, with it, desertion and other crimes; while, at the same time, better men enlist.

The services performed by the officers of the line are diversified and extensive. Besides the duties in camp and quarters, they furnish assistance to the various branches of the Staff and the Military Academy, in all of which the number of officers authorized by law is insufficient for the performance of the multiplied duties imposed on them beyond their ordinary service. The number of officers detached from regimental duty amounts to 122. The Corps of Engineers, and the Topographical Engineers, as well as the Ordnance department, are insufficient, according to their present strength, to accomplish all that is required of them. The duties of these officers are daily becoming more extensive; and to enable them to execute these duties, details, to a great extent are constantly made from the line. The effect of diverting so many officers from their appropriate functions, is to derange the regular routine of duty, to disorganize the service in the line, and frequently to leave companies with only one officer. In addition to which, the officers who are thus employed are too apt to lose their esprit du corps, and to return to their duties in the line with a distaste for them.

I would, therefore, respectfully suggest that great economy and much good would result to the service, if the requisite number of officers for the Engineers, Topographical Engineers, Ordnance department, and the Military Academy, were permanently detached from the line, and made members of those several branches. These branches might be so organized by law, as to give from the line of the army to the Engineers six 1st and six 2d lieutenants, and to the Topographical Engineers, the Ordnance, and the Military Academy, each, ten 1st and ten 2d lieutenants, making in all seventy-two officers; these officers to be taken from the line of the army, so as to leave one 1st and one 2d lieutenant with each company. Respectfully submitted.

ALEX. MACOMB,

Major Gen. commanding the Army.

To the Hon. the SECRETARY OF WAR.

REPORT OF THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,

Washington City, Nov. 22, 1834.

SIR: In obedience to your order, and in compliance with the regulations for the government of the department, I have the honor to submit the following report of the operations of that branch of the service confided to my administration, for the 1st, 2d, and 3d quarters of the present year, to which I have added that portion of the last year not included in my report of the 27th of November, 1833.

The balance remaining to be accounted for by the several officers of the department at the date of that report, amounted to . . . $84,226 48

To which is to be added—

Leaving a balance to be accounted for, of	$97,956 99

The accounts of four officers remain to be received for the second quarter, and of eight officers for the third quarter of the present year, which will probably reduce the balance about fifteen thousand dollars. The remainder is distributed among more than sixty officers at the various posts, and connected with the several public works, directed by the department throughout the Union; and I confidently believe that the whole of it will be applied to the proper objects, and accounted for at the close of the present quarter.

The property under the administration of the department is promptly accounted for by the officers who receive it, as well of the department as of the several corps of the army.

The balance remaining in the Treasury, of the appropriation for the Quartermaster's department proper, with the sums due to it for expenditures on account of other branches of the service, will not only be sufficient for all demands against it for the remainder of this year, but will leave twenty thousand dollars applicable to the service of the next year.

The balance remaining on account of the transportation of troops, supplies, &c., will, it is believed, be sufficient to meet all demands against it within the year; and the experience of the present year has induced me to venture on a small reduction of the estimate for the next year.

The appropriation for the transportation of ordnance has been found inadequate to the wants of the service. My estimate was cut down one-fourth at the last session of Congress; in consequence of which, an unusual number of arms, and a large quantity of ordnance stores, have accumulated, and must, necessarily, be removed during the ensuing year.

The appropriation made at the last session of Congress for the transportation or travelling allowance of the officers of the army, including those of the dragoons, when moving on duty without troops, was several thousand dollars less than the actual expenditure in 1833, without including the dragoons. I estimated for a sum barely sufficient to meet the expenditure at the then established rate, but my estimate was cut down fifteen thousand dollars; the consequence was the reduction of the rate, before low enough, to nine cents per mile, the utmost that the present appropriation will bear. The mileage to officers of the navy, when travelling on duty, authorized by the regulations submitted to Congress at its last session, is twelve and a half cents to captains, commanders, and judge advocates, and ten cents to all others. Officers of the army are subjected to as much expense in travelling as those of the navy, and in common justice ought to have an equal allowance. The expenditure on this account may seem large, but it is to be remarked that the United States are engaged in improvements, both military and civil, upon as great a scale as any other civilized nation. The greater part of those improvements are directed by officers of the army; they are to be found on all our frontiers, and dispersed over every part of our extended territories, directing the construction of fortifications, arsenals, barracks, roads, bridges, breakwaters, and other national works; surveying routes for canals, railroads, and military roads; assisting in a trigonometrical survey of our coast, and in hydrographical surveys, and in improving numerous harbors, and removing the obstructions to the navigation of rivers; a large portion of them are emphatically working-men, and can say, with truth, that, whosoever may eat the bread of idleness, they are not of the number. The improvements on which they have been engaged since the termination of the war with Great Britain, besides their great commercial advantages, will, when completed, have more than quadrupled the defensive military power of the country. Of what consequence is the saving of a few thousand dollars, cut off from the travelling allowance of men thus engaged, compared with the positive advantages which the nation is deriving from their labors? The reduction having been made in the House of Representatives, I have not felt at liberty to estimate for more than the amount appropriated last year, but I most respectfully and earnestly recommend that the subject be so placed before Congress that a just and equitable allowance be granted.

From the numerous casualties attending the service of the regiment of dragoons, I have been obliged to increase the estimate for horses and equipments to thirty-five thousand dollars, being fifteen thousand dollars more than the estimate of last year.

Of the works under the direction of the Department, the barracks authorized in the vicinity of New Orleans were commenced early in the season, and at the date of the last report, although the operations had been greatly retarded by the heat and rains, as well as by the prevalence of the yellow fever, the buildings had been covered; every part of the work is reported to have been executed in the best manner. To complete the work, with its defences, the appropriation asked for at the last session of Congress will be necessary.

Of the works authorized at Savannah, the soldiers' quarters, though not entirely finished, are reported to be in a state to be occupied; the officers' quarters are in progress, but, to complete them and the defences, a further appropriation will be necessary.

The works at Baton Rouge, Fort Severn, and Green bay, are in rapid progress; at the latter place it is believed all the labors will have terminated by the end of the present year, except upon the hospital, which will probably be finished by the first of June.

The new barracks at Fort Crawford were, at the date of the last report, in such a state of forwardness as to leave no doubt of their being soon completed.

The repairs at Fort Gibson, for which an appropriation of five thousand dollars was made at the last session of Congress, have not been commenced; the buildings are in so bad a condition that the late commanding officer gave it as his opinion that the appropriation would be entirely lost if applied to the old work. He urged the necessity of a new work, and recommended that it be built of stone, of which there is an abundance in the neighborhood, and of good quality.

A property adjoining Fort McHenry, near Baltimore, which is now rented by the public for the accommodation of the garrison, will be sold in a short time, under a decree of the Chancellor. Regarding Fort McHenry even as a secondary work, according to the classification made by the Board of Engineers, the United States should own the property referred to. I, therefore, respectfully ask that authority be obtained from Congress to make the purchase; no appropriation will be required, as the necessary sum may be spared from the Quartermaster's department.

A new post has been established, and barracks, stables, and other buildings have been erected at the Des Moines, on the Upper Mississippi, for three companies of dragoons; and accommodations for four companies at Fort Leavenworth, and for three companies near Fort Gibson, were in a state of preparation at the last reports from those posts.

The amount appropriated at the last session of Congress for the purchase of an additional lot of land at Fort Sullivan, required for military purposes, has been applied as designed, and the land is now the property of the United States.

The military road in Maine has been thoroughly repaired and completed; and, in compliance with the provisions of an act of Congress approved the 30th of June last, it has been transferred to the State of Maine.

Instructions have been given to the principal officer of the department in Arkansas to resume the repair of the Memphis and Little Rock road, so soon as the season shall permit; and, also, to take measures to cause the following roads, authorized at the last session of Congress, to be surveyed and opened, viz: a road from Helena to the mouth of Cache river; a road from Jackson, in the county of Lawrence, by Liberty and Fayetteville, in the county of Washington, to Fort Smith; a road from Strong's, (a point on the military road from Memphis to Little Rock,) by Litchfield, in Jackson county, to Batesville; and a road from Columbia, in Chicot county, to Little Rock.

A road has been opened by the labor of the troops on the Southwestern frontier from Fort Towson to False Washita of Red river; also, one from Fort Gibson to the Little Red river of Arkansas, and thence to the mouth of False Washita, and one direct from Fort Gibson to the point where the latter road crosses the north fork of the Canadian.

On the road from Pensacola to Tallahassee, in Florida, repairs have been made, and bridges have been erected over several rivers, creeks, and sloughs. The officer in charge of the work, finding that the money expended would probably be lost by closing his operations when the appropriation was exhausted, went on to complete the work, and has exceeded the appropriation eighteen hundred and seventy-five dollars and five cents. I have not included that sum in my estimate, but I respectfully recommend that application be made to Congress for an appropriation to cover the expenditure.

The appropriation for the road from Fort Howard to Fort Crawford not being sufficient to carry on the work with advantage, by means of hired laborers or by contract, and the troops at both posts being engaged in building, nothing has yet been effected, except the survey of the route.

The labors at the Delaware breakwater were resumed early in July, and on the 18th of October, when they were suspended for the season, one hundred and twenty-two thousand nine hundred and ninety-five tons of stone had been deposited at the work, the greater part of which was used in bringing up that portion of it which had been previously founded. The whole of the appropriation made at the last session of Congress, except a small sum reserved for contingent expenses during the winter, will have been expended in closing the accounts of the work for the season.

For three years past the surveys of the work have exhibited a trifling deposit of mud and sand within the western extremity of the breakwater; but it was not until September of the present year that the shoal had assumed such a form and extent as to cause any apprehension of injury to the harbor. On reporting to you the fact, you caused a board of survey to be formed, and directed it to proceed to, and carefully examine, the work. The annexed paper, marked A, is a copy of their report, from which it will be seen that the facts previously reported are confirmed. In consequence of the unanimous opinion of the board, and with your assent, I have reduced the estimate for the next year to one hundred thousand dollars; that sum will be sufficient to bring the whole of the work already founded to its destined height, or nearly so; and, until the course of observations indicated by the board be completed, more should not be attempted.

Before closing my report, I deem it my duty, respectfully, to call your attention to the situation of the officer, clerks, and sergeants employed in my office. It has been stated in a semi-official form, and under high official sanction, that the increase in the expenses of the army are in a great measure to be ascribed to the employment of officers and sergeants in the public offices at Washington. It is not my place, nor would it be proper in a report like this, to refer to other offices; but, so far as this office is concerned, the statement made, and the opinion founded on it, are entirely incorrect. There is one officer attached to the office, who, under a regulation of 1818, receives, in addition to his pay as an assistant quartermaster, a per diem of one dollar and a quarter; there are three sergeants attached to the office, two of whom receive five hundred dollars, and the other three hundred dollars per annum, in addition to their compensation as sergeants. The two sergeants who receive the highest compensation, get, altogether, only seventy-five cents over eight hundred dollars, the pay of the lowest class of clerks in the civil offices, and the other sergeant receives less than a messenger in a civil office. They, as well as the clerks in the office, have often to labor on Sunday and at night, to prevent the business from falling back. Now, all I ask for them is, that a thorough investigation be made, and their compensation be fixed in relation to the labors which they actually perform, and to the responsibility of their stations. This would satisfy them; less would not be just.

It has been the practice of the Government, under every administration, as far as I have been able to trace the matter, (and I have traced it as far back as 1806,) to allow extra compensation for extra services. Under this practice, known to have existed so long, officers of this department, as well as other departments, sometimes claim a per centage for expenditures which they consider as not within the range of their appropriate duties; independently of orders and regulations, they will probably continue to claim that which they deem to be their right, and there is but little doubt of the courts of the country ultimately allowing it to them; recent decisions of the Supreme Court seem to have settled the principle. In this state of the case, I respectfully suggest whether it be not advisable that their duties be defined by law, or that power be conferred on the President or Secretary of War to define them; and either that the per centage for that which is now considered extra duty be positively granted or positively withheld.

In 1821, more than twenty officers of the Purchasing department were disbanded, and their duties were assigned by the Secretary of War to the Quartermaster's department; and, in May, 1826, Congress assigned to the department, by law, the direction of the accountability for clothing; this is an extremely disagreeable duty, abounding in laborious details, and one which brings the department into constant collision with the army. It can be effectually performed only by a department having the entire control of the subject. A separate bureau having been established, and specially charged with the administration of that branch of the service, I respectfully ask that application be made to Congress so to modify the law above referred to, that I may be relieved from that part of the duty which I am now compelled to perform, and that it be transferred to the officer in charge of the Clothing bureau.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

TH. S. JESUP,

Major General and Quartermaster General.

The Hon. LEWIS CASS,

Secretary of War, Washington.

REPORT FROM THE ENGINEER DEPARTMENT.

ENGINEER DEPARTMENT, NOV. 1, 1834.

The Hon. LEWIS CASS,

Secretary of War.

SIR: In compliance with your instructions, I have the honor to submit the following report relating to the operations of this department during the year ending on the 30th September last. It is accompanied by three tabular statements, marked A, B, and C. The two first relate to its fiscal concerns, and the last exhibits the works projected by the Board of Engineers which have not been commenced, and an estimate of their cost.

FORTIFICATIONS.

Fort Independence, Boston harbor.—Operations on Castle island, the site of this fort, have been confined to the works referred to in my last annual report. The sea and wharf walls are nearly completed; their total length is 1,052 cubic feet, and 2,342 yards of stone have been used in their construction. All that part of the island exposed to abrasion from the action of the waves is, with the exception of about 150 feet, now amply protected. A portion of the old wall is, however, in a ruinous condition, and should be rebuilt without delay; an estimate for that object will, therefore, be submitted.

You will, no doubt, recollect that a revised project for rebuilding Fort Independence, with certain improvements, was presented by the Board of Engineers in March last; the question as to the adoption of this project not having been settled, it was deemed proper to limit the arrangement for executing that work to the collection and preparation of such materials only as will be alike required on the original and revised plan. The material and workmanship of the fort, in its present condition, are such as to render it probable that the whole work will have to be rebuilt.

Fort Warren, Boston harbor.—The late period at which the appropriations were made, at the last session of Congress, rendered it proper to limit the operations at this work to preparatory measures for efficient prosecution of the fort during the next working season. The buildings necessary to accommodate the laborers, and other persons employed at the work, are in progress of construction, and will be finished in due time. A wharf, requiring for its construction about two thousand cubic yards of stone in walls, and seventeen thousand yards of earth embankment, will soon be ready for the reception of materials. Every thing will be prepared to commence the masonry of the work early next spring.

Fort Adams, Narragansett roads, R. I.—Operations at this work have been prosecuted in the usual satisfactory manner. The fort, as far as constructed, is in good condition, and the funds appropriated for it have been applied to advantage.

Fort Hamilton, Narrows, N. Y.—The slight defects in construction, always to be expected in a work of this magnitude, have been repaired, and the fort may, by the end of the present year, be considered as finished.

Fort Lafayette, Narrows, N. Y.—A portion of the unexpended balance remaining on account of this work has been applied to the repairs of the sea-wall. This became necessary in consequence of the failure of the mortar with which it was pointed, and the settling of the wall in many places.

Fort Columbus and Castle William, Governor's island, New York harbor.—The report of the engineer charged with the repairs of these works is highly favorable. In the former, the scarp-walls, except the pointing and parapets, have been finished; the counterscarp revetments, and revetments of the glacis, are nearly completed. The facing of the covered-way revetment, leading from Fort Columbus to Castle William, will be done this fall. The masonry of the magazines and barracks, as well as that of the communications connecting the former, is finished, as is also the facing of the redan. All the masonry of the barracks on the south, west, and north fronts is nearly finished, and the roofs are in readiness to receive the covering; the masonry of those on the east front is in a state of forwardness. Measures have been taken to finish the repairs of Castle William as speedily as practicable.

Fort Schuyler, Throg's neck, East river, N. Y.—Agreeably to your instructions, the operations on Throg's neck have been limited to the making of such arrangements as will enable the officer charged with the construction of this fort to prosecute the work with efficiency during the next working season. The most ample preparations have been made. A permanent wharf will be in readiness by the time it is required; the necessary boats and machinery have been provided; an ample quarry of good quality of stone prepared, and, indeed, every thing that may tend to expedite the work, when commenced, will be found in waiting.

Fort Delaware, Delaware river.—The annual report of the officer charged with this work has not yet been received; this is no doubt owing to his perpetual engagements with the several works in course of construction under his supervision.

Fort Monroe, Hampton roads, Va.—All the permanent parts of this work were completed last year. The ramparts of fronts five, six, and seven, together with the glacis and road in advance of these fronts, were, with the exception of a small portion of front five, formed and covered with earth. The rampart of covertway and place of arms, in advance of front five, was in a state of forwardness along its whole extent, and fifteen thousand cubic yards of sand were deposited towards the construction of the redoubt; five hundred tons of stone were collected and put in place for the protection of the beach in front of casemated battery and the glacis of front six; conduit-pipes for conducting the water from the roof of casemated battery laid; the piazzas of curtains two and three completed, and all the materials for the draws to bridges and gates procured; the draws and gates to main entrance finished, and the timber for the others partly prepared; the earth for the parapets on all the fronts except one, two, and three, was collected at the foot of the scarp-wall; the ditches of all the fronts were excavated to their proper depth, and the glacis and road in advance formed, except those on the front one; the casemated covertway on front four was completed, and the funds available with the force then organized amply sufficient for the completion of the fort, with the exception of putting parapets on the main and outworks, which was not deemed advisable for the present, when the operations of the Engineer department were arrested by General Order No. 54. This order directed that the work, with its funds, be placed under the immediate orders of the officer commanding the troops on that station. The main work was, therefore, entirely completed except the gates, the raising of the half parapets on fronts one, two, and three, and the whole parapets on the other fronts—the earth required or these last being placed at the foot of the scarp. Four thousand three hundred and ten cubic yards of earth were required to complete the rampart of covertway on front five; twenty-one thousand three hundred and eighty to finish the rampart of redoubt; twenty thousand two hundred and ninety-seven yards for the construction of the parapet on covertway, and eight thousand eight hundred and ninety for the parapet of the redoubt.

It has already been stated that the funds available for this work were, at the time they were transferred, deemed amply sufficient for its completion according to the terms of the estimate upon which the appropriation of the last session of Congress was requested; and but for the circumstance above referred to, I should most likely have had the gratification of reporting it finished. It is proper to remark here, that the original plan of this work contemplates the revetment of the counterscarp, excepting on front four, with soda. Doubts are entertained, however, as to the durability of this material in a position like this, exposed to the abrasions of the waves and other action of the water in the ditches; and the question may arise as to whether it may not be proper to replace it by stone. This subject it was my intention to have brought to the notice of the War Department at the present time, and, if deemed necessary, to have submitted an estimate for a counterscarp revetment of stone.

Fort Calhoun, Hampton roads, Va.—The funds appropriated for this work have been applied in furtherance of the views referred to in my last annual report. Upwards of twenty-eight tons of stone have been added within the year to that previously received. Of the whole quantity received, 654.04 tons have been dressed for building, leaving 5,139.07 tons rough building, and 23,073 tons breakwater stone. All the stone required for building is now accumulated, and the position that will be eventually occupied by the mole serving as the basis of this work, is covered and protected by breakwater stone. Three thousand four hundred and sixty-five cubic yards of sand have been deposited within the interior of the fort towards elevating the terre plain. All the stone received this year, except eight hundred tons required for the extension of the mole to its proper limits, has been placed so as to act with a uniform pressure over the foundation of the walls of the work. It is estimated that the fort, when finished and garrisoned, will add to the permanent weight now acting on the foundation, about sixty-three thousand tons; of this, there are accumulated along its whole extent, and operating in a similar manner, 61,866 tons. It is proposed to add to this weight 25,000 tons of breakwater stone—the probable balance required for the graduation of the mole, and to compensate for its subsidence, and to allow the whole to remain until an equilibrium is established between the pressure and resistance, when the work may be resumed.

A careful examination has shown that, although the weight added within the present is double that of the previous year, yet the last annual subsidence of the centre of the work is less than one and a third of what it was in 1833—giving fair indication that the equilibrium will, ere long, be attained. Another favorable indication is, that those parts of the mole that formerly settled most, have this year gone down the least. On the whole, it may be inferred that all irregularity of settling is rapidly disappearing, and that the substratum is approaching a state of uniform compressibility throughout. During the gale of last winter, the temporary wooden wharf constructed for the reception of materials, having been much wormeaten, yielded to the action of the sea, and was almost entirely carried away; another has, therefore, become necessary; and it is proposed, with the funds now available, to build a new one, that its foundation may undergo the same test as that of the work.

Fort Macon, Beaufort, N. C.—Soon after I had the honor to submit my last annual report, when it was supposed that this work would, within a very short time, be finished, it was found necessary to fit up some of the casemates for the accommodation of the troops; to rebuild the wharf, which had become useless from decay, and to construct a dike to connect it with the fort. An estimate was submitted, and an appropriation made. The funds have been applied to these several objects, as well as in procuring materials for the preservation of the site; this being also contemplated by the estimate. The fort is completed and ready for inspection. The dike and wharf are, no doubt, done by this time, and the operations for the preservation of the beach have produced results of a very satisfactory character.

Fort Caswell, Oak island, N. C.—This work is in readiness to receive a garrison, and it is respectfully recommended that one be ordered to occupy it.

Fortifications in Charleston harbor, S. C.—Operations under this department in Charleston harbor have been directed, since my last report, to increasing the mole previously commenced on the site of Fort Sumter, and to the protection of the beach in the immediate vicinity of Fort Moultrie. They have, however, been but limited, in consequence of the late period at which the funds for the present year were rendered available. Five thousand five hundred and twenty-four tons of stone were added to the foundation of Fort Sumter in the fall of 1833, and the month of January last, when the shipments from the North were suspended for want of funds. Except the alteration produced by this addition, the mole remains in the same state as at the end of the last fiscal year. The heap, except at one place, is now raised to a level of two feet above low water, requiring about 11,000 tons of rough stone to complete it, besides ten thousand tons of split granite to form the foundations of the walls between high and low water. In this state it is proposed to leave the work till the question of jurisdiction over the spot shall be settled, and the necessary orders to that effect have been issued. This, it is hoped, will not be attended with much, if any delay. No estimate will, however, be submitted for that work, it being intended to apply the amount estimated for fortifications in Charleston harbor to the preservation of the site of Fort Moultrie.

In the month of September last, one hundred and twenty-seven tons of rough stone were deposited in the breakwater at Fort Moultrie. In consequence of not being able to procure sufficient stone in time, a portion of this work was washed away during the last winter and spring; this injury has, however, been repaired, and the whole work extended about one hundred and thirty feet: it is now upwards of one thousand three hundred feet long, presents a firm and substantial appearance, and has withstood several severe gales. The sand is accumulating about it, and experience, thus far, affords flattering assurances that the interesting and very desirable object for which it was commenced will soon be realized. It is proposed to extend it about four hundred feet further.

Fort Pulaski, Cockspur island, Ga.—This work has been prosecuted to the extent of the available means. The report from the local engineer presents it in a very satisfactory state.

Fort Marion, St. Augustine, Florida.—Little or nothing has been done at this work since my last report. Circumstances which are known to you, led to the belief, in the early part of the season, that the officer charged with operations at it had failed, in the application of the funds, to produce any satisfactory result. He was immediately suspended and brought to trial. He is still in arrest, and no report as to the condition of the work has as yet been received at this department. This, although much to be regretted, will be attended with comparatively little injury to the public service, owing to the very slight influence which the position exerts in our system of coast defence.

Fort Pickens, Pensacola harbor, Florida.—The estimate submitted last fall for this work, was, at the time, deemed amply sufficient to finish it, but the result has shown that the amount was too low. This has arisen, in part, from the great difficulty in anticipating all the contingencies incident to bringing a work of such magnitude to a final completion, and partly from the delay and consequent additional expense, in making the last appropriation, which did not become available till some time in June. Another appropriation has become necessary, and the objects to which it is proposed to apply the funds are, masonry, clay, sods, shells, carpentry, store-rooms, gates, magazines, a road, and bridge. The work was to have been delivered over to a garrison, in excellent condition, as far as completed, on the 1st of October last.

Fort on Foster's bank, Florida.—Ample preparations have been made for prosecuting this work with economy and despatch. Wharves, with other fixtures, and quarters, have been provided; a large amount of materials has been collected, and a well-organized force of mechanics and laborers engaged. The operations have been somewhat retarded by the exposed position of the work, which rendered it proper to limit the excavations for the scarp-wall during the month of September. This will not, however, be necessary after the 1st of October. The maximum estimate of $125,000, submitted by the local engineer, contemplates the completion of the whole work by the end of 1835, which he considers altogether practicable, with the facilities, in the way of materials and workmanship, at his command.

Fort Morgan, Mobile point, Ala.—This work has been finished according to the original plan, and is garrisoned.

Fort Livingston, Grande Terre, La.—The negotiation for the purchase of the site of this work, pending at the date of my last report, was, as anticipated, soon brought to a satisfactory termination. The purchase had been effected, and considerable preparation made for an efficient prosecution of the fort, when the works were suspended in consequence of the want of an officer of engineers to take the immediate direction of the operations. This occurred in July last, since which time nothing has been done further than to comply with the engagements entered into prior to the adoption of this measure.

Contingencies of fortifications.—Nine thousand three hundred and eighty-seven dollars and forty-two cents have been expended under this head during the fiscal year. This money has been applied to Fort McHenry, towers of Bienvenu and Dupre, Fort Jackson, Fort Hamilton, the survey of the fort at Provincetown harbor, and contingencies of the Engineer department.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.—HARBORS AND RIVERS.

Chicago harbor, Ill.—The operations for constructing an artificial harbor at this point on Lake Michigan, have progressed in a most satisfactory manner, considering the late period at which the appropriation became available, and the difficulties, in a country just emerging from a state of wilderness, to be overcome in procuring the necessary supplies of materials and workmen. The great importance of this improvement to the increasing commerce of the West is already felt—one hundred and eighty vessels having, between the opening of navigation and the 30th September last, arrived, and discharged their cargoes at this point, to be distributed along the shores of the Mississippi, through the valley of the Illinois. That this improvement is destined to form an essential link in the most important thoroughfare between the lakes and the Mississippi country, there can be no manner of doubt, and, for that reason, I would recommend that it be perfected as rapidly as circumstances will permit.

La Plaisance bay, Mich. Ter.—The operations on this work were resumed late in the working season, because of the prevalence of cholera, and the consequent difficulty of collecting the requisite force. Hopes are entertained, however, that ere this they have been brought to a close, and the pier completed in the manner contemplated.

For the condition of the works on the south shore of Lake Erie, as well as the progress made in their construction, I beg leave to refer you to the report of the general superintendent, herewith appended, marked D.

Genesee river and Bigodus bay, Lake Ontario, N. Y.—Concurring fully in the views and suggestions of the immediate superintendent of the very important improvements at these places, I therefore beg leave to refer to his report, hereunto appended, marked E, as furnishing a concise statement of their actual condition, and also submitting the agent's views with regard to their permanent preservation.

Oswego, Lake Ontario, N. Y.—The funds appropriated for the works at this place became available at so late a period, that it was found impracticable to do more than to repair the injuries sustained by the storms of ice of the last winter, and to strengthen the mole by a deposit of about nine hundred cords of large stone. The unexpended part of the appropriation is supposed to be ample to meet the wants of the service for next year; no estimate for this work will, therefore, be submitted at this time. The sum of $3,666 was appropriated at the last session of Congress, for erecting a beacon-light at the end of one of the piers of this harbor. The application of this sum was committed to this department late in July last. The local engineer was, accordingly, instructed to carry into effect the object of the appropriation. It was soon found, however, that the sum appropriated would not accomplish the object, and, for that reason, the work was suspended till the facts could be made known and the further action of Congress obtained.

Monument on Steele's ledge, Penobscot bay, Me.—The sum of four thousand six hundred dollars was appropriated at the last session of Congress for this structure. It became available too late in the season to admit of much being done during the present year. The measures proper to carry the intention of Congress into effect have, however, been taken, and the work will progress with as little delay as practicable.

Piers at Kennebunk, Me.—The damages sustained last winter by the pier on the western entrance into this river, and the "Perch rock" pier, were repaired during the last summer. Preparations have been made to commence early next season the construction of the eastern pier, for which an appropriation was made at the last session of Congress, in a permanent manner. The lateness at which the appropriation became available, rendered this postponement indispensable.

Merrimack river, Mass.—The breakwater at this place has been strengthened by the addition of three hundred and twenty-four tons of stone placed at the end and sides most exposed to the violent action of the sea. The pier leading from Badger's rock to Salisbury shore, commenced in August, is two-thirds finished, and hopes are entertained that it will be completed before winter sets in. These improvements have sensibly benefited the navigation, and will afford a safe point of refuge to vessels which may be compelled, by stress of weather, to seek shelter in that neighborhood.

Deer island, Boston harbor, Mass.—All the works projected for the preservation of this island have been completed.

Provincetown harbor, Mass.—The season proper for promote the works to preserve this important harbor having passed before the funds for this purpose became available, operations were, from necessity, postponed till the next spring, when it is hoped that at least two hundred acres will be planted in grass. Those parts of the beach heretofore worked on are represented as doing well.

Plymouth Beach, Mass.—Five hundred feet of stone-wall have been constructed since my last report, on the west side of the breakwater at this place. Grass, to arrest the drifting sand, has been set out at various places on the beach, to the extent of about 50,000 feet, and 1,870 feet of brush fence, having the same object, have been constructed. The general condition of the beach is represented as good. The local superintendent says his operations are attended with success, and believes that the estimate now submitted, amounting to seven hundred dollars, will be sufficient to provide every thing necessary to place the beach in a condition to require but little more, unless the inroads of the sea should produce a new state of things.

Hyannis breakwater, Mass.—Owing to the lateness of the season at which the appropriation for this work became available, but little progress could be made towards its extension during the present year. It is, however, represented as affording to the coasting navigation considerable protection, and as promising to be very effective when completed.

Hudson river, N. Y.—At the last session of Congress seventy thousand dollars were appropriated towards the improvement of this river from a point a little below Albany to Waterford. This sum was committed to this department for application. The law making the appropriation designates the plan upon which the improvement is to be made. With the view, therefore, to take the measures proper to carry into effect the wishes of Congress, this plan was, for the first time, examined in this department; and the result of this examination is a serious apprehension that the plan is impracticable, and totally inadequate to produce the desirable results for which it is plain the appropriation was intended. This may appear somewhat surprising, as the law refers to this plan in a way to induce the belief, on a casual examination, that the project had been sent to Congress for its action after having received the sanction of the War Department. Such is not, however, the case. The gentleman who projected this plan, being at the time a civil engineer in the employment of the General Government, was required simply to make an examination of the river within the limits mentioned, with the view to procure all the facts in relation to the obstructions, which it is the object of this appropriation in part to remove. These facts, his instructions expressly stated, were to be laid before the Board of Internal Improvement, to enable it to devise and mature a plan for the purpose. The examination seems only to have been made, however, to the extent deemed necessary by the gentleman charged with it, to enable him to devise a plan himself. This plan is that referred to in the law. Before it was submitted by its author, the branch of service to which he belonged was separated from this department, and, of course, his returns were not made to it, but to the Topographical bureau, where they were filed, and the subject never went before the board. Soon afterwards, 15th of March, 1832, it was resolved by the House of Representatives "that the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to this House the survey and report for the improvement of the Hudson river;" and on the 30th of the same month all the papers embracing the plan were sent up, without the expression of any opinion as to its merits, or of the survey upon which it was based.

This improvement is one of the most important that has ever been committed to this department, and its difficulty is commensurate with the vast interests to be affected by it. Under these circumstances, it was deemed proper that a competent agent should be sent to the Hudson to verify the survey, and to supply the defects of the drawings, after an examination into the natural causes which operate to produce the obstructions to be overcome; to report upon the plan devised to remove them; and, finally, to submit in detail such views as might be suggested by the nature of the difficulties. This seemed indispensably necessary, in order that the department might have some fixed and well-defined project upon which to go to work with the hope of success.

An officer of engineers, in whose ability the department has the utmost confidence, was therefore designated for the performance of this duty, and to manage the improvement generally; but, owing to the crippled and totally inadequate force of the corps of engineers to meet the increasing demands upon it, it was found impracticable for some time to relieve the officer thus detailed from the duties with which he had been previously charged. After some delay, however, he was finally despatched to the Hudson, and is at present actively engaged in his new duties. It is hoped that the course pursued with reference to this improvement may prove satisfactory. It was adopted from a conviction of its necessity, and a strong belief that it will be found in the end to have expedited the work, and to have saved a large amount of money from total loss. It is probable that the proper plan for prosecuting this improvement may differ widely from that alluded to in the law; in which event, some further legislative action on the subject will become necessary before the funds now available can be expended. As soon as the subject shall be matured, it will be submitted, that such further measures may be taken as circumstances may seem to you to render proper.

Harbors of Newcastle, Marcus Hook, Chester, and Port Penn, Delaware river.—No report in reference to these improvements has as yet reached the department, and for the reason, no doubt, which has operated to delay the report for Port Delaware, the same officer being charged with both.

Ocracoke Inlet, N. C.—The report of the officer charged with the improvements at this place is herewith submitted, marked F. It possesses considerable interest, and I would, therefore, respectfully call your attention to it.

Cape Fear river, N. C.—The appropriations for the improvement of this river having exceeded the original estimates, without being attended with any permanent benefit, and the local engineer having suggested a system of improvement requiring further appropriations, his report is herewith appended, marked G, to which I beg leave to call your attention.

Savannah river, Ga.—The requisite surveys to ascertain the extent of the obstructions to be removed for the improvement of this river have been completed, and a return thereof submitted to the consideration of Congress at its last session. The dredge and tow boats, and mud flats, with machinery, are in a forward state of preparation, and it is anticipated that the operations for clearing the channel will be commenced at an early day with much force and vigor.

Inland pass between the St. John's and St. Mary's, Florida.—Nothing has been done as yet at this place, and for reasons stated in my last annual report. The result would have been the same, however, even if one or more of the dredging boats in operation under the department on that section of the coast had become available for this improvement, for the department had no officer whose services were not imperiously required elsewhere.

Ochlochony river, Florida.—The expenditures on this river have been directed to the removal of the rafts and trees which obstructed its navigation. The river is now open for a distance of one hundred and fifty miles from its mouth.

Appalachicola river, Florida.—The improvement of the Appalachicola harbor to the opening of the "straight channel," has been attended with great success. Vessels of the largest class, trading in that quarter, now pass up to the wharves of the town. It remains to be determined whether it will be necessary to obstruct the other outlets of the river, to force the water more effectually into the new channel. Should this become necessary, there are abundant funds available to effect it.

St. Mark's river and harbor, Florida.—The want of funds during the last year, and the high waters of the present, have retarded very considerably the operations for the improvement of the river. The works on the river are, for the present, suspended. Similar causes, joined to the prevalence of disease, have operated to the prejudice of the harbor improvements. All unnecessary delay will be avoided, to bring these works to a close.

Escambia river, Florida.—Soon after the appropriation was made for the improvement of this river, the work was put under contract, subject to the general supervision of an officer already charged with several works of equal, and perhaps greater importance, because the department had no officer in whose immediate charge it could be placed. The department is now informed that the contractors have failed to fulfil their engagements. Up to the middle of December last they had but partially cleared a small portion of the river of its obstructions, when their operations were arrested by high water, which continued from that time to the close of August. In consequence of the dilatory proceedings of the contractors last year, and their having made no preparations to resume operations the present, it was determined in August last, to take the work out of their hands and to prosecute it with hired labor. The exorbitant price asked for labor at that time was, however, a source of further delay, and the probability now is, that, notwithstanding the work may have been commenced, as was expected on the 1st of October, it may not have been with sufficient force to finish it before the winter freshets begin. All of this difficulty, which cannot but be attended with a sacrifice of much money, would have been avoided if an officer could have been spared to take the immediate direction of the improvement in the first instance. The further prosecution of the work has been, from necessity, transferred to the Quartermaster's department.

Mobile harbor, Alabama.—As anticipated in my last report, the operations at this place were, early in the present year, brought to a satisfactory termination. The channel through this pass is one hundred feet wide and ten deep. Vessels navigating the bay have now a direct passage into port, and are no longer obliged to reach it by the circuitous route of the Spanish river. The width of the channel was, however, soon discovered to be insufficient to admit the free passage of vessels with adverse winds; and to avoid this difficulty, an enlargement of three hundred feet was recommended. An appropriation of $10,000 was accordingly made at the last session of Congress to effect this object. In taking the usual measures to apply this money, it was soon perceived that the machinery used under former appropriations was out of order and very much worn, requiring extensive repairs to render it useful. That the funds might not be exhausted in making these repairs, the work was put out to contract. The contractor having expressed fears of not being able to make the improvement for the price stipulated, was desirous of being released from his obligation; but this having been refused him on the part of the Government, because of the great delay occasioned by his having taken the contract, it was hoped that he had commenced the work, as it was believed that, with proper management and economy, he could have accomplished it for the contract price and obtained a fair profit. A letter has just been received, however, communicating the determination of the contractor to have nothing to do with it. To repair the old machinery of the Government, and prosecute the improvement by hired labor, the funds would be insufficient. An additional appropriation will, therefore, be necessary, and it is to be regretted that this information did not reach the department in time to include the amount in the regular estimate: it is $18,000.

Pascagoula river, Miss.—The difficulties with the contractor, referred to in my report of last year, still continue, to a certain extent, to exist, and to retard the operations of the improvement at the mouth of this river. The work is progressing, yet so slowly, and so little to the satisfaction of the general superintendent, that he proposed, should no improvement in this respect have taken place by the 1st of this month, to resort to legal measures to abrogate the contract, after which the work will be prosecuted either by hired labor or a new contract, under penalties that will ensure its execution. The available funds are supposed to be ample to effect the object.

Ohio and Mississippi rivers.—For the information as to the state of the improvements in these rivers, I beg leave to refer you to the reports of the officer charged with their general superintendence. They are appended, marked H, H 1, and H 2.

Red river, La.—Operations on this river were suspended last fall for want of funds. The appropriation for their further prosecution was made at so late a period as to render it impracticable to do any thing during the last summer. The agent charged with the improvement has, however, made all the necessary preparations to prosecute the work with despatch, to the extent of the available means, and is, no doubt, at the great raft ere this.

Arkansas river, Arkansas Territory.—The operations for the improvement of this river were prosecuted last winter till the funds were exhausted. They extended from the mouth of the river to Little Rock, a distance of 250 miles. Within these limits 1,557 snags were taken from the channel, and 3,370 snags and logs cut from the sand-bars and under the banks within the bed of the river. The navigation has been much benefited, but there is yet much room for improvement.

Cumberland river.—The operations for improving the navigation of this river have, since the date of my last report, been directed to strengthening the wing dams at Flax Patch bar, the head and foot of Harpeth island, and to quarrying and removing the rock from the channel-way of Harpeth shoals, the bottom of which is stated to be reduced to an even surface, and to have more water over it than the sand-bars below. A number of the most dangerous snags have been removed from the bed of the stream between the shoal and Line island. A conglomerate of gravel and iron ore, forming a ledge in the channel of the Devil's chute, at a place where it is but twenty-seven feet wide, has been, in part, taken out, and the whole will most likely be removed this fall. After this the force will be concentrated at Line island, to raise the steamer President, wrecked last June in the channel at that place.

LIGHT-HOUSES AND BEACON-LIGHTS.

The appropriations for the lights at Huron, Grand river, Cunningham creek, Ashtabula creek, Conneaut creek, in the State of Ohio; Genesee river, Big Sodus bay, and Oswego, in New York; and Goat island, Rhode Island, were referred for application to this department. Measures have been taken to apply the funds for the first five named, but those for the latter not being sufficient to accomplish any thing of a permanent and substantial character, it was deemed proper to wait the further action of Congress in the matter. The reports, with estimates of the agents at Genesee, Big Sodus, Oswego, and Goat island, have been referred to the proper department, that they may, if deemed necessary, be laid before Congress.

ROADS.

Roads from Detroit to Fort Gratiot, Saginaw, mouth of Grand river, and Chicago, in the Territory of Michigan.—No appropriations having been made at the last session of Congress for the continuation of these roads, operations on them were, of course, limited to the funds remaining to be applied from the appropriations of the previous year. Estimates for the completion of the first, and continuation of the others, will be submitted.

Road from La Plaisance bay to the road leading from Detroit to Chicago, Mich.—Circumstances have conspired to render the last season one of the most unpropitious for the progress of this road. The continued rains of last fall and spring, and the prevalence of disease throughout the Territory during the summer, retarded the work to a very considerable degree. Eighteen and a half miles have, however, been finished in portions at different points of the route, and eight and a half are in progress, with fair prospects of being completed this season, leaving twenty and three-quarters miles unfinished, for which an estimate will be submitted. Such portions of the road as are done, are represented as having been well executed, and upon very reasonable terms.

Roads from Clinton to the rapids of Grand river; from Sheldon to the mouth of the St. Joseph's; from Niles to the same point; from Port Lawrence to Adrian, and from Fuskula to the Indiana State line, Michigan.—The appropriations for these roads having been referred to this department, the necessary instructions have been issued to apply them in a manner to meet the views of Congress. No returns having been received from the agents, it is impossible to state, at this time, how far operations have progressed.

Road from Line creek to the Chattahoochee, Alabama.—No appropriation was made for this road at the last session of Congress. The unexpended balance of the former appropriation has been applied during the year, and an estimate for continuing the operation to the completion of the road will be submitted.

Road from the north boundary line of Florida to Appalachicola, Florida.—A topographical engineer is now engaged in making a survey of the route of this road, in conformity to the requirements of the law. The survey not having been finished, nothing has been done, of course, towards construction.

Road from Memphis to the St. Francis river.—The returns of the survey of this road did not reach this department till the 18th of June last. It was, therefore, not till the 25th of July that the preliminaries necessary to enter into the object of the appropriation could be accomplished. A re-examination and survey of the route were then made, and advertisements issued for proposals to construct by contract. In the mean time the requisite subdivisions of the route to be embraced by the contracts were marked off, and the superintendent now reports that the work contracted for has progressed to his entire satisfaction; the contractors evincing every disposition to prosecute their engagements with energy, and giving little apprehension that any of them will be forfeited from failure or other cause. Nine miles of the distance, over the worst part, are nearly completed, and on the remaining distance of sixteen miles the work is progressing well. The agent represents the necessity of forcing his operations; this being required by the great emigration to Arkansas, that has no other road by which to reach its destination. This being also consistent with economy, he has, accordingly, submitted an estimate of the sum required to complete the road, which, together with the amount appropriated, will make the total cost less than the original estimate.

Cumberland road in Illinois and Indiana.—Little or nothing has been done on the national road in these States, in the way of extension, since the date of my last annual report. For reasons then stated with regard to the road in Illinois, and in consequence of the increasing difficulties on that in Indiana, it became a matter of great importance to limit the expenditures in these States to the fulfilment of existing contracts, in the hope that some legislative action might be had that would produce a better state of things. This hope was only realized in the month of June last, after a great portion of the best part of the working season had passed. An officer of engineers, possessing much experience, was designated, with as little loss of time as practicable, to take charge of the work. He has been engaged, since his arrival on the road, in ascertaining the state of its affairs, and in organizing an efficient force for the active prosecution of operations. His annual report has not yet reached the department. This is doubtless owing to the sickness with which he has been much afflicted during the past summer, but as soon as it is received, it shall be laid before you.

Cumberland road in Ohio.—For the condition of that portion of this road yet in the hands of the General Government, as well as for the progress made in its construction, I beg leave to refer to the report of the superintendent, herewith submitted, marked I.

Cumberland road east of the Ohio.—No report on the present condition of this road has been received. This is to be attributed to the causes referred to under the heads of Fort Delaware and harbors in the Delaware river, all appertaining to the superintendence of the same officer.

Northern boundary of the State of Ohio.—Observations for the determination of this line were prosecuted last summer to the extent that the available means would allow. The results have not yet been communicated, and for the reason that the officer who made the observations has, as yet, had no time to complete his calculations, having been constantly occupied with duties that would not admit of delay. Indeed, it is impossible to say when they can be looked for; certainly not till the examination of the Hudson shall be made. The same officer is now charged with both.

Monument to the memory of General Brown.—This is nearly completed. It was put under contract in New York soon after the appropriation was made. It will be in its place by the 1st of January at farthest.

Basement story of War office.—The appropriation for fitting up the basement story of the War office has all been applied to the objects for which it was made.

The lithographic press of the War Department has been employed during the past year in the usual way.

Military Academy.—This institution continues to sustain its high reputation, as is shown by the report of the Board of Visitors who attended the last annual examination of the cadets. The report is submitted herewith, marked K. I visited the academy in September.

The Board of Engineers.—The duties of the board have been the same as heretofore.

Office of the Chief Engineer.—The current business of the office is of the same character as heretofore, though somewhat increased, in consequence of the additional works referred to the Engineer department.

The subject of an increase of the corps of engineers has been so repeatedly and earnestly urged on the attention of the War Department and of Congress, without finding any remedy for the evils as frequently referred to, that I almost consider it out of place to renew it here. The palpable inadequacy, however, of this arm of service to meet the numerous requirements of Congress, still leaves room to hope that if the facts are fairly stated and understood, the labor and responsibility annually thrown upon the department will either be diminished, or its force made commensurate with them. This is not to be understood as a complaint that Congress require too much; it is a candid declaration of what is really the fact, that all they require cannot be accomplished with the present means. What are the facts?

Ninety-one different appropriations, amounting to more than two millions of dollars, have been referred to this department for application within one fiscal year; and to accomplish this, and to meet all the responsibility which it involves, the department is provided with only twenty-seven officers whose services can with certainty be commanded; and of these, about one-third have had no experience. The consequence is, that works of the utmost importance, with large sums of money, are committed to the hands of agents unknown to the department, with no certainty whatever that the one will be properly managed, or the other faithfully applied and accounted for. Besides, these agents are very numerous; their compensation is drawn from appropriations under which they are employed; citizens acting in the responsible capacity of constructing engineers and disbursing agents must be well paid; and hence large amounts of many of the appropriations are diverted from their proper objects, and applied to the payment of salaries. But if this was the extent of the evil, it would be comparatively unimportant.

Large sums are lost for want of sufficient agents qualified to project and execute plans for the improvements ordered by Congress. A reference to the numerous reports on the failure of works, particularly to my last annual report, will abundantly show that this remark is not induced by any hypothetical case; it is, unfortunately, the suggestion of experience; so that, besides being executed badly as to durability, and, as regards neatness and appearance, in a manner little calculated to do us any credit, many of our public works cost, on an average, at least fifty per cent. more than they would under a different arrangement. There is certainly no economy in this: enough money has been wasted within the last few years to have supported a corps of professional engineers sufficient for the proper management of all the national improvements in the country.

The completion and the consequent advantages expected from our public works are, moreover, retarded and deferred by the operation of the same causes. One million and seventy-six thousand dollars of the appropriations made and referred to this department in the beginning of 1833, remained unexpended at the end of that fiscal year. The sum of one million seven hundred and ninety-nine thousand dollars and upwards, applicable to the works of fortifications and internal improvement, was undrawn from the Treasury on the 1st of October.

A comparative view of the face of our country twenty years hence, improved under the present system and that proposed, with the same amount of money, if such a thing were possible, would present a difference in favor of the latter that could not fail to impress every mind feeling the least interest in the subject with the extravagance of our present mode of doing business.

The evils here complained of cannot be remedied by any system of supervision at this place, however vigilant. The character of every work of improvement, if it satisfy the object of its creation, must necessarily depend upon circumstances peculiar to its locality, and the end to be attained. These can only be understood and appreciated by those possessing an acquaintance with the sciences, and a professional experience which cannot be expected from persons who may be induced in advanced age to quit other pursuits to commence the subject of engineering from considerations of mere pecuniary gain; yet the department must act, and authorize expenditures, upon information derived from agents of this description, or, what in many cases might be better, cease to act at all.

An efficient and economical execution of the will of Congress in matters referred to the Engineer department can only be expected from a regular and well-constituted corps of professional men, whose interests shall be identified with a faithful performance of the duties required of them. This cannot be looked for under the present state of things.

An effort has been made to organize a system of inspection; by which the errors of inexperience might be corrected before they could lead to consequences of a serious character; but the only officers fitted by skill and experience for such duty being literally broken down by the mass of labor already heaped upon them, the effort proved unavailing. There is not one of these officers who is not charged with the responsibility of conducting some half dozen works at the same time, leaving them little time for study, and less for the relaxation absolutely essential to health.

For the reasons stated, it is recommended to increase the present corps of engineers to the extent deemed absolutely essential to meet the wants of the department. The plan of increase proposed would add annually three members to the lowest grade of the corps, till it should attain the form and organization presented in Senate bill No. 78, of the session of 1829-30, as amended and reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, 12th February, 1829. This bill is as follows:

A BILL providing for the gradual increase of the Corps of Engineers, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to add to the corps of engineers, whenever he may deem it expedient to increase the same, one lieutenant colonel, two majors, six captains, six first and six second lieutenants: Provided, That not more than three lieutenants shall be added annually over and above the number necessary to fill vacancies which may occur in said corps, until the whole corps shall take the form and organization above prescribed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the pay and emoluments of the officers of the said corps shall be equal to those allowed to the officers of the light dragoons, under the act of the 12th of April, one thousand eight hundred and eight, except so far as relates to the rations allowed to the captains and lieutenants by said act; in lieu of which the captains and lieutenants of said corps shall be entitled to receive the same subsistence as is now allowed to the other corps of the army; and that in cases in which forage is not drawn in kind, the officers of the said corps shall be entitled to receive, in lieu thereof, eight dollars per month for each horse which said officers may, by their rank, be entitled to keep.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act passed the twenty-ninth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, entitled "An act making further provision for the corps of engineers," as provides that one paymaster shall be taken from the subalterns of the corps of engineers, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and that the paymaster so authorized and provided be attached to the Pay department, and be in every respect placed on the footing of other paymasters of the army.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the officers authorized to be appointed by this act be subject to the rules and articles of war as they are now, or may be hereafter, established.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all letters and packets to and from the Chief Engineer, which may relate to his official duties, shall be free from postage.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

C. GRATIOT,
Brig. Gen., Chief Engineer.

REPORT OF THE BOARD OF VISITERS OF THE MILITARY ACADEMY.

WEST POINT, (N. Y.) June 17, 1834.

To the Secretary of War:

SIR: In compliance with your request, the undersigned have attended, as a Board of Visitors, during the general examination, at the United States Military Academy, just concluded, and have "directed their inquiries to a full and free investigation in regard to the course of instruction, both military and scientific, and to the internal police, discipline, and fiscal concerns of the institution." That these several objects of inquiry might be attended to as thoroughly and successfully as possible, the board, at its organization, referred them to separate committees, who have presented full reports with regard to them, accompanied by some suggestions for the improvement of the institution. Copies of these reports are forwarded to you; and the board take the liberty of referring you to them for details, while they confine their joint report to a general and brief view of the present condition of the academy.

The fidelity of the professors, and the assiduity and proficiency of their pupils, were tested by an examination on the several subjects, extending over eleven days, and continued each day for eight hours.

The sciences not strictly professional, included in these examinations, were mathematics, taught here from the elements of arithmetic to the profound theorems of the integral calculus; natural philosophy, including mechanics and astronomy; chemistry, in connexion with mineralogy and geology; and, lastly, rhetoric, and moral and political science.

The subjects of professional study are, civil and military engineering, and infantry and artillery tactics; with the last of which are connected ballistics and pyrotechny.

A part of the first two years is devoted to the study of the French language, with which a competent acquaintance is required by the cadets.

Lastly, great attention is very properly paid, in this academy, to the art of drawing, the practical applications of which are so frequent and important in the military profession.

These subjects, combined, certainly constitute an excellent preparatory education for officers of the army, and the examinations proved that they were faithfully and skilfully taught. Marked inequalities were, indeed, observed in the proficiency of the cadets, and defects remain to be corrected in the organization of some of the departments; but still the exhibition was, on the whole, highly satisfactory and gratifying.

Frequent opportunities were presented to the board of witnessing the practical skill of the corps in infantry and artillery exercises, and their fine and soldierlike appearance in the ranks, and the accuracy with which they executed their various evolutions proved that this essential part of the duties of a military academy was sedulously attended to by both officers and cadets.

The discipline of the institution was carefully examined in its various bearings, and the board have reason to think that it is in an excellent state. The laws seem to be executed with a stern regard to the good of the service, yet with kind and paternal feelings; and the officers and professors are believed to be generally both beloved and respected.

The internal police of the institution was found to be carefully attended to. The rooms in the barracks, occupied by the cadets, exhibit a gratifying appearance of neatness and order, while, at the same time, they give rise to regret on account of the inadequate accommodation which they offer. The mess-table is well supplied with plain, but good and wholesome food. In the event of sickness, which the board are happy to find has been lately of rare occurrence, suitable and comfortable accommodations are provided at the hospital, with the best medical attendance.

The board directed an inquiry to be instituted, with as much minuteness as circumstances would admit, into the fiscal concerns of the institution. The result, which will be found fully detailed in one of the reports sent herewith, is, that the accounts are kept in a correct and satisfactory manner; that the expenditures are made in accordance with the appropriations; and that a proper attention is paid to economy in the expenses of every kind. To prevent extravagance in the cadets, there is a regulation which prohibits to them the possession of money, or the use of it, or expenditure of it, except with the consent of the superintendent, who stands, with regard to them, in the place of a parent, and who, it is believed, exercises his authority with enlightened discretion.

The whole investigations of the board lead them to the conclusion that the Military Academy is a most valuable and essential part of the army establishment of the United States; that, at a cost so low as not to exceed that of a second-rate man-of-war, it prepares, and can spread over the whole country, officers instructed, and capable of giving instruction, in the military art; and thus, without the danger arising to liberty from large standing armies in time of peace, enables the Government to fulfil the duty which the constitution so solemnly enjoins, of "providing for the common defence;" and, lastly, that if our young citizens were commissioned in the army as lieutenants, in the first instance, as they must be if this institution be abolished, they could not obtain, in four years, even the same military knowledge as the cadets, while their probation and education would be far more expensive to the country.

The undersigned freely subscribe to the within report, without expressing an opinion with regard to the last paragraph.

WM. SMYTH.

J. W. SCOTT.

The undersigned, having been invited to be present, as a visitor, at the general examination of the cadets of the United States Military Academy, can, with the greatest pleasure, bear testimony to the proficiency, generally, of the pupils in the various departments of learning, both military and scientific, which have occupied their attention; but, in conforming to the letter of instructions forwarded to him by the honorable the Secretary of War, which is as follows: "The object of this regulation is, that the War Department may be correctly informed of the condition and management of all the concerns of the academy; it is, therefore, desired, in conjunction with the other members of the board, that your inquiries may be directed to a full and free investigation in regard to the course of instruction, both military and scientific; to the internal police, discipline, and fiscal concerns of the institution; for which purpose every facility will be afforded by the superintendent. The result of your observations, with any suggestions for the improvement of the academy, will be communicated to this department"—feels it to be his duty, without an utter abandonment of opinions long since formed, and deliberately entertained and expressed for years, but with great deference to the opinions of other members of the board, to dissent from some of the views contained in the general report which has been submitted by the Military Committee.

Deeming it unnecessary to inquire whether a military academy is necessary and proper for the existence or support of a free republican Government, where every citizen will be, at all times, ready to stand forth in defence of the liberty and independence of his country, the undersigned will proceed simply to make a few observations, which, he thinks, may justly be presented, with regard to the administration, and as suggestions for the improvement of this establishment.

By reference to the history of the military school at West Point, it is worthy of remark that, in the early usage of the government of the institution, the pupils were selected mostly from the indigent sons of that class of revolutionary worthies who had shed their blood in defence of our national rights and independence. It would seem, then, that this institution was principally designed, by its founders, for the education of indigent and meritorious young men. A list of those, however, who have been admitted as cadets, shows, conclusively, that a large proportion of them have been drawn from the rich, the influential, and the wealthy classes of the community; and this, doubtless, may be attributed to the power of nomination and selection being lodged in the hands of Senators and Representatives.

That such a mode of recommendation and selection is every way objectionable and unjust, there certainly can be but one opinion among men of candid and impartial minds; to say nothing of the bad policy of educating and rearing up, either for the army or for the walks of civil life, the sons and relatives of the rich and powerful at the public expense.

Any institution supported by the funds of the National Government, which closes its doors to any class of merit, however friendless and indigent, seems to the undersigned to be unequal and partial in its operations, inconsistent with the spirit and genius of our liberal institutions, anti-republican in its tendency, and should not be tolerated.

Another and most important objection is the exclusive privilege to which its graduates are entitled, of being promoted to stations in the army, while other individuals in society, who have not had the advantages (free of expense) of instruction at this Military Academy, though their talents and qualifications may be sufficient, and in every way equal to those of the cadets, are entirely excluded.

The undersigned has thus briefly and candidly sketched some of the objections which, it seems to him, must occur to the mind of every one to the administration of this establishment. Nor is he singular in these views.

The people of the State of Ohio, of which he has long been a humble citizen, have been led to examine into the merits of this institution, and have, unless he is greatly deceived, very distinctly declared their opinions, not only through their legislative body, but by an expression of public meetings of intelligent and respectable citizens, against the expediency as well as constitutionality of this seminary.

It is not the province of the undersigned to suggest the remedy: that rests with the Congress of the United States, and not with the Board of Visitors. But he believes that nothing, at present, can have a tendency to allay the well-grounded objections and prejudices against this establishment, until merit and talents, and not the influence of wealth, or of personal or of political favoritism, shall be the tests of admission.

JOHN HAMM, of Ohio.

WEST POINT, (N. Y.) June 16, 1834.

Report of the Committee on Internal Police.

The Committee on Internal Police, whose duty it was made to inquire into the state of the public buildings, the accommodations for study, for recreations, and for sleeping; the subsistence and clothing of the cadets, and the state of the hospital, and the attention to the sick, have examined the various subjects submitted to them, and do now report the information collected.

The public buildings are of solid and permanent materials, and of good workmanship; they are in a state of good repair, and a remarkable degree of neatness and cleanliness every where pervades them.

In the main they are well adapted to the purposes to which they are appropriated: there are some exceptions, and to these attention is now invited.

The north barracks contain forty-eight rooms, and in each room are located from four to five cadets: whether this number is not too great, if the comfort of the cadets be consulted, is an inquiry well deserving consideration.

The rooms in the south barracks are thirteen feet six inches long and nine feet wide; the doors open directly into the piazza, and are immediately fronting the fire-place. In each of these rooms are located three cadets. The size and exposed situation of the rooms in these barracks, and the number of cadets quartered in each room, are inconsistent with the health and comfort of the occupants.

A radical alteration in these barracks ought to be made, and additional rooms for the accommodation of the cadets ought to be provided.

The rooms may possibly be rendered less exposed by enclosing the piazzas with a permanent wall, or with temporary blinds during the winter; but, with these alterations, additional rooms ought to be provided. The rooms are entirely too small for the accommodation of three cadets.

In the further prosecution of the inquiries submitted to us, we ascertained that, throughout the whole establishment, no room was set apart for chemical purposes, or in which a laboratory had been erected; nor was there a room of adequate size provided, in which might be kept the philosophical apparatus. A large and elegant telescope, understood to have cost fourteen hundred dollars, is placed in a slight wooden building, perishable in its nature, and insecure in its structure. A house erected with a view of supplying these evident and palpable deficiencies, that is to say, a house which should contain additional rooms for the cadets, rooms for the chemical and philosophical apparatus, if built of permanent materials, and in a workmanlike manner, would increase the value of the real estate belonging to the Government, by a sum nearly, if not quite, equal to the cost of the building.

The committee inspected the rooms of the cadets: great neatness, cleanliness, and order, prevailed throughout. Upon inquiring into the cause of the great uniformity which pervaded each room, it was ascertained that the regulations of the institution descend to the most minute particulars, such, for example, as assigning a particular place for the books, caps, beds, tables, and, in truth, for every article of necessity or convenience belonging to the cadet. No cadet is permitted to use tobacco, or any inebriating drink; and to this regulation may, in part, be attributed the cleanliness of the rooms, and the general good order which prevails in the institution.

Your committee next turned their attention to the subsistence of the cadets, and they were surprised to learn that no storehouse had ever been provided at public expense. A small wooden building has been erected at the expense of the contractor, in which are placed, for safe-keeping, the different kinds of crockery ware. Any thing but order reigns. No improper imputation is designed to be thrown on the contractor; a different and a better arrangement cannot be made in a building of so small a size. A permanent building, of adequate dimensions, can be built for one thousand dollars.

The subsistence, as set forth in the bill of fare, and as is provided by the contractor, is abundant and wholesome, and sufficiently varied. The viands and vegetables are varied each and every day. The clothing of the cadets is abundant, of good materials, and supplied at reasonable prices fixed by the Board of Clothing Inspectors. Each cadet is furnished with a check-book, and is not to be supplied with articles by the storekeeper, tailor, or shoemaker, without an order in such book from the superintendent, or, in his absence, of the commandant.

These regulations prevent the cadet from being overreached in prices he might be made to pay for articles purchased, and enables the prudence of the superintendent to inculcate lessons of economy. Articles of necessity and comfort are furnished him; those of luxury and unprofitableness are withheld from him.

Every part of the hospital is well arranged, and is characterized by neatness and cleanliness.

Whatever can render tolerable the bed of sickness, whether it be the appearance of the external objects, or the kindness and assiduity of the physicians, is to be found. Fortunately, the salubrity of the climate and the elevation of the country prevent the frequent occurrence of disease.

All which is respectfully submitted, by order of the committee.

W. C. STANLEY, Chairman.

Report of the Committee on the Course of Studies.

The Committee on the Course of Studies report as follows:

The only preliminary knowledge required for admission into the Military Academy is reading, writing, and the first elements of arithmetic. Several previous boards have strongly urged the necessity of adding to these prerequisites, but while the importance of their recommendation must be admitted, the fear of excluding candidates from remote parts of the country, where the means of good education are not at command, has prevented its adoption. It appears, however, to your committee, that there could be no valid objection to extending the prerequisites at least so far as to include geography, (an essential practical science, not taught at the academy,) and English grammar and composition, to be tested by the ability to write correctly on some suitable theme proposed at the examination.

The science which is justly made the basis of instruction at the academy, is mathematics. By far the greater part of the first two years is devoted to the pure science, and its applications are met with in nearly all the studies of the remaining course. The examinations included algebra, synthetic, descriptive, and analytical geometry, plane and spherical trigonometry, mensuration, and surveying, perspective, and the differential and integral calculus. These examinations were, on the whole, highly satisfactory, and showed, at the same time, the fidelity of the professors, and the assiduity of their pupils.

Natural philosophy is the principal study of the second class. A thorough examination in mechanics having been held in January, the class were now only questioned generally on the subject, and the examination was principally confined to electricity, magnetism, optics, and astronomy, with which studies the class exhibited a competent acquaintance. Your committee are pleased to have it in their power to speak in terms of just praise of the manner in which this department is conducted.

The second class were also examined on chemistry, and your committee were well satisfied with their performance, especially when they consider the unmerited disadvantage under which the department labors. Instead of having an independent organization, established by law, it exists only by executive authority. In the merit-roll, chemistry is valued at least one-third of natural philosophy. The acting professor, who has occupied his chair, with acknowledged ability, for many years, has only the pay of a second lieutenant, and is outranked at the academic board, by the assistant professors, many of whom have been his pupils. Your committee cordially join in the recommendations made by previous boards, that the department of chemistry, including mineralogy and geology, be placed on the footing of the other schools, having a permanent professor, and two officers acting as assistant professors, to one of whom the subjects of mineralogy and geology might be specially intrusted.

Engineering and the science of war constitute the principal studies of the senior class. The first examination held was on these subjects, and it was certainly such as must have proved satisfactory to the board. The general excellence of the drawings exhibited and of the sketches executed on the black-boards during the examination was particularly striking.

Infantry and artillery tactics, and pyrotechny, also form important parts of the instruction of the cadets; but as these subjects have been specially referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, it has not been judged proper to introduce them into the present report, any further than to state that the examination of ballistics exhibited one of the most direct and interesting applications of mathematics to the military art, and that it was conducted in a manner equally creditable to the professor and his pupils.

A part of the first two years is devoted to the study of the French language, with which the cadets are required to become at least so far acquainted as to understand its grammar, to be able to pronounce it intelligibly, and to translate it readily into English. They are also exercised in writing French themes. It is also to be regretted that very few of them make such progress as to be able to speak the language. The examinations in this department were as satisfactory as could be reasonably expected from the time allotted to the study.

In this academy great attention is very properly paid to the art of drawing, the practical applications of which are so frequent and important in the military profession. The proofs of proficiency in figure, landscape, and topographical drawing, were very satisfactory. During part of the present academical year, this department was under the superintendence of a distinguished artist, whose resignation and removal from the country are subjects of general regret.

The instruction in grammar, rhetoric, moral philosophy, and political science, is confined to the senior year, which is loaded with professional studies. But five hours in two weeks are allotted to the recitations. The professor, therefore, justly complains of the want of time for conveying adequate instruction in his department. It appears to your committee that this evil might be remedied, first, by extending the requisites of admission to the degree which they have recommended; and, secondly, by teaching rhetoric to the third class instead of the first. This study ought not to be postponed until incorrect habits of speaking and writing may be confirmed; and, besides, your committee are informed that time can be at present better spared in the second than in any other year of the course.

The professor of this department is also the chaplain of the station, and divine worship is conducted by him, once every Sunday, in the presence of the officers and cadets of the academy. Your committee think it desirable that further opportunities of religious instruction should be given, but they would not propose that the attendance upon them should be compulsory. A separation of the chaplaincy and professorship is anxiously desired by the reverend gentleman who now holds these offices. There are certainly some good reasons in favor of this measure, and, if the duties of both these offices should be increased, as proposed by your committee, this separation would probably become necessary.

Your committee, in compliance with their instructions, have inspected the cabinets of natural philosophy, chemistry, and mineralogy, and have found them generally in good condition, and containing many very valuable articles. The constant advances which the natural sciences are making require, indeed, that additions should be made to these cabinets from year to year, and appropriations will be wanted for this purpose; but the present collections are so extensive that no considerable expense need be incurred. Your committee have regretted to learn, however, that a large part of the mineralogical cabinet is not the property of the Government, and they have to express their hope that the purchase of the entire collection will no longer be deferred.

Your committee have also inspected the library. It consists of more than eight thousand volumes of works, for the most part immediately relating to the subjects taught at the academy, the whole appearing to be judiciously selected, well preserved, and kept under good regulations. To keep pace with the progress of science and to supply deficiencies already existing, it will be necessary, however, that additions be constantly made to it; and it is hoped that a liberal appropriation will be annually made for this purpose.

Among the books at present in the library, is a very curious and interesting series of about one hundred volumes of old works on mathematics, natural philosophy, and astronomy, containing, among others, the works of Galileo, Kepler, and Leibnitz, and the original editions of Lord Napier's logarithms. It was with regret that your committee learned that a requisition had been made for these works, to be employed in the survey of the coast now going forward, and that they were, accordingly, on the point of being removed from the academy. From the contents and dates of the works, your committee presume it will not be pretended that they are necessary in the great geodical operations for which they are asked, and therefore, your committee think that the board ought to protest against their removal from the only library, professedly scientific, that belongs to the nation.

Though the subject of the public buildings has been referred to another committee, the Committee on the Studies hope they will be excused if they call the attention of the board to the rooms appropriated for the philosophical apparatus, the chemical laboratory, the mineralogical cabinet, and the library. These rooms are not only inadequate to their several purposes, but they are unsafe. The furnaces of the chemical laboratory are in a room with a wooden floor, immediately below the philosophical apparatus and the library, and no part of the whole building is fireproof. Besides, the laboratory and the philosophical apparatus are placed in the same rooms in which the classes are assembled to lecture, while the accommodation is scarcely sufficient for either of these purposes singly. On the whole, your committee think a new fireproof building, with rooms for a laboratory, the apparatus, a museum, and the library, and with suitable halls for experimental lectures, is exceedingly desirable. Your committee also think that an astronomical observatory ought to be established at this place. Its importance as a school of practice for cadets who may hereafter be called upon, as engineers, to conduct topographical and geodical operations, cannot but be felt; an excellent position for it is presented on the land, where the instruments could be seated on the solid rock; the building could be constructed at a very moderate cost, and all the instruments necessary to furnish it are already in the possession of the Government.

Respectfully submitted to the board by the committee.

R. M. PATTERSON, Chairman.

June 14, 1834.

Report of the Military Committee.

The Committee on Military Affairs and Discipline have the honor to report that they have particularly inquired into all the subjects intrusted to their examination, and that the result has been exceedingly satisfactory to them, and creditable to the institution.

The committee directed, first, their inquiries to the class on engineering, and, in common with the other members of the board, they were highly delighted with the proficiency of the cadets. They were surprised to learn that the course of military engineering lasted only four months, and they must particularly commend the industry of both professors and students, which enabled the latter to acquire so much knowledge in so short a time. They found, likewise, a great want of models of the details of the works. These could be easily procured, and would facilitate a great deal the study of this science, which the committee cannot but consider the most important branch of the education which the cadets are intended to receive at West Point.

The examination on civil engineering was likewise highly satisfactory, and shows the particular care paid to it in the institution. The use to which Government, in time of peace, employs the officers of the army, renders these studies particularly important, and the country at large will be pleased to learn the attention paid to them. In this department, likewise, models are wanted, and could be procured with very little trouble, and at trifling expense.

The examination on artillery showed in the cadets a thorough knowledge of the theory of this science; and their exercises in field manoeuvres, target-firing, fireworks, and the explosion of a mine, left no doubt as to their attainments in the practice. The target-firing took place under very unfavorable circumstances, owing to the bad quality of the ordnance. The text-books in this department are principally translations, or compositions of the best foreign works, executed by the instructor himself, and highly creditable to his zeal and to his industry. The laboratory was examined, and the cadets seen to go through the preparation and manufacture of every sort of fireworks employed in war. The rockets were peculiarly remarkable for their brilliancy, and the space they went over, as compared with their size.

The ordnance was found by your committee very defective. The pieces are generally worn out, and some of them have been condemned as worthless. The shot received is very bad, and, being in general too small for the pieces, and of irregular figures, prevents any accuracy at target firing. The committee, however, have learned that a requisition has been made upon the Ordnance department, and that a compliance with it is looked for during the course of the present season. The committee have observed that all the carriages were of the oldest models, and they are of opinion that no pains ought to be spared to provide this institution with the newest and most approved inventions and models, in order not to teach the cadets to use and employ arms and machines which they will have nothing to do with when they enter on actual service.

The committee heard the examination upon infantry tactics, and saw the cadets exercising with great skill and precision. The manoeuvres of light infantry have been successfully introduced, and, although practised but a short time, were very well executed. The arms were examined, as well as the accoutrements, and were found in the most complete order. The committee found fault only with the shape of the button used in the cadet's uniform. They are too large, and most inconvenient. When the belt, owing to the size of the cadets, comes to pass over one of them, either a most unseemly protrusion is created, or a hole made through the belt, which entirely destroys the uniformity. It is considered that bullet-buttons could be advantageously replaced by flat, or nearly flat buttons.

The committee next directed their attention to the military duties required from the cadets, and found them not to be oppressive, nor to abstract any more time from their studies than is absolutely necessary in order to preserve discipline, and give them military and soldierlike habits of precision.

The discipline was examined in its various bearings, and seemed excellent. By many inquiries it was ascertained that whilst power on the one hand was exercised in the most paternal manner, and always for the good of the service, on the other hand the officers and professors were generally found to be beloved and respected; a happy state of things, which the committee cannot commend too much. Some of the regulations contained in the pamphlet which was distributed amongst the board seemed, at first sight, rather severe, but it was found compensated by the mildness of its execution. It is believed, indeed, that fewer offences have taken place under this liberal system than if too much rigor should be exercised.

The committee have been highly pleased with all that they have seen; and, extending their observations to the vast field of improvements, they beg leave to suggest that, since the United States have now added to their army a regiment of cavalry, the cadets ought likewise to be instructed in cavalry tactics. Thirty or forty horses would be sufficient, and could be used at the same time to teach the cadets the service of light artillery. The importance of these two branches of military knowledge is too obvious to require the committee to say any more on the subject.

Another suggestion the committee wish to make is, as to the necessity of a large hall, where military exercises may be, to some extent, conducted in winter. It is thought that this would be, in a high degree, conducive to the health and comfort of the cadets.

Before taking leave of this subject, the committee will indulge in a few observations upon the general results of the institution. However dangerous standing armies are to a nation's liberty in time of peace, they nevertheless possess immense advantages in time of war. The only way to reconcile the dangers and advantages of a standing army is, to organize it in such a way that it may prove, as it were, elastic, so as to be able, in the shortest time, to assume, from the smallest possible size, the largest. In order to obtain this desideratum, a military academy is absolutely necessary, where the higher branches of the military science should be taught. Officers of infantry and cavalry can easily be recruited from the rank and file of the army; but the engineers, the staff, and the artillery, require men educated for these professions. In time of peace, those cadets who cannot be employed in these corps, are embodied in the infantry and cavalry; but, as soon as war should be declared, their services would be required in the scientific departments of the army, which would partake of the general increase, and their places in the line would be supplied either from the citizens generally, or from the rank and file of the army. From all these observations made by your committee, they are of opinion that the military education received at West Point fulfils entirely the objects of an institution, the necessity of which can scarcely be doubted.

The whole of which is respectfully submitted.

ACHILLE MURAT, Chairman.

The Committee on Fiscal Concerns report:

That, in the discharge of the duties assigned to them, they have examined, with as much minuteness as circumstances would admit, the accounts of the institution, and they take pleasure in saying that the result of their investigations has been highly satisfactory.

The committee directed their attention to three points involved in the resolution under which they were appointed. 1st. To inspect the accounts of the institution, so far as to see that they are kept in a correct and satisfactory manner. 2d. That the expenditures are made in accordance with the appropriations. 3d. That attention is paid to economy in the expenses of every kind.

Heretofore, two separate appropriations under different heads, for the support of the Military Academy, have been made by Congress. The one is embraced under the item "for the pay of the army and subsistence of officers," for which the appropriation is general, and does not discriminate the amount appropriated for the pay and subsistence of the cadets from the pay and subsistence of the residue of the army, but the whole is included in one general item. This fund is disbursed by the paymaster stationed at West Point; who, by "the regulations," is "treasurer of the cadets." The amount of this fund annually expended, including the pay of the professors, has been estimated at $93,566 52 cents, and this may be safely considered a fair estimate of the annual expense of the institution for this branch of expenditure.

The other appropriation for the support of the institution is made for the Military Academy, and is specifically appropriated to the different objects of expenditure connected with the institution. These are, usually, for fuel, forage, stationary, printing, transportation, and postage, for repairs, improvements, and expenses of buildings, &c., for the pay of adjutant and quartermaster's clerks, for increase and expenses of the library, for philosophical apparatus, for models for the department of engineering, for models for the drawing department, repairs of instruments for the mathematical department, apparatus and contingencies for the department of chemistry, miscellaneous items, and incidental expenses of the academy, and for defraying the expense of the Board of Visitors at West Point.

The annual amount appropriated under this head, for four years, terminating with the year 1833, has varied from $23,439 to $36,765 per annum, the latter sum including an appropriation of $16,000 for the erection of a chapel and a building for military exercises, which, being inadequate to these objects, remains unexpended.

Your committee investigated the accounts of the treasurer and of the quartermaster, which are kept in a correct and satisfactory manner, exhibiting in a tabular form the entire expenditure for a given period, arranged under appropriate heads, each item of which is supported by a voucher, without which the accounts would not be passed by the accounting department.

The expenditures are made in strict accordance with the appropriations, and the entire fiscal arrangements of the institution challenge the unqualified approbation of the most rigid scrutiny.

The third branch of investigation referred to your committee is one of unusual importance. It presents the inquiry "whether proper attention is paid to economy in the expenses of every kind" of the institution. It involves the personal expenses of the cadet, and the general expenditures of the academy.

The regulations which prohibit to the cadet the possession or use of money, or the expenditure of it, except with the consent of the superintendent, who is placed in loco parentis, and exercises this important power with enlightened discretion, cannot be too highly commended or too scrupulously adhered to.

The pay and subsistence of the cadet is $16 per month, and two rations, equal to $12, making together $28. To carry into effect the important regulation referred to, each cadet provides a check-book, which is ruled and arranged in tabular form, so as to exhibit in one view the expenditures of each period of two months, at the head of which are placed those charges which are regular, fixed, and always uniform. When the cadet wishes to obtain any article, he must apply to the superintendent, who, if he consents, indicates it by writing in the opposite column, upon which the article is furnished to the cadet, and the charge is entered by the person furnishing it in another column. The entries in this check-book are constantly exhibited to the superintendent, and are the vouchers upon which the treasurer pays to the persons who furnish the cadets the amounts which may be due to them.

It is manifest, that while this mode of keeping the accounts is perfectly simple, and readily understood, it is admirably calculated to secure the cadet from all imposition, and conduces to the strictest economy in his expenses, since he is constantly reminded, by a reference to his check-book, of the extent of his income, and the objects to which prudence requires he should appropriate it; and besides this, it gives to the cadet the habit of keeping accounts of his expenses, so essential to secure a high character in the profession for which he is destined, or in the discharge of the various honorable employments in civil life, for which he is so well fitted by the education he receives at the Military Academy.

This habit of economy, which so much depends upon an habitual attention to accounts, teaches that prudence in affairs without which all other attainments are obscured, or rendered wholly useless, and without which men are but little suited for the simplicity and salutary equality which is not only taught by, but practically results from, our institutions. And your committee have found, on this account, much to admire and commend in the fiscal arrangements to regulate the expenses of the cadets.

There can be no better evidence of the attention to economy in the general expenses of the institution, on the part of the gentlemen charged with the important duty of administering its concerns, than is disclosed by the fact that, independent of the sum of $16,000, already referred to as unexpended, the accounts for the last four years, terminating on the first of January of the current year, show an unexpected balance of $3,764 87½.

It will be perceived that the annual amount expended for the pay of professors, and the pay and subsistence of the cadets, is estimated to average $93,566 52 cents; to which, if we add the amount of the expenditures for academic purposes, (which, taking the mean of the last four years, may be estimated at about $23,500, exclusive of the unexpended appropriation for the erection of a chapel and building for exercise,) equal to $117,166 52 cents, and we have the annual average expenditure of the institution for the last four years. This, too, embraces a large sum which has been expended for the gradual increase of the library, the philosophical apparatus, and mathematical instruments, &c., belonging to the institution, a charge which, as these departments become more perfect, will annually diminish. When it is considered that this national institution assembles from all parts of our extended country the youth of every State in the Union, who here receive instruction from a common alma mater, and that alma mater their country, and that this is calculated to inspire them with feelings of personal and patriotic affection, connecting more closely the bonds of common union; when it is considered that they carry with them these feelings in the army, where they may become the gallant defenders of that very country, to every part of which they owe so much; when it is considered that at this institution two hundred and fifty cadets are annually taught, and acquire an extraordinary proficiency in the useful and exact sciences, now mainly instrumental in the successful prosecution of the great work of internal improvement to which almost every State in the Union is turning its attention, and in which, should the cadets of the Military Academy be employed, they would so richly repay, independent of every other consideration, the amount expended for their education; when all these things are considered, your committee cannot avoid the conclusion, that the amount annually expended for this institution is not only consistent with enlightened economy, but that it is to be regretted that the number of cadets now allowed by law is not greater, so that the benefits of the institution might be more generally extended.

Your committee approve of the policy which prevented the expenditure of the $16,000 appropriated by Congress for the erection of a chapel and a building for military exercises, so much wanted for the institution. This sum they consider insufficient for the purposes for which it was destined; and they are fully of opinion that the most salutary economy which the Government can exercise on this subject is that which, while it requires the utmost exactness in accounts and contracts, and the greatest prudence in the expenditure of money, admits an expenditure fully sufficient to carry into effect the great design of making this institution worthy of the age, and worthy of the country upon which it is calculated, if properly regulated, to confer so many benefits.

By reference to "the regulations," it will be ascertained that each cadet, upon entering the institution, is required to furnish himself with certain articles of furniture and clothing necessary for his comfort and health. The amount which he is thus required to expend upon entering the institution is about $75. Your committee have ascertained that very many cadets do not bring with them, when they come to the institution, money for this purpose. In such case the cadet is forced to contract debts in anticipation of his pay, to an amount which must occasion him much embarrassment and difficulty; and, besides, should he be so unfortunate as not to pass at the January examination, he is without the means of returning to his place of residence.

It is much to be regretted that parents and guardians should not more generally attend to this. Your committee think it right to bring the subject to the view of the board, so that it may, if the board should consider it proper, be made the foundation of a recommendation to the War Department, that each parent or guardian of a cadet, who is previously appointed, should be informed of the importance of sending, for his son or ward, to the superintendent, a sum sufficient to meet the expenditure referred to. Perhaps it would be always best to send this money directly to the superintendent, so as to avoid any impropriety on the part of the cadet.

Among the inquiries which engaged the attention of the committee, were the personal expenses of the cadets, with a view to consider whether some reduction in them could not be effected. The committee were satisfied that the amount now appropriated for the pay and subsistence of the cadet is barely sufficient to maintain him. There is no item of expense incurred by the cadet, in which it appears a reduction could be made, unless it should be in the item of board, which is charged to the cadet at $10 per month. Comparing this with the expense of boarding in other literary and scientific institutions in our country, the committee have been induced to suggest the inquiry whether the charge for board might not be reduced without injustice to any one.

CHARLES B. PENROSE,
Chairman of Committee.

REPORT FROM THE TOPOGRAPHICAL BUREAU.

TOPOGRAPHICAL BUREAU, Oct. 30, 1834.

HON. LEWIS CASS, Secretary of War:

SIR: In obedience to your instructions of the 15th of August last, I have the honor to submit to you a statement, marked A, exhibiting the amount drawn from the Treasury Department, and remitted to the disbursing officers under the bureau, from the 1st of October, 1833, to the 30th of September, 1834, inclusive, and also the amount of accounts rendered.

The topographical and civil engineers have been employed upon, and the funds appropriated for surveys for the year 1834 have been applied to, the following objects:

1. Surveying the east pass into the Appalachicola bay and river, to ascertain the practicability and cost of removing obstructions and improving the harbor.
2. Surveying the Cumberland river, with a view to its improvement.
3. Survey of a canal route from the Cape Fear river, through Waccamaw lake, to Waccamaw river, North Carolina.
4. Survey of the Delaware river, from Newcastle to Port Penn, and a survey of the Pea Patch island.
5. Reconnoissance of a route for a railroad from Memphis, Tennessee, to the Atlantic ocean.
6. Geological and mineralogical surveys and researches in the Territory of Arkansas.
7. Surveying a route for a railroad across the isthmus of Michigan.
8. Survey of the southern shore of Lake Huron, and of the eastern shore of Lake Michigan, in the Territory of Michigan.
9. Survey for ascertaining the propriety of granting the right of way at Harper's Ferry to the Winchester and Harper's Ferry Railroad Company, in pursuance of a joint resolution of Congress at its last session.
10. Reconnoissance for the route of a military road on the frontiers of the State of Maine.
11. The survey of the Susquehanna (with a view to a canal connexion between the Chesapeake and the lakes) was commenced, but suspended on account of the death of the engineer.

12. Survey of a route for a road from the Alabama line, by way of Marianna, to Appalachicola bay.

13. Survey at Newburyport harbor, with a view of ascertaining the damage sustained by a bridge, by the erection of the public works at the mouth of the Merrimack river.

14. The survey of the St. Francis river, commenced last year, and suspended on account of the high stage of water, was not recommenced this season on account of not having at the disposal of the bureau an engineer to assign to that duty.

15. The survey of the route for a road from Tallahassee to Cape Florida, under the act approved 30th June, 1834, was not commenced on account of the inadequacy of the appropriation to carry the object of the act into effect.

16. A survey of a route for a road from Chicago, on Lake Michigan, to Fort Howard, on Green bay.

17. A survey of Provincetown harbor, with the view to the erection of fortifications.

18. In completing the report and drawings of a survey of a canal from Connecticut river to Lake Winnepesaukee, New Hampshire, by the way of the Oliverian and Baker's rivers.

19. In completing the drawings of a canal route to unite the waters of Lake Champlain with those of the Connecticut river.

20. In completing the drawings of a survey of Georgetown harbor, South Carolina, for military defences.

21. In completing the drawings of the reconnoissance of the sounds of North Carolina, for military defences.

22. In making a report and estimate for the construction of a canal from Akron, in Ohio, to Beaver, in Pennsylvania.

23. Examination of the Brandywine shoal, Delaware bay, for the erection of a light-house.

24. In superintending the construction of the Potomac bridge.

25. In superintending the construction of the aqueduct across the Potomac river.

26. In paying the salaries of the civil engineers and agents employed on several of the foregoing items of duties.

Since the submission of the last annual report, the following surveys for military and civil purposes have been completed, and several of the reports in relation to the same have been submitted to Congress.

1. Report of a survey between the waters of St. Andrew's bay and the river and bay of Chattahoochee, and between Pensacola bay and Bon Secour, along the northern coast of the Gulf of Mexico, with a view to ascertain the practicability and cost of canals to connect said bays and rivers, under the act of Congress of July 4, 1832.

2. A survey of the route for a road in the Territory of Arkansas, from a point opposite to Memphis to the house of William Strong, or some other point on the St. Francis river, under the act of March 2, 1833.

3. A survey of Portland harbor, Maine, with a view to the erection of a breakwater.

4. A survey of Throg's point, New York, with a view to the erection of fortifications for the defence of the city of New York.

5. A survey of Burlington bay, Vermont, and Port Kent and Plattsburg harbors, New York, with a view to their improvement.

6. A survey of Vermilion river, with a view to its improvement.

7. A survey between the Pearl and Yazoo rivers, Mississippi, with a view to their connexion by a railroad or canal; also, a survey of the "Yazoo pass," in the same State.

8. A survey of the mouth of Chagrin river, Ohio, with a view to its improvement.

9. A survey of the Potomac river, from Georgetown to Alexandria, District of Columbia, with a view to its improvement.

10. The report and maps of the Taunton and Weymouth canal, Massachusetts.

11. The drawings of a survey, in order to ascertain the military defences of St. Mary's river, Maryland.

12. The surveys, reports, and estimates of a route for a railroad from Mad river to Lake Erie, in the State of Ohio.

13. The reports and drawings of a survey for a route for a railroad from Williamsport, Pennsylvania, to Elmira, New York.

14. A survey of the Monongahela river, with a view to its improvement.

The duty of carrying into effect the provisions of the appropriation which refer to geological and mineralogical investigations, has been consigned to G. W. Featherstonhaugh, Esq., who is now engaged upon it.

His report has not yet been received, but his known talents and industry, as well as the various letters which have been received from him, afford the most solid grounds for anticipating that it will be executed in a manner highly creditable to himself, and to the Government with which it originated.

It is not merely those questions of abstract science which are involved in his observations; it is not merely the additional light which will be thrown by his researches upon various subjects which now agitate and occupy the learned of all the world, which are to give interest to this duty, and which will place its patrons in the attitude of the enlightened and liberal friends of scientific truths; but it is the development of immense and hitherto unknown sources of wealth, and of active inland trade; the exposing of the various deposits of coal, iron, lead, and of the precious metals, and the encouragement these will furnish to industry, and the profitable employment of capital.

The application of steam to the propelling of boats has thrown as it were the Western world upon the borders of the ocean, and has given to the immense agricultural resources of that vast region a degree of activity and of value which, if any one had predicted twenty years since, he would have been classed among the wildest of visionaries. Now, if to these resources we add those of its mineral treasures, which the researches now being made will develop, may we not reasonably expect a proportionate increase in the extent and value of the results?

The joint resolution of Congress, authorizing the President to cede to the Winchester and Harper's Ferry Railroad Company a right of way over the public grounds at Harper's Ferry, being committed to this bureau in order to ascertain the facts involved in the exercise of the grant of power, Colonel Kearney and Captain Turnbull were ordered to survey and report in the case. The result of their investigation will be found appended to this report.

The facts exhibited rather indicate the necessity of additional legislation before the grant is consummated.

Having gone through with the exposition of the duties under the direction of this bureau, it becomes my duty, from an imperative sense of its necessity, again to call your attention to the reorganization and enlargement of the corps of topographical engineers. The defects of the present system not only expose this branch of service to serious errors, and to the most inefficient execution of the duties consigned to it, but violate true principles of economy, by producing a minimum of results at a maximum of expense.

I should feel justly obnoxious to reproof if I had not so frequently brought this subject to your consideration, as well in its general aspect as in its most minute details; and should also doubt the correctness of my views, from the failure of success which has so long attended them, if they had not so frequently met with your approbation, and the support of your recommendation, as well as the favorable consideration of the Executive.

The corps now consists of six field officers and four captains. The modifications proposed would retain the same number of field officers; altering and increasing the rank of two would add six to the number of captains, and that proportion of first and second lieutenants which would harmonize with other organizations and meet the demands for topographical service.

These additions to the corps to be made by transfers and appointments from the army. The scientific and military knowledge absolutely necessary to such a corps, is (with rare exceptions) alone to be found among the graduates from the Military Academy. These now pervade every branch of the army; numbers of them have already acquired much practical knowledge by employment on these duties, thereby furnishing the means of completing the organization proposed, with the best materials and without delay. And if so organized, it would be the fault of him who might command it, if it were not in time to prove itself one of the most efficient, and one of the most useful arms of the service.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN J. ABERT,
Lieut. Col. Tbp. Eng'rs.

REPORT OF THE PAYMASTER GENERAL.

PAYMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington City, Nov. 27, 1834.

SIR: Enclosed, herewith, I have the honor to present a report of the transactions of the Pay department for the fiscal year ending the 30th September, 1834.

The unexpended funds in the hands of paymasters on the 1st day of October, 1833, and the sums advanced to them from the Treasury between that time and the last day of September, 1834, amount to one million six hundred and six thousand five hundred and sixty-two dollars and fifty-seven cents, all of which have been accounted for except fifty thousand nine hundred and twelve dollars and seven cents. I am daily expecting to receive vouchers for the disbursement of upwards of thirty thousand dollars of this balance; the remainder is charged to late Paymaster Phillips, who informs me that it will be paid over to the Treasurer as soon as his accounts are settled, and he has received the credits he is entitled to. This I do not doubt, and am also confident that the Government will not lose one cent by the transactions of the department for the last year.

As soon as the appropriations for the army were made, Paymaster Stewart was despatched to Fort Gibson with sufficient funds for all the troops at that station, including the dragoons, with the hope that he would arrive before the latter left the post on their late tour of duty: this was impracticable, and the paymaster had to await the return of the regiment to the post. Unfortunately, the muster-rolls of some of the companies were sent to Fort Leavenworth; in consequence of which, he could only pay the officers of the regiment, and the companies that remained at Fort Gibson. Apprehending that he might not fall in with the other companies, Paymaster Wright was instructed to use every exertion to have them paid immediately after their arrival in his district. He received funds for that purpose on the 10th of October, and intended leaving St. Louis to make the payment without delay. Unfortunately for the department, this valuable officer died on the 9th instant. I have no information that the duty was performed before his death; but, from the circumstance of his not reporting to me any impediment in the way, and from his character for energy and zeal, I am of opinion that it was. I have official information of the payment of all the other troops to as late dates as is practicable with the present number of paymasters.

I beg leave respectfully to call your attention to the following extract from my report of last year, on the state of the department:

"When the military establishment was reduced, in 1821, fourteen paymasters were retained for the army, and one for the engineer corps and West Point. Since then, the number of troops has increased seven hundred, the number of posts is near one-third more, and the annual disbursements half a million of dollars greater than they were, while the number of paymasters remains the same; and, in addition to the increased duty in paying the army, they are now required to pay all the militia called into service.

"It is not in the power of the department, with the present number of paymasters, to indulge them with furloughs, and great inconvenience is felt if one is prevented by sickness, or any other cause, from performing his duty.

"Under such circumstances, I earnestly solicit you, sir, to recommend to Congress to provide by law for the appointment of three additional paymasters; also, to amend the law requiring paymasters to select clerks from the rank and file of the army, (where suitable qualifications cannot always be found,) and to authorize the appointment of citizens, with salaries not to exceed five hundred dollars per annum."

The situation of the department, at this time, forcibly illustrates the necessity of increasing the number of its officers, if it is expected the troops will be paid as often as the law contemplates. Owing to the death of two paymasters, and to other circumstances over which the department has no control, there are now four districts without a paymaster. It is impossible for the other officers to pay them without omitting a regular payment to the troops in their own districts. In other branches of the staff, when vacancies occur, or when the duties of the officers are suspended, the commanders of the districts or posts can appoint officers to perform the duties, until the heads of the departments are informed, who can then make permanent appointments from the line, without delay. In this department, paymasters must be first appointed by the highest authority, and then furnish bonds, to be approved by the Secretary of War, before they can be assigned to duty. Great delay must necessarily take place, and, in the mean time, no relief can be afforded the vacant districts with the present number of paymasters.

Many other arguments occur to me; I will only trouble you with the following: The regiment of dragoons (recently added to the army) will, from the nature of the duty it has to perform, be subject to frequent change of position, and, unless a paymaster can be specially assigned to it, it will be necessary to keep all officers of the department, who are liable to be called upon, always supplied with sufficient funds to pay the regiment, in addition to their districts. The advances to these must, therefore, be greater than heretofore—much more so than is desirable to the paymaster or the Government.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. TOWSON, Paymaster General.

To the Hon. LEWIS CASS, Secretary of War.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSARY GENERAL OF SUBSISTENCE.

OFFICE OF COM. GENERAL OF SUBSISTENCE,
Washington, Nov. 15, 1834.

SIR: In compliance with instructions from the Department of War, of 15th August ult., I have the honor to submit a statement of the moneys remitted and charged to contractors and to the disbursing officers of the Commissariat, in the 1st, 2d, and 3d quarters of the year; together with the balances in possession of the latter, on the 31st of December, 1833, amounting to $359,013 74 To which is to be added the amounts due them on the settlement of their accounts	1,768 16

Aggregating	360,771 90
The amount accounted for during the same period is	313,153 35
Leaving a balance of	47,618 55
From which is to be deducted this sum, charged to contractors as the difference in price of provisions purchased to supply deficiencies	$85 44
Amount expended at Indian treaty grounds, not brought to the credit of the officer, on account of subsistence	2,300 86
Amount expended in the Quartermaster's department, not credited to the officer, on account of subsistence	1,000 00
Amount due by Lieut. A. C. Fowler, at his decease, and for which his sureties are liable	465 06
	3,851 36
Leaving	43,767 19

actually in the hands of the assistant and acting assistant commissaries, applicable to the expenditures of the fourth quarter of the year.

Of one hundred and thirty-six officers who have disbursed the public moneys on account of subsistence, for the period embraced in this statement, the accounts of three only were not received at its completion; one of whom has rendered his account since; one has been absent some time from his station, engaged in paying annuities to the Miami, Eel River, and Pottawatomie Indians; and the third has been so seriously indisposed, since his return to Fort Gibson with the dragoons, that the rendition of his accounts was totally impracticable. It is believed that the reception of these accounts would have reduced the balances about ten thousand dollars; but there is not the smallest doubt that they will reach the office in the course of this month, and that every cent in the hands of the disbursing officers of the department on the 30th September last will be fully and promptly accounted for in the fourth quarter of the year.

Very respectfully,

Your most obedient servant,

GEO. GIBSON, C. G. S.

Hon. LEWIS CASS,
Secretary of War.

REPORT FROM THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

ORDNANCE OFFICE,
Washington, November 18, 1834.

The Hon. LEWIS CASS, Secretary of War.

SIR: In obedience to your order of the 15th August last, I have the honor to transmit a report of the general result of the proceedings and operations of this department between the 1st October, 1833, and the 30th September, 1834.

The papers marked A and B present a general view of these concerns during the last-mentioned period, as well in regard to the amounts of the expenditures under the several heads of appropriations, as in reference to their objects, and to the various ordnance stations where they have been made.

The first of these, A, shows the whole amount of funds remitted from the Treasury to disbursing officers and contractors in this department, during the year 1833, to have been - $1,028,606 09

That the portion of that sum which was expended and accounted for during the same period amounted to - 963,222 79

And that, at the close of that year, there remained unexpended, and in the hands of disbursing officers, the sum of - $65,383 30

A balance which, it may be proper to remark, was promptly liquidated by the responsible disbursing officers early in the first quarter of 1834.

Statement B exhibits the total amount of funds remaining in the hands of disbursing officers at the close of the year 1833, and which have been remitted to them and to contractors during the first, second, and third quarters of the year 1834. This amount will be seen to have been - $834,825 79

And the portion of this sum expended, and for which accounts have been rendered, during the same period, will be seen, in the same statement, to have amounted to - 766,701 36

The unexpended balance exhibited in the same statement as being in the hands of disbursing officers at the close of the third quarter of 1834, having been - $67,824 43

Statement C presents a view of the general result of the operations at the several arsenals and armories of the United States, in the manufacture, repair, and purchase of the principal articles of ordnance, ordnance stores, and building materials. It exhibits the result of these operations to the extent to which they have been completed, during the year between the 1st October, 1833, and the 30th September, 1834, indicating, among other articles of ordnance and ordnance stores, which have been fabricated or procured, the following, viz:

Of artillery, 213 32-pounder cannon, 3 12-pounder and 3 6-pounder cannon, 3 24-pounder and 3 12-pounder howitzers, 10 32-pounder and 6 24-pounder casemate carriages, 6 10-inch mortar beds, and 44 field artillery carriages.

Of small-arms manufactured and procured, viz: 26,126 muskets and 2,120 (Hall's) rifles, made at the national armories. And at the private factories, 1,030 carbines (Hall's,) 300 rifles, (Hall's,) 11,140 muskets, and 2,900 artillery swords.

Of accoutrements for small-arms, about 1,440 sets for infantry, 1,050 sets for riflemen, and 1,320 sets for cavalry.

Statement D shows the extent of the operations during the year, between the 1st October, 1833, and the 30th September, 1834, which have occurred in procuring ordnance and ordnance stores, under the act of 1808, for arming and equipping the militia of the States and Territories. This statement presents also a view of the expenditures under the act, which have resulted during the same period in procuring the stores, amounting, for all objects, to $190,539 36.

It exhibits, among other articles of ordnance stores procured, 26 field carriages, with their equipments, complete; 11,140 muskets, 300 (Hall's) rifles, 2,900 artillery swords, 1,200 sets of infantry accoutrements, 800 sets of rifle accoutrements, 1,950 sabre and sword belts, and 1,141 (pair) holsters.

Statement E exhibits the amount of ordnance and ordnance stores, valued in muskets, which have been apportioned for the year 1833, to the several States and Territories, under the act of 1808, for arming and equipping the militia—this apportionment being founded on the recent returns of the strength of the militia, as made by the adjutant general of the militia of the several States to the adjutant general of the army.

Statement F shows the several articles of ordnance and ordnance stores which have been distributed to the militia of the States and Territories during the year, between the 1st October, 1833, and the 30th September, 1834.

Statement G presents a view of the munitions of war issued by this department during the year, between the 1st October, 1833, and the 30th September, 1834, to the army. In this it will appear that 4 24-pounder cannon and carriages; 5 10-inch mortars with their beds, 17 field cannon with their carriages, complete, 750 pistols, 750 carbines, complete, 750 sets of accoutrements for the dragoons, 750 sabres, 695 swords, and 204 sets of infantry accoutrements, are among the principal articles issued.

Statement H exhibits the operations of the lead mines for the year ending the 30th September, 1834; and statement I, the amount of lead made at these mines, in each year, from the year 1821 to the 30th September, 1834.

By these statements it will appear that the lead made during the present year amounts to - 7,971,579 lbs.

Excess over the last year - 29,787 "

Total amount of lead made from 1821 to 30th September, 1834 - 71,817,319 "

Total amount of rent lead accruing for the above period - 5,699,631 "

Amount of rent lead due the United States 30th September, 1834, yet to be collected - 328,802 "

The mining operations have been successfully continued on the west bank of the Mississippi, in the country ceded to the United States by the Sac and Fox Indians; and should not the recent sales of lands in the mineral regions, and the locations made for the Indians there, materially interfere with the interests and operations of the mining establishments, the product of these mines may reasonably be expected to be greatly increased hereafter.

I take pleasure in being able to state that the most satisfactory results have been attained this year in the manufacturing operations at the national armories, and at the various arsenals of construction and repairs throughout the country.

The due execution of a just system of accountability for the immense material of war in the arsenals and magazines of the Union, and in the hands of the army, and the continual application of the most improved means of preservation to this material, have enabled the concerns of this department to attain an unusual degree of perfection. It is confidently expected that they will be still more benefited by the salutary operations of the new ordnance regulations adopted by the President on the 1st of May, 1834, but which could not be published to the army until the 19th September last.

As regards the building operations, progressing in this department, at the St. Louis, Mount Vernon, Appalachicola, and Detroit arsenals, and at the New York depot, I have the honor to state that they have proceeded to the extent of the last annual appropriations for those objects, and have been conducted in the most efficient and satisfactory manner by the several superintending officers.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEO. BOMFORD, Colonel of Ordnance.

REPORT FROM THE SURGEON GENERAL.

SURGEON GENERAL'S OFFICE, Nov. 20, 1834.

SIR: In compliance with the instructions of the Department of the 15th of August, I have to report that there has been transmitted to the acting apothecary at New York, during the three first quarters of the current year, $9,600, and that the amount for which accounts have been rendered for settlement by him, during that period, is $8,918 26. The whole amount of accounts rendered for settlement during this period was $25,369 56; of which $10,564 67 were for the payment of private physicians, and $14,804 89 for medical supplies.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOS. LOVELL, *Surgeon General.*Hon. LEWIS CASE, Secretary of War.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSARY GENERAL OF PURCHASES.

COMMISSARY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Philadelphia, Oct. 23, 1834.

SIR: In obedience to instructions communicated in a letter dated on the 18th of October, from the acting Secretary of War, I have prepared, and have now the honor of enclosing, my moneyed estimate for 1835, marked A and B, as follows, viz:

A. For clothing, camp equipage, &c. for one year, ending 31st October, 1836 - $162,387 85
B. For the expenses of the Commissary General's office during the year 1835 7,050 00

Total - $169,437 85

I likewise enclose six statements, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, prepared by order of the War Department, viz: No. 1. Of moneys drawn from the appropriation for the Purchasing department during the three first quarters of the year 1834.

No. 2. Of moneys received and disbursed during the three first quarters of the year 1834, on account of the Purchasing department.

No. 3. Of moneys received and disbursed during the three first quarters of the year 1834, on account of the "Regiment United States dragoons."

No. 4. Of moneys received and disbursed during the three first quarters of the year 1834, on account of "Contingencies, War Department."

No. 5. Comparative statement of the cost of clothing, &c., for the army of the United States, during the years 1833, 1834, and 1835; and,

No. 6. Statement of the cost of clothing, &c., for the army of the United States, during the year 1835.

I have deducted $50,000 from the gross amount of the moneyed estimate A, for clothing, &c., that may remain on hand after the issues for this year have been completed; which is as much as can be deducted with any degree of safety. I presume these statements will be entirely satisfactory.

The balance of the appropriation for the year 1834, remaining undrawn, $33,442 40, will be required to enable me to settle all accounts to the end of the year 1834, and to enable me to make up clothing during the winter of 1834-'35, to be ready for early issue. I have, therefore, to request that this money may be reserved for the operations of the Commissary General's department, as my calculations in forming the moneyed estimate are founded on that expectation.

I have the honor to be, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

C. IRVINE,

*Commissary General of Purchases.*Hon. LEWIS CASE, Secretary of War.

Vol. XI.—F

REPORT FROM THE CLOTHING BUREAU.

CLOTHING BUREAU,
Washington, Nov. 28, 1834.

SIR: I have the honor to report that the clothing and equipage for the army have been procured at prices averaging two and one-half per cent. less than the last year, and have been forwarded to the several military posts in good season.

The clothing furnished for the army, for this and the past year, is of superior quality to any which has been supplied within the last twenty years; and, as far as information has reached this bureau, gives general satisfaction.

The Commissary General of Purchases has invited proposals for the supply of clothing and equipage for the ensuing year at a much earlier date than usual, and has allowed greater time for the fulfilment of contracts, thus opening a wider field for competition, which will undoubtedly have the effect still further to reduce the cost of supplier.

The issue of the old pattern clothing, in obedience to an order from the War Department, dated 23d July, 1834, has had the effect to leave in the hands of company officers a partial supply of the new uniform, and in the possession of the Commissary General of Purchases a large supply of clothing materials, applicable to the issues of the ensuing year. Previously to the date of the order referred to, a portion of the old pattern clothing had been sold, and the amount, $3,378 64, placed to the credit of the surplus fund.

Most respectfully, sir,

Your obedient servant,

JOHN GARLAND,
*Major U. S. Army.*Hon. LEWIS CASE,
Secretary of War.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
Office Indian Affairs, Nov. 25, 1834.

SIR: I have the honor to submit a condensed view of the Indian concerns of the department under the immediate superintendence of this office, embracing the entire period since my annual report.

The estimate of the current expenses for the Indian department for the coming year was duly furnished, in conformity with your order of the 20th August last. Paper A, herewith transmitted, is duplicate of the same, showing the amount of these expenses, as therein stated, to be $69,300. The sum demanded for this service is $82,500 less than that of the preceding year, the reduction being effected mainly by the provisions of the recent act of Congress reorganizing the Department of Indian Affairs.

In accordance with the comprehensive spirit of that order, I have presented such other statements appertaining to our Indian concerns as serve to constitute a financial expose not only, but also to display the subjects of expenditure under appropriations of which they are the basis.

Paper B shows the sums drawn from the Treasury, and remitted for disbursement under the several heads of appropriation in the Indian department, included in the three first quarters of the year 1834, as also the amount embraced in the accounts rendered for the same period under the respective heads of account, and likewise the balances remaining unaccounted for at the present time, according to the books of this office. The total of remittance for disbursement, it will be seen, is $806,479 53 cents; the amount of accounts rendered is $397,215 80; and the sum of $409,273 73 still remains to be accounted for. This amount lies in the hands of the officers charged with the payment of Indian annuities, and other pecuniary trusts of a specific character. With the greatest exertions on the part of these agents to comply with the regulation of the department in rendering their accounts, their reception may be retarded beyond the prescribed time, without attaching to them any blame. The delay may arise from mischance in transmission, remoteness of residence, incompleteness of disbursement, and various other causes. It will be recollected, also, that the appropriations which constituted the disbursing fund were made at an unusually late period of the last session of Congress. In some instances, also, a portion of the duties heretofore performed by the Indian agents has devolved, under the provisions of the act of the last session, upon military officers residing at posts in the vicinity of Indian tribes. The diversion from the accustomed track of duty may reasonably be supposed to be productive of delay at the outset, and may furnish additional excuse for backwardness in rendering their accounts.

Herewith is transmitted a copy of the regulations adopted by the department, and approved by the President, designating the limits of the different Indian agencies and subagencies, and the places of residence for the respective agents and subagents, agreeably to the provisions of the act of 30th June last; and also a copy of the regulations concerning the payment of Indian annuities. Under the arrangement established by these regulations, the number of Indian agents has been considerably reduced, and the amount of expense required for supporting the Indian department has been consequently much diminished. The great objects intended to be accomplished by the recent acts of Congress—practical economy in sustaining our relations with the Indian tribes, and their progress in improvement—have been kept steadily in view. An injurious practice had long prevailed among the Indians of resorting to the agencies on trifling pretexts, for the purpose of being furnished with provisions while remaining there, and of receiving presents at their departure: consequently, the accounts of agents, in many instances, contained very considerable charges for extra provisions furnished to Indians visiting their respective agencies. In conformity with the spirit of the late acts, the different agents have been instructed to discountenance that usage, and to issue provisions to those Indians only who should visit the agencies on business. The instruction, coupled with a reduction of presents, under a provision of the late act, it is believed, will produce a salutary effect, by checking their indolent and improvident habits, and stimulating their active exertions to provide for their own wants.

Paper C is a compendium of the condition of the Indian schools which receive aid from the annual appropriation of $10,000 for the civilization of the Indians. In addition to this, such information as has been received from societies and institutions having the object of Indian tuition and improvement for their care, is also furnished. Statements, also, of other measures in contemplation, and of the manner of disposing of the education funds under treaties with several of the Indian tribes, will be found in their proper order. The number of Indian children receiving instruction at the different schools embraced in this report, is eighteen hundred. Exclusively of these, there are one hundred and fifty-six Indian scholars at the Choctaw academy in Kentucky, the expense of whose education is defrayed from funds appropriated by the Indians themselves, under treaty provisions with different tribes for this particular object. The flourishing condition of this academy furnishes the best evidence of the sound views and philanthropic motives of those with whom it originated, and leaves the question of Indian improvement in letters and morals upon the social basis no longer doubtful. The intellectual power is there, and needs cultivation alone for its development and expansion. The last quarterly report of the inspectors of the academy goes to confirm the opinion heretofore advanced, of the advantages of mechanical instruction, combined with the usual course of tuition. It is the incipient step for the general introduction of trades among the Indians, their young boys availing themselves of it with avidity, and displaying an aptness indicative of eventual proficiency and the attainment of excellence. In a refined state of civilisation the mechanic arts sink in appreciation in comparison with letters, and the artisan is less prized than the scholar. But in the ruder stages of society, and in reference to the actual wants and comforts of life, in all its stages, the useful will, in general estimation, take precedence of the ornamental. When Europe emerged from barbarism, those who caught the first glimpse of mechanical power shared in the honors bestowed on heroes and lawgivers, and it is well known that the simplest artificer among the untutored aborigines of this country is looked up to with admiration, and cherished with the regard felt for their warriors and chiefs. If the chase is to be abandoned, and war cease to be a favorite pursuit among them, it can only be effected by the substitution of other employments; and none so salutary, or so vital to the object, as the prompt introduction of such mechanical arts as are suited to the necessities of their condition, and adapted to the early stages of civilized life.

The interposition of the Government of the United States in behalf the Indian race is now matter of history. That race seemed to be fast sinking in the overwhelming wave of white population: both physically and morally it was unable to withstand the competition. It became degraded and wretched, and was rapidly vanishing from the face of the earth. The policy instituted for their protection and perpetuation was not only humane, but was also essential to the object, if by any means it might be attained. As such, it has carried the national sympathy along with it, and is now, as it were, incorporated with our national feelings. It is perhaps the only mode of paying an incalculable debt, indefinable in its nature, but obligatory in its sanctions—the debt of circumstance, though not of contract. Was it to be cancelled only by the extinction of the race? Other and more magnanimous sentiments prevailed, and became the origin of the humane policy which it is confidently believed will ultimately lead them to all the blessings of civilized life. It is in Divine Wisdom alone to dispose of events, while we are the mere instruments of its agency. To that we must bow with reverence, and submit with humility, supported by conscious rectitude of purpose, and indulging well-founded hopes of our designs being ultimately crowned with success.

In carrying out the general principles of this policy, measures have been adopted for the execution of the several treaties with the Cherokees, Creeks, Seminoles, Appalachicolas, Quapaws, the united bands of Otoes and Missourias of the river Platte, and the four confederated bands of the Pawnees of the Platte and the Loup Fork, all of which were ratified at the last session of Congress. Preparatory steps have also been taken for the removal of the Creeks and Seminoles, and it is expected that a considerable portion of those tribes will be removed beyond the Mississippi during the ensuing season, and find a happier home in the domains set apart for their residence, under the guaranty of the United States.

In pursuance of instructions from the Department, General William Marshall, Indian agent for the Miamies, opened a negotiation recently with the chiefs of that tribe for the purchase of their land in the State of Indiana. He has succeeded in procuring from them a cession of two hundred thousand acres on terms advantageous to themselves and the United States. It may be considered the precursor to a total cession of their remaining land in that State, and their consequent emigration to the Western Territory; a result desirable in many respects, especially connected with advantages to a portion of our citizens, and doubly gratifying from its being compatible with the best interests of the tribe.

The alteration proposed by a resolution of the Senate at the last session of Congress, in the boundaries of the land granted by the Chicago treaty of 1833, to the united nation of Chippewa, Ottawa, and Pottawatamie Indians, has received their assent under certain modifications, specified in their agreement of the first of October last.

No material alteration has taken place since the last report from this office in the condition of the Cherokees. The question of emigration finds them still divided, and a considerable portion appear to be insensible of the manifest benefits accruing from its adoption. Without tolerable unanimity, it is impossible to proceed with it advantageously to all parties interested in the general issue. In the mean time the division has engendered much malignancy, and the opposing parties appear to evince a rancor bordering on hostility. Occasionally their animosity has broken out into acts of violence; and it becomes my painful duty to communicate one instance that resulted in the death of a very meritorious and much regretted individual. On his return from their National Council at Red Clay, in August last, where the question of emigration was agitated in a tumultuous and excited meeting, John Walker, jr., one of their leading men friendly to its adoption, was way-laid and shot. The necessary orders for the arrest of the assassins were promptly issued by Governor Carroll, the present Executive of Tennessee. Several persons are now in confinement on a charge of having taken part in the murder. Should occasion call for it, the military will be ordered out for the protection of those who decide on emigration, and of the emigrating officers of Government engaged in this hazardous and responsible service.

A negotiation has been commenced by Governor Lucas of Ohio, with the band of Wyandots in that State, for a cession of their remaining land, and their removal to the west of the Mississippi, and recent communications furnish strong grounds of belief, that, under his judicious management, it will be eventually brought to a successful close.

Paper D, herewith transmitted, contains extracts of a letter from Lieutenant J. Van Horne, disbursing agent in the removal of the Creeks and Cherokees, to General George Gibson, Commissary General of Subsistence. It cannot be perused without emotions of pleasure, inasmuch as it furnishes evidence of the prosperous condition of those tribes, and presents a pleasing account of the fertility of their land, and their rapid improvement in agriculture.

The expedition to the far West, under the command of General Leavenworth, undertaken in compliance with orders from the War Department, for the objects therein detailed, proceeded on its route through regions almost unknown, and amid difficulties of the most perplexing nature. In consequence of the death of that brave and lamented officer while in the performance of duty, the command devolved on Colonel Dodge, who returned with the expedition to Fort Gibson, bringing along a number of the chiefs of the Pawnee and Kioway Indians, bold and warlike tribes, who have entertained no very friendly feelings towards our citizens, between whom and them there had hitherto been but little intercourse. These tribes being borderers on the newly occupied Indian territories, it became imperative to repress their hostile disposition, under the guaranty of the United States to afford adequate protection to the emigrating Indians.

With the view of establishing pacific relations between these and other tribes, a general council was held under the auspices of Colonel Dodge and Major F. W. Armstrong, which resulted in mutual engagements of peace and friendship, fortified by proper intimations on the part of those officers, in behalf of their Government, of support to the injured, and punishment to aggressors.

The journal of proceedings is herewith communicated, and cannot fail, on perusal, to awaken much interest, and to excite emotions of the liveliest character.

At the general council above mentioned, impressive speeches were delivered by several chiefs of the Creek, Cherokee, Osage, and Choctaw tribes, which I feel bound to advert to in terms of the highest commendation. In their addresses to the warlike chiefs then assembled, they took occasion substantially to observe, that their people had opened their ears to the advice which had been given to them, and adopted the habits of the white man; and that, by so doing, they had become peaceful, prosperous, and happy; that they had relinquished the chase and cultivated the earth, and that by becoming agricultural they lived in peace and in the enjoyment of abundance; and that the same inestimable benefits would assuredly await all the tribes who would walk in the same path. Such counsel, from such a quarter, so well-timed, and so impressively urged, it is confidently believed, will be productive of substantial good, and is eminently calculated to make a deep and durable impression.

The duties and services of the commissioners west being closed by the expiration of their commission, according to the provisions of the act under which they were appointed, it is proper and just to bear testimony to the ability and zeal manifested by them in the prosecution of their labors. Great benefit has resulted to the various tribes by virtue of their mission. Important treaties were concluded by them, existing divisions were healed, difficulties that threatened collision were settled, and a spirit of peace and conciliation was infused among the Indians through their instrumentality. Clothed with ample powers, the task assigned to them was exceedingly arduous, but, entertaining full confidence in the humane policy of the Government, and studying to promote the best interests of those confided to their care, they entered upon it with spirit, and acquitted themselves with credit.

There is little mention to be made of Indian hostilities during the last year. They have been few, and those not of an aggravated nature. A steady and onward course is observable among the Indian tribes towards the grand point of civilization. Their long imputed indomitable spirit of revenge, and their eager thirst for war, have undergone a sensible change in the process of meliorating circumstances. The happiest consequences may be anticipated from extending the means of tuition among their young people, from the introduction of mechanical arts into the different tribes, and from the increased attention bestowed on agricultural pursuits under the patronage of Government throughout the territories of emigration, nor can the gratuitous but useful labors of the missionary, and the inculcation of the pure doctrines of Christianity, be overlooked in the enumeration of means that are conducing to the great end so precious in the sight of the philanthropist and so dear to the finest sympathies of our nature—the transformation from the cold and barren confines of savage life, to the sunny and fertile regions of civilization and religion. All which is respectfully submitted.

ELBERT HERRING.

To the Hon. LEWIS CASS,
Secretary of War.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF PENSIONS.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Pension Office, November 7, 1834.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, herewith, statements marked from A to H, inclusive, showing the number of persons now on the pension-rolls of the several States and Territories of the United States, under the various acts of Congress; the number added to the rolls since the last annual report; the number who have been reported as dead since that time; the number who have relinquished pensions under the act of March 18, 1818, and obtained the benefits of the act of June 7, 1832; and the amount of funds transmitted to the pension agents for paying stipends due the present year.

From the statement marked H, it would appear that the expenditure has exceeded three millions of dollars.

A very painful duty devolves on me in making this report: I allude to the recent developments in several parts of our country, in which some of the most iniquitous transactions have been discovered to have been perpetrated by men of high standing in society, whose official stations and respectability placed them far above suspicion, and who have taken advantage of the good character they have sustained to practise some of the most daring frauds. In every fraudulent case which has come to the knowledge of this department, steps have been taken to punish the offenders. In some instances, prosecutions have been successful, and terminated in the confinement of the criminals in State prisons: in other cases, they have fled from justice. In every case where, on account of the solvency of the party, there was a prospect of recovering money improperly paid, a suit has been commenced.

It has been ascertained that papers have been presented at this department purporting to contain proof of revolutionary service, taken in open court, bearing the official seal of the clerk of the court, and duly certified by him, when, in fact, the persons in whose behalf the claims were made, never had any but an imaginary existence. In some instances, the claims have been admitted, and money has been paid; in other cases, money has been paid to a period after the time when the pensioners died; and this last-mentioned description of fraud was effected by means of falsifying the certificates of a clerk of a court of record. The person who made these false certificates was agent for a great number of claimants, and had free access to the seal of the court; the clerk, on one occasion, affixed his signature and seal to blanks, leaving them to be filled up as they might be required. These papers fell into the hands of this agent, and he used them for his own purposes. The judge of the court, the clerk, and the author of these forgeries, it would seem at the first blush, were all equally concerned in this nefarious business; but the two former, on being questioned in regard to the matter, frankly owned that they had such unlimited confidence in the integrity of the accused, that they never doubted any statement he made. The judge and clerk, on placing before them some of the papers above alluded to, admitted that they had never known such persons. It seems that this agent and the judge occupied the same room as an office; the clerk another room on the same floor, separated from theirs only by a narrow passage. In all instances the agent drew up the declarations of the claimants, and after the applicants made oath to their declarations, they were laid aside. The agent, at particular periods, would go into the clerk's room with a bundle of papers, and get them authenticated at his pleasure. This shamefully negligent conduct of the officers of the court is ascribed to the great confidence which they reposed in the integrity of the agent. But it appears to me that such indifference as to the manner of discharging a high official trust betrays a want of proper qualifications for office, and is but little less reprehensible than if they had been accessories in the agent's guilt.

To prevent a repetition of such fraudulent practices, the appointment of officers in each State and Territory, for the purpose of examining, in person, all pensioners, and applicants for pensions, I conceive to be indispensable. My experience for the last sixteen years has fully satisfied me that it is all-important that the most rigid scrutiny should be exercised, not only in the investigation of claims when originally presented here for adjudication, but in making payments after pensions are granted. As the officers or agents appointed to pay pensions cannot in general detect imposition, provided the vouchers are drawn up in conformity with established regulations, the duty of inquiring into the identity of the pensioner should devolve on some person or persons who can have an opportunity of examining each pensioner in the neighborhood where he resides. Unless some mode be adopted under the sanction of law for such examination, I know of nothing that this department can cause to be done that can form an effectual barrier to the continuance of frauds. The additional expenditure arising from the creation of such officers, should not, in my opinion, be considered an objection, as the amount saved by the services of such officers would not only far exceed, but probably double or quadruple the amount of their salaries.

The time for making applications for pensions on account of revolutionary service should, I think, be limited by law. And it would be proper that the names of all pensioners who fail to apply for their stipends for two years should be stricken from the roll: but this cannot be done without an act of Congress to authorize it.

The pension laws should, I think, be so amended as to prohibit, under a heavy penalty, any officer who may administer an oath to a pensioner, or an applicant for a pension, or who may authenticate the papers of such a person, from being in any way interested in the claim.

Believing that it is sound policy, as well as humanity, to give a preference to those laws which prevent crime, rather than those which tend only to the punishment of the criminal, and that what I have suggested will not have the effect to debar any just claimant of his rights, but, on the contrary, to cause a more favorable decision, I cannot doubt but that every true friend of the soldier will coincide with me in the views I have taken, and give to these propositions his cordial assent.

I have the honor to be,

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

J. L. EDWARDS,

Commissioner of Pensions.

Hon. LEWIS CASS,

Secretary of War.

[DOCUMENT ACCOMPANYING THE REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.]

Report upon the works executed for the survey of the coast of the United States, upon the law of 1832, and their junction with the works made in 1817, by and under the direction of Ferdinand Rodolph Hassler.

1. That part of the work for the survey of the coast which has been executed since the renewed law of 1832, is grounded upon the work done in 1817, under the first original law of 1807.

Therefore, in this first public report of a more full and general character, which I have the occasion to render, it is necessary to go back to that earlier period, in order to give a proper view of the state of the work; its systematic connexions, and its bearings in every respect; so much the more, as the circumstances of the interruption in 1818 precluded from the presentation of the full report, which was just then in preparation.

2. I may be allowed to suppose the principles upon which the work is to be executed as sufficiently known, as well from the mathematical elements that must guide such a work in general, as by the plans that have been so repeatedly discussed and approved, upon all the occasions that circumstances have presented for their full consideration, and the test of the public approbation that they have passed.

3. It is, therefore, rather my task here to show how these plans have hitherto been followed; to state the results that have been obtained up to the present time; and to show their consequences.

4. The first distribution of a country into regular geometrical figures, that will approach its form the nearest, and under the most advantageous circumstances to procure accuracy in the survey of it, requires the union of a detailed knowledge of localities and theoretical principles, which is in general foreign to the habitual knowledge of the country in respect to its civil connexions; the operator can, therefore, be guided in it by no other but his personal inspection of the localities.

5. The general outline of the coast of the United States presents, in the neighborhood of New York, a considerable angle between the main directions easterly and southerly, and in some measure a basin, over which lines may be laid and determined between the surrounding elevations fronting these two main directions, thereby furnishing proper base lines for the continuance of the work; though, therefore, I extended my first reconnoitring as far south as the Chesapeake bay, I was ultimately, for the beginning of my work, arrested particularly by the deciding advantages of that locality.

6. Guided by the idea that behind the straight ridge of the Palisades, in New Jersey, bordering on the Hudson river above New York, a straight valley was likely to be found, that would present the necessary first element of any survey, namely, a nearly level base line, of sufficient length to serve as ground to the triangulation, I directed my attention to, and found the confirmation in, the valley called English Neighborhood; of which I made a detailed survey in the spring of 1817, in order to give it the best location that the ground would admit of, and actually measured the distance between Vreeland's and Cherry hill, as more favorable than any locality that I had visited before with the same views.

7. As habitual for such kind of works, under the expectation of taking the best advantage of the future nearer investigation of the country, and not to make, at the very outset, expenses that might be more advantageously put upon a better line, this base was measured in a preliminary manner with a chain of twenty links, of one metre each, constructed under my direction, by which it was found to be 9,446.15 metres, corresponding to about 30,999.8 feet English measure.

8. From Weasel mountain, one of the prominent rocks of the Newark mountains, first ridge, which formed the first elevated triangle point through a number of other elevated points, a system of triangles was laid over the whole basin of New York bay, and its surrounding valleys, that presented determined distances, eastward, for the further continuation of the work over Connecticut and Long Island, and southerly over New Jersey, towards the Delaware, over the valley of which the nature of the country indicates the course for the main triangulation towards the south, to which the survey of the outer coast must attach itself at the two ends, the Delaware bay and Long branch, because the seashore itself is too flat, too wooded, and deprived of such prominent points as are necessary for a large triangulation.

9. These works exhausted the time of the summer and fall of 1817, until past middle December, even with the omission of the extreme stations which it was intended to occupy the next year, at the same time as the survey would be further extended.

10. Though, in extensive surveys, it is habitual to measure a verification base only at a considerable distance from the first base, I considered it, on the contrary, of importance, in my case, to have a verification, as early as possible, of the proportional accuracy of the base line measured in English Neighborhood, which formed then, and forms yet, the unit of the whole triangulation.

Therefore, a second or verification base was measured in December, 1817, upon the seashore of Long Island, between a point near the Narrows, and another near Gravesend beach, though, not in a very favorable locality.

11. The length of this line was found 7,753 metres, or 25,443½ feet English. The results of three different combinations of the triangles carried out upon it, falling all within two-tenths of a metre (or less than eight inches) of the distance measured, and within themselves, I had reason to consider myself sufficiently authorized to use my base line of English Neighborhood as a preliminary standard for my work.

As this coincidence is greater than usual in common geographical operations, I consider myself also allowed to propose to ground, upon the work thus far obtained, the detailed survey of New York harbor, for the next summer, as I proposed in my letter to the Treasury Department of the 18th December, 1817. The great coincidence of the sums of the angles of the triangles with that required by theory, came equally in support of this satisfactory result.

12. The whole of the observations collected during the summer of 1817, I had, of course, to submit to the necessary reductions, calculations, and clearing up of the results, during the ensuing winter. Besides that, I made also the theoretical calculations that must be derived from the theory of the figure of the earth, and the best known results of the elementary magnitudes, to deduce, from the data obtained by the triangulation, the proper location of each point to its place upon the earth, and in time upon a map. From the same principles, I deduced and calculated, also, those principles upon which the future maps were to be constructed, or, as usually called, the projection; which required so much more attention, and reflected calculation, as in the case of the coast survey it shall serve to carry the work out, in the minutest details, upon a large scale and a great extent of country.

13. While I was engaged in these calculations, the law of 1818 put an end to my further agency in the work, only a few weeks before I would have been able to present a report upon my work, that would certainly have been satisfactory, as I stated in my letter to the Treasury Department of the 9th of April, 1818, written in answer to that announcing to me the dispositions that led to the breaking up of the work. In consequence of which, I delivered to the War Department all the journals, books, instruments, and other appurtenances of the survey, together with an unexpended appropriation of upwards of $5,000.

14. It is necessary that the stations of a work of the nature of the coast survey shall be preserved for future times, and uses in any other surveys to which the determinations made by it will serve as fundamental units. Therefore, I had caused hollow cones of stone ware to be made, which were sunk under ground at the station points, deep enough to be sheltered from any plough or light accidental digging; they are well centered to the stations, so that, on their discovery, a signal pole can be placed in them, to serve at any time equally as at first, as, by their nature, they will remain undecayed for centuries. Where the station point fell upon a solid rock, I caused a hole of about two inches in diameter, and seven or eight inches deep, to be drilled at the station point, and filled with melted brimstone, which will equally serve to indicate the exact point of the station. An exact description of the locality of the station must, of course, form a part of the journal of each station, to guide in the discovery of the point at any future time.

15. It does not belong here to speak of the chasm that is found, from that time until to the renewal of the law of 1807 by that of 1832, which confirmed the former in all its parts, though with the condition that it shall not be considered as authorizing the establishment of a permanent astronomical observatory, which the most enlightened members of the Government had, in 1807 and 1816, considered as a natural consequence of the law, because it should, in fact, form the fixed point in the hemisphere of America, to which the work of the coast survey should be attached; wherefore, also, I had been directed to procure, and actually had procured, suitable instruments for such establishments at the same time with those for the survey.

16. This peculiarity of the law of 1832, I have always considered, as stated already in one of my letters to the Treasury Department, as intended to provoke a more direct and separate proposition for the establishment of a proper national observatory upon a greater scale than a mere accessory to the coast survey, and properly adapted to the standing of our country among the civilized nations that have a navy, for which such an establishment is an absolute requisite.

17. In taking up the work again in 1832, it was, of course, proper to take advantage of what had been done in 1817, as base of the operations to be made under the new law, its foundation being good, and all its principal points ascertainable, by the precaution taken, as stated above; the proper acceleration and economy of the work, and good principles, equally indicated that course in preference to any other.

18. The first operation was, therefore, to uncover again the station points of the work of 1817, and to replace signals upon all the essential points; these were easily discovered, and signals placed upon them, of the same kind as formerly used, namely, truncated cones of sheet tin elevated upon poles; only two of them, needed only at some future period for the southern extension of the survey, were not yet found by my assistants, who visited the places, but will certainly be found when more especially needed.

19. The direction in which the first extension of the work was by preference to be made, was to be determined by the consideration of where the most advantageous progress could be expected, in order that I might be enabled to present, at as early a period as possible, an actually executed full scheme and example of the work. For these views, the continuation of the work eastwardly, over Connecticut and Long Island, presented evidently advantages over that southerly through Jersey, &c.

20. The line between Weasel mountain, near Paterson, New Jersey, and Harrowhill, near Hempstead harbor, upon Long Island, had been determined, in 1817, to serve for this direction; therefore, I reconnoitred in the fall of 1832, and even in the winter, through a part of the Long Island hills, and over the elevations of Connecticut that have those of Long Island constantly in view; and though, in the various intermixtures which they present, all the information that I received from the inhabitants appeared contrary to success, I was so fortunate as to find a series of from five to seven hills connecting very properly, and to good advantage for a favorable chain of triangles; and even the corresponding points of Long Island proved more visible from one another than their position, almost in a straight line, had allowed me at first to expect, by the generally wooded state of the interior of the country. Signals were, of course, placed upon all these points, of the same truncated cones as were always used.

21. All the points thus reconnoitred were placed upon a map of Long Island, according to approximate observations made at them; constructed according to the problem of three points, and dependant on the light-houses on both shores of Long Island sound.

But, besides that the intransparency of the atmosphere near the seashore, in winter, always renders the distant vision indistinct, the actual inclemency of the month of January prevented the full decision upon the visibility of Weasel mountain, from Buttermilk hill, in Dutchess county, behind Tarrytown, which its locality promised to bring in the line from Weasel, through the interruption of the hills of the Pallisades, and the northern hills of New York, commonly called the Notch, which was, however, of the greatest importance.

22. Circumstances, out of my control, delayed my stay in Washington above my expectation, during the winter of 1832 to 1833. As soon as I had again arrived in New York, I placed upon the stations of Weasel mountain and Harrowhill signals of larger dimensions, though of the same form as I always used. Then I began the summer campaign with the station at Buttermilk hill, where it was necessary to ascertain first whether that point would actually answer, in full, the condition of joining the triangulation of 1817 with the continuation of it that I had projected. This was actually verified; so that the whole of my projected triangulation promised to be proper and available.

23. Upon this first station I had, of course, also to put the instruments in proper adjustment, and to introduce my assistants into the peculiarities of the work, and the observations; all which protracted so much more the stay upon this first station, in addition to the often unfavorable weather. The extremely unfavorable weather of the most part of the last season, in general, protracted our stay upon all the stations much beyond expectation, and what is hoped will be the case in future, particularly when the arrival of the new instrument, expected from London next summer, will dispense, in some measure, with the numerous and anxious repetitions and cares which the present state of the two-foot theodolite, that had to be used for the great triangulation, obliged me to go through; for this campaign has particularly proved that the accuracy and good state of the instruments is one of the greatest means of economy, by the greater celerity with which results can be obtained by them.

24. It would have been desirable, after the success of that station of Buttermilk, to go upon Weasel mountain and Harrowhill, to observe the angles of this main junction triangle, but it was also desirable to ascertain the whole series of triangles projected; and I hoped to make these stations, at the close of the campaign, in the fall, with more economy of the moving of the whole establishment. To get, however, the preliminary determination of the distances required for the calculations which it is necessary to make in the field to guide the progress of the work, I determined this triangle by the given distance between Weasel and Harrowhill, of which the angle subtended at Buttermilk was carefully measured by the azimuth carefully observed there, and compared with one that I had observed in 1817 upon Weasel, though I had far less reason to rely upon its accuracy.

25. I prosecuted, therefore, my northern triangle stations easterly until past New Haven, and, by return, the southern stations upon Long Island, and laid some triangle points upon the southern seashore of the island. From these main stations I measured as many angles upon secondary triangle points as the localities, time, and circumstances allowed, in the same manner as I had done in 1817. In the course of the work, also, another station point was found, the substitution of which for that of Buttermilk will furnish a very desirable and very favorable verification of the large distances, by doubling the series of the largest triangles. I made, therefore, the proper observations for that from the stations by which it will join the other triangles, the distribution of which is on another side best adapted for the survey of the details in their neighborhood.

26. Upon one of the southern beaches of Long Island appears to present itself a locality for measuring a base line of more extent, and probably under more favorable circumstances than that of English Neighborhood; this is now under nearer investigation, by Captain Swift; and the necessary preparations for this operation, as important as laborious, tedious, and expensive, are in proper progress, as it must, necessarily, be the first work of this summer's campaign.

27. The operations before described having lasted until December, at which time we were upon the Westhills stations, and the winter setting fully in, with the consequent intraparency of the atmosphere of the seashore, I was forced to abandon my plan to visit the stations of Weasel and Harrow myself. To obtain, however, a better determination, or verification, I directed these two stations to be occupied, preliminarily, by some of my assistants, though with inferior instruments, that will, therefore, not dispense my observing there, in proper time, myself. So Mr. Blunt observed the angles upon Harrow, and Mr. Ferguson those upon Weasel; and, upon their results, joined with those of Buttermilk hill, the present preliminary determinations are grounded, as far as they are dependent on this part.

28. When I had executed the station at Mount Carmel, the extreme eastern one, to which I had intended to extend my observations that year, I considered myself authorized to form two parties to carry on the secondary triangulations within the limits of country that my main triangulation embraced, as the triangles could all be sufficiently determined to allow the verifications required in future. Keeping, therefore, only two of my assistants, Captain Swift and Lieutenant Bell, with me, Mr. Ferguson was directed, with the assistance of a secondant, to fill up with secondary triangles all the parts included between the main northern triangle points and Long Island Sound; and Mr. Blunt, with another secondant, was directed, in a similar manner, for all that related to both shores of Long Island; both equally proceeding from the eastern extremity of our work towards New York.

29. The secondary points thus determined must be sufficiently numerous, and placed in such a manner as to enable from them to fill up all the details, by plane table operations on land, and by observations for the soundings upon the water. Considerable advance was made in the secondary parts already in the latter part of last fall, and the works have been taken up again this spring early, though the weather in that neighborhood has again proved very unfavorable.

30. Upon Buttermilk and Toshua regular series of azimuth observations with the sun were made with the two-feet theodolite, by myself; and the latitudes of all the most essential stations were observed by my assistants, partly with the 18-inch repeating circle, partly with the 10-inch repeating reflecting circle. By the calculations of this winter these latitudes were all reduced to one collective result, by means of the azimuths; and their coincidence has been more satisfactory even than I expected.

31. These reductions, carried through the works of 1817, to the City Hall of New York, the latitude and longitude of which had been determined by entirely different means, gave the points from which the longitudes have been counted, as reduced to Greenwich; there being no other point within the limits of the survey astronomically determined, nor any fixed point in the United States from which the longitude could be counted.

32. As well in my operations of 1817, as in those of last year, the angles of elevation or depression of the main-station points from one another, have always been observed, except upon my two stations upon Long Island, because these will be revisited at a future time. These observations will furnish, in time, an interesting collection of data, upon the elevation of all these points over the level of the sea; but neither the winter of 1817 to 1818, nor this last, it has been possible, for want of time, to calculate any results; in fact, it is rather more proper to postpone these calculations until the exact distances are fully determined, upon which these results depend; they will, therefore, with more propriety, form a part of the calculations of next winter.

33. Since I made, in 1818, my calculations of the elements of the projection that will be most advantageous for the construction of the maps, as most concordant with the results of both the triangulations and the detail surveys, the knowledge of the dimensions and figure of the earth has much improved, and been much more accurately defined; I had, therefore, to make anew all the theoretical calculations thereto referring, upon the most approved elements, of which the leading data are the ellipticity of the earth, and the mean degree of the whole meridian, that is, the 1-360th part. It would, however, be out of place, in the present state of the work, to enter into these nearer details of theory, which will become of great interest hereafter, as the ultimate results of the coast survey must furnish one or more of the data for the perfecting of these results themselves, if it shall take its appropriate standing among the works of this nature; it is to be hoped that it will be properly discussed at the end of the work of the main triangulation.

34. It may be here the place to state the reasons for adopting the metre for the unit measure of the whole survey. 1. I had a fully authentic metre made by the committee of weights and measures in Paris, while of any other measure whatsoever, I could only have a copy more or less accurate. 2. Notwithstanding older ideas to the contrary, I found, positively, in my comparisons made for the weights and measures, that, in a general way, the metres are obtained of greater accuracy and coincidence than the English scales. (See my report upon weight and measure comparisons.) 3. By my repeated comparisons of this identical and authentic metre with the scale of Troughton, of eighty-two inches, adopted as English standard in this country, together with a number of other measures, its ratio to either one of them is sufficiently determined to enable at any time to present any distance, in either one of the measures thus compared, as, for instance, to obtain the value in English inches, will need only the addition of the constant logarithm—1.5952859 to the logarithm of any distance recorded in metres. 4. In the ultimate general account, it will be proper to give the distances both in metres and in yards, or feet, to ease the utility for the various future detail applications of the work.

35. The connexion of the station points of the triangulation, by their differences of latitude and longitude, was calculated upon the same theoretical principles stated above: they have coincided with the results of the latitude observations, that are, by their nature, entirely independent of the geodetical operations, to such a degree as, notwithstanding all my cares, I did not consider myself authorized to expect; and the reduction to the City Hall of New York showed an equal coincidence with observations made some years ago, by Captain Sabine, on the occasion of his pendulum observations.

36. This afforded also an additional proof that the result of the measurement of the base in English Neighborhood, measured in 1817, would be sufficiently relied upon for the preliminary calculations, as it stood the test of being extended to distances about 160 miles from the same. It confirmed equally the near approximation of the azimuths observed last year, &c.

37. It is, however, evident that my dependance for the ultimate azimuths and latitudes of deciding accuracy must as yet be referred to future observations, with the superior means of instruments, &c. that I have in part ordered, and in part still to continue, in respect to the longitude, it is too evident how desirable an observatory will be, as no doubt will be provided in proper time by special means, independent of the coast survey.

38. My attention at the present stage of the work must be directed principally to the measurement of a base line, with all the means of accuracy that I may be able to dispose of, by means of the apparatus of which I have given the description in my printed papers upon the coast survey. The brass parts of the apparatus were put in full good order already, during last summer; the woodwork is in construction in New York, under the direction of Captain Swift; and I have just now put the double metre bars, which shall determine the absolute length, to their proper standard, by means of the apparatus provided for it, and with the help of my assistant in the weight and measure business.

39. In the actual measurement of the base line, I shall unite all my present assistants, principally because they will all take a great interest in the operation, which is, in its kind, of a peculiar nature, and not often occurring, wherein every operator will always follow his peculiar ways, according to his situation and the means at his disposal.

40. As soon as the result of the base line is ascertained, which will require some time and considerable calculations, the result will be applied to the recalculation of all the triangles; and the reductions to the geographical position will be repeated with this new element. Then a projection of the points, upon the scale of the fifty-thousandth part, will be made upon papers, distributed over the extent of the work, in such parts as will be best appropriated to the filling up of the detail surveys, by the plane table, and the insertion of the soundings, in which works the most of my assistants will then be distributed, while I shall proceed again in the main triangulation.

41. During the execution of these works, I hope that the instruments ordered of Mr. Troughton, in London, will arrive in this country, at least if he can execute the promises given to that effect. I hope, therefore, to be able to avail myself of the new large instrument, for the continuation of my work in the main triangles, the determination of azimuth's latitude, and all the more delicate observations, upon properly selected favorable stations. The two-feet theodolite, that I have used last summer, I shall then propose to send to Mr. Troughton to have it again put in a proper serviceable state, for that accuracy of which it is susceptible when in good order.

42. At the same time, with the distribution of the detail surveys upon land, I should like to put in activity two parties of naval gentlemen, for ascertaining the soundings in the neighborhood of the same parts that the detail surveys would embrace; as they would probably sometimes work in conjunction with one another, they would embrace a great part of Long Island sound, and part of the south shore of Long Island. This, however, will require to take some arrangement previously, in relation to the vessel or vessels which it will be necessary to employ in it. Lieutenant Bell, of the navy, who has been one of my assistants last summer, will take the direction of at least one of these expeditions, as his acquaintance with the locality will of course assist him much in the proper execution of this task.

43. I join to this report skeleton maps of the triangulations that have been executed hitherto, containing all the main triangles that I executed, and so much of the secondary triangles, of the two separate parties, as have been communicated to me until now. The distances in numbers would be of no interest in this report, and belong only to a final report; upon the scientific part of the work, it is at no rate proper to mention any before the calculations have been grounded upon a final base measured as above stated. These maps present four sheets upon the scale of the one hundred-thousandth part, which is that upon which it will about be proper to execute the detail maps for publication; the whole system of the operations, as far as hitherto executed, will become evident by them. It appeared to me to ease the general insight into the bearing of the work, to add a fourth sheet, upon the half scale of the others, that will present the general view of the whole work; the easier reference to the locality of the triangulation will be assisted by the tracing, only in pencil, of the approximate outlines of the coast, for the survey of which the triangles contain the elements. The projections are made upon the principles above stated, and will present no deviation for the filling up to the minutest details, when executed upon the scale of one fifty-thousandth, in which it is proper to execute the main original copy of the Government.

44. It is proper that all the maps should be drawn upon a proportional decimal fraction, of the real dimensions. There is a great advantage in being able to ascertain, by the simple measurement, in any length measure whatsoever, the real distances desired; this can only be obtained by such a system of scales which, therefore, also is the only one adopted in the present times. The scales of so much in inches, or any other small measure per mile, giving altogether an irregular proportion, are very bad, and therefore have been entirely abandoned in the new maps.

45. It is proper to add here some general remarks upon the character which it is necessary to give to the work of the coast survey, its general bearing for the benefit of the country at large, and the influence which its proper execution shall have upon the improvement of the practical mathematical sciences that are so necessary in our country, and the standing of the officers of the army and navy, to whose departments works of this nature, or requiring similar knowledge, are so often referred: though I have already touched this subject upon other occasions.

46. The survey of the coast must evidently, merely as such already, extend land inwards, at any place, until to the ridges of hills or mountains that border the valleys emptying their waters into the sea, or the large bays and rivers; it must present the localities of all the passages and gorges that lead to these valleys, &c., because it must contain all that is needed for the proper defence of the coast in case of any attack whatever, just as much as the outlines of the coast and the soundings, because like these furnish the guide to the navigation, so the others are the elements upon which the directions for a proper defence of the country, in case of need, must be grounded; and all these elements must be so detailed, and present such a full and self-explaining picture of the country, that, with the map before the eye, the military operations may be properly judged and guided in the cabinet. It is, therefore, also habitual to join for each district a statistical statement of its natural means and resources: it is as desirable to have these accounts of the land part as those upon the currents in the naval part of the work.

47. This work must besides furnish the elements of any other survey that may be desired for any public aim whatsoever, either within or in the neighborhood of its extent; its accuracy, if properly executed, and its wide range, render it peculiarly fit to become a standard to which all other surveys may, and even shall, be attached; thereby will be gradually obtained the necessary accurate data for any public undertaking of general utility to the country. This feature of the work was felt already in 1817, when the Governor of New Jersey proposed to unite with it the survey of a map of that State, but which was lost by the delay of the decision of the Treasury Department, where I had proposed to accede to the request. It appears equally felt now by the proposition of the State of Maryland for a similar junction of the map of that State, which has been very properly acceded to; and no doubt similar occasions will increase in the same proportion as the general improvement of the country advances, and the proper character of the work of the survey of the coast becomes established: this is another proof of the propriety of the measure that I took at all times properly to secure the station points for future use.

48. The character of a work of the nature of the coast survey is essentially scientific; without that this character be impressed upon it, to the evidence of the public, capable to judge of it, neither credit nor confidence will be given to it; it is, in fact, worse than useless, because it increases the doubts of the cautious and intelligent seaman, and its defects mislead the ignorant who trust to it. Plans, going merely upon what is so wrongfully called sufficient accuracy, are inadmissible, and would prove highly expensive. The economy in the work consists in the certainty of producing the most accurate results.

49. In the execution of the laws in any country, and in a new country in particular, it appears to me to be a duty to take all possible advantage of it, to promote the most possible the general benefit of the nation, and especially its scientific improvements, wherever there may be an occasion presented for it, and that upon a liberal scale, because its benefits are always far more extensive than what shows itself at the first outset. I am authorized to this assertion, in the present case, by the approbation which my treating the coast survey with these views has caused me to find in the most enlightened men of the country, and even abroad, as testified, among others, by late President Jefferson himself, who was the author of the original law, and by many other distinguished citizens: we have, besides, before us, the well-known examples of almost all European countries, who have derived valuable benefits, of various kinds, from the proper execution of similar works, in a scientific form.

50. With these views, also, I found it proper to collect a valuable library of the best works in these parts of mathematics and natural philosophy, that are either directly bearing upon the work itself, or more or less connected with its accessory or influencing branches, by which my assistants may properly improve their scientific standing, and become the more useful to the country in future. It will also be proper to add to the work, as soon as it is in a proper train, such scientific experiments or observations as relate to the pendulum, the magnetic attraction, the tides, refraction, and other similar subjects, which are always connected with such works when properly scientifically treated. I could, as yet, not do more in this than to cause the magnetic bearing to be observed upon the main stations, merely to determine the declination of the needle at the places and time; but for any other observations, nothing is as yet properly provided, nor, in fact, was there time at disposition for it.

51. By the nature of the services that the navy and the army are engaged to render to the country, these two classes of citizens, that are always of considerable influence in any country, deserve peculiarly, though not to the exclusion of other citizens, to be quoted here in connexion with this work. Such officers, in either of these services, as have applied to the study of the higher branches of their profession, of which mathematics form the foundation, will find in the work of the coast survey an occasion of improvement, as well as of gratification for their good dispositions; therefore, preference is naturally to be given to those who, with a good foundation in theory, have been successful in the career of practical application of mathematics, in topographical surveying, drawing, and particularly observing, and generally in making, geodetical and astronomical observations for actual use. Only such officers can reap some benefit for their individual improvement, or be of any service in the work, because this utility must be reciprocal, if success shall attend on either side. The officer or individual whosoever, joining the work without sufficient knowledge, and even practical ability, cannot reap any benefit from following it, and of course he is entirely useless for the work, and the coast survey would be improperly laden with him.

52. The success of those officers that have, in the work, both given and received satisfaction, will invite others to acquire the qualifications indispensably required to become serviceable, and thereby to enter the work; but the work itself cannot be the school for him who is too far behind to be of some actual service in it; the distance to be gone through is too great for him; and the functions of all those actually engaged in some part of the work are too constant, and too fully occupying them, that he might be taught and schooled separately who brings not knowledge enough to the work to see himself what he can do, as well in application of his actual acquirements, as in advance of them. All this applies, of course, equally to the assistants from any rank whatever.

53. To all this it is still necessary to add, that habits of assiduity, and devotion to a scientific object, with friendly and open dispositions, without any pretensions, are equally indispensable moral qualifications to which it is necessary to attend in the selection of the assistants in this work, as much as to their intellectual qualifications and acquirements. For there can, by nature, not be any control upon any observation intrusted to an assistant, or over the assistance rendered in an observation, except the moral strength of confidence; orders from superiors, fear of consequences, and all considerations of that kind, cannot have the slightest power; the morality and ability of the observer, at the very moment, decides what no power whatever can decide; and this is equally applicable to any chief, or any assistant whosoever, of whatever grade he may have in the work.

54. In thus exposing the principles that must guide in the selection of the assistants for this work, and which shall, therefore, ever guide me in the proposition of any assistant, of any rank or class whatever, I give the pledge that I shall always be guided by perfect impartiality as to the personal, though I may propose persons of different qualifications, with the view of their different employments; the moral principle which must guide in all such cases is, simply that every one must see before him an aim for his inclination or ambition, to which he will apply his exertions honestly, the result of which will be useful to the work. With these principles, I hope to be as successful in my choice as the general chances of human affairs will admit, and to be approved in my selections; therefore to obtain, from the civil, naval, or military rank, always such assistants as will act with pleasure and satisfaction, and therefore do honor to the work and to themselves; thence reflect credit upon our country and nation, convinced, as they must be, that they act before the whole civilized world, because the history of such works is always minutely known to every well-informed man.

55. I can, therefore, also fully rely upon the concurrence of the department under which the work is placed, as well in the aim as in the means to reach it successfully. This success must be one of its greatest aims, upon the consideration of usefulness as well as upon that of its high credit.

F. R. HASSLER.

WASHINGTON CITY, May 17, 1834.

Notices upon the maps of the triangles herewith joined.

Four sheets upon the scale of 1-100000th, present as well the main triangles as the secondary ones, distributed in such sheets as will be proper to allow the necessary room for the insertion of the soundings upon the seashore, and the insertion of the details of the land near the coast, thence adapted to the actual execution of the charts and maps for publication upon a large scale; they are, of course, properly oriented, perpendicular to the meridians and parallels.

No. 1 contains the neighborhood of New York.

No. 2 exhibits the continuation of the country in the same latitude as the former over Long Island, eastwardly.

No. 3 has that part of the triangulation that falls north of the first sheet; and, therefore, principally the triangle points land inwards, connecting with those of the shore.

No. 4 contains the triangle points north of sheet No. 3, thereby presenting the part of Connecticut east of No. 2, and north of Long Island sound, in the neighborhood of New Haven, &c.

A fifth sheet is added, presenting the union of the whole work, equally oriented, but only upon the half scale of the preceding ones; that is, 1-200000th part, to show the full connexion of the works; to assist in the reference to the localities of the country, the rough outlines of the coast are traced upon this sheet, by which it becomes evident how the triangulation will apply to the detail survey of the minuter configuration of the country, shores, bays, &c.

F. R. HASSLER.

Q. 1.

Report of F. R. Hassler, as superintendent of the survey of the coast, additional to that dated 17th of May, 1834, containing an account of the progress of that work during the summer, and until November, of 1834.

1. I stated in my report, of which this is to be a continuation, as well as in many previous communications, that the accurate measurement of a base line, by the means especially provided for that purpose, the description of which is published long ago, was, after the measurement of the angles of the main part of the triangulation, presented in that report, the first, and, as is well known, most important part of the work; to that I had, therefore, principally to devote my attention and personal exertions this summer.

2. I also stated in that report, that, from the observations upon the stations of Rulands and Westhills, upon Long Island, there appeared to present itself the prospect of a base line, far more advantageous, in every point of view, than that measured preliminary in English Neighborhood, New Jersey; namely, upon the beach called Fire Island beach, upon the south shore of Long Island, which separates what is called the Great South bay from the ocean.

3. Viewed from the two named stations, this beach presented a narrow strip of land, that appeared straight between the lighthouse, at the inlet of the bay, and the station point called Head-and-Horns, and perhaps even farther. Its position lies eminently favorable for the determination of the distance from Westhills to Rulands, which presents itself extremely favorable as a base for the large triangles crossing Long Island sound over to Connecticut, &c., as evident by the maps of the triangulation joined to my report of last May.

4. These advantages were too great not to decide in favor of this location of the base line, for the execution of which Captain Swift was preparing all the mechanical means in New York, during the time that I wrote my last report, and before. But it would have been very desirable that the actual work could have been begun with the earlier part of the season; this, however, was impossible, on account of a considerable part of my time being taken up in Washington in the latter part of the winter, to give to the Navy Department all the information that was requested, on account of the correspondence of the coast survey being transferred to that Department from the Treasury Department, where all the detail arrangements of the work, and the tenor of the agreements made with me, were known from their very beginning.

5. When I could join my assistants in New York, in the earlier part of June, the means being all on hand, I directed the final adjustment of the whole base-measuring apparatus, and what is connected with it; there were also engaged an adequate number of men for the manual assistance required, in the selection of whom we were really fortunate to obtain all efficient, regular men, of such different qualifications as are absolutely required for the very varied exigencies of an accurate measurement of a base line, and the extra works that it requires, in a place entirely isolated, and thence distant from all other means to provide for them.

6. I directed, then, all the assistants, not especially otherwise engaged, the men, and the apparatus, and equipments, to Fire Island lighthouse, in the neighborhood of which the west end of the base line was to fall; and directed the assistants, joining there, to make a detail survey of the beach, from its western end till to Head-and-Horns, or even to Hatch hill; such a previous survey being always necessary to enable to select the most favorable ground for the actual measurement. The map of this locality, hereto joined, proves this evidently. Two lines between Head-and-Horns, and some points near the lighthouse, proposed and scrutinized first by my assistants, presented such difficulties, by intervening sand-hills and bushes, as not only would have required great length of time in overcoming, but also would have occasioned chances of inaccuracy, besides a great deal of calculations, for the consequent and necessary reductions to the too much interrupted horizontal line.

7. When I could join my assistants upon the beach, in the beginning of July, though by no means in a good state of health, and after having visited the projected lines, the difficulties they presented decided me to try to lay off a straight line upon the outward sandy shore of the ocean, between the sea and the sand-hills, which appeared to present a nearly straight line, little different from parallel to the shore. This succeeded so well, that a line was laid out, starting from a sand-hill of moderate elevation, somewhat southeast of the light-house, and extending over eight miles upon the sandy beach, only in a few instances edging the sand-knolls, and in some others going between the high and low water mark on the seashore; the lowering of the first, as much as needed, it was easy to accomplish; and the second apparent difficulty was equally easily overcome by so regulating the work as to meet these places during low tide.

8. This line was then laid out accurately straight by means of a transit instrument, and measured, preliminary, by the same chain of twenty metres which had been used in 1817 for the preliminary measurement of the base line in English Neighborhood, and which serves now for the detail planetary survey of the south side of Long Island. At every 400 metres a peg was driven into the ground, bearing the mark of the distance. These precautions are always required as a great means of security against mistakes, by the omission that might happen of inscribing a measuring bar-box in the registers, as thereby constant verifications are presented.

9. During the months of August, September, and October, this line was then measured in forty-five days, of which, twenty-seven in August, fifteen in September, and three in October; the other part of that time being taken up either by interruption from unfavorable weather, or such days as were necessarily employed for the moving of our encampment along the line, for which it was always necessary to employ all the helps otherwise engaged at the manual part of the base measurement, there being never any doublets of men engaged in our work; and, I must add, near the end of it, also, my own increased state of sickness was unfavorable.

10. At every 400 metres, as determined by the accurate measurement, and at every 1,000 metres, strong pegs were driven in the ground, marked by their distance from the west end; and every 2,000 metres was besides furnished with one of the stoneware cones that are always used at the station points; these are intended as fixed points, from which the detail points of the soundings in the sea that they border are to be determined.

11. Both ends of the base lines thus resting upon two sand-knolls that will, by their position, in all appearance, always be secure from the sea, have been marked by two monuments, each consisting of a Newark red sandstone, about four feet high, hewn square for about eighteen inches from the top, with an even top of one foot square, and a round hole in the centre; under the square-cut part a frame was fixed in, consisting of four pieces of hard-wood scantling, embracing it closely by grooves made expressly in the stone, the lower part being left rough. These stones were sunk entirely even with the sand, together with their frames; which, by their extending about twenty inches on each side further in the ground, will make them stand more solid, and maintain their perpendicular position.

12. The distance between the monuments will exceed 14,050 metres, or eight and seventy-two one-hundredths miles; the accurate number will result from the calculations that I shall make next winter upon the reductions needed, for, 1st, The varied state of the temperature; 2d, The elevations and depressions that the localities of the ground obliged to make in many places; 3d, The reduction of the line actually measured upon the shore-sand, to that between the monuments, for which all the data have been determined upon the place.

13. The apparatus used for this measurement is that which I have described in my printed papers upon the coast survey, which, though grounded upon entirely new ideas of my own, has obtained the approbation of all the men of science acquainted with such kind of works. It has proved itself practically, yielding the greatest accuracy, as its ultimate product is a line of near nine miles, measured microscopically. It has also proved a very expeditious, therefore even an economical arrangement, as the line was measured in the same time (forty-five days) as the base line of Mr. De Lambre, of 11,840 metres, which mine exceeds, evidently, considerably. In fact, this base is one of the longest ever measured, with an accuracy in any way comparable.

14. The details of the operations in principle, and even the manipulations, are already described in my "papers upon the coast survey;" and as the statement of the final numerical results must naturally be postponed until the adequate calculations will have been made, I have here only yet to state the great satisfaction which it gave me, that my assistants engaged with me in this arduous task, naturally entirely new to them, acquired the manipulations of the apparatus so well, that when otherwise favored by the weather, and the locality, we proceeded with a rapidity far above all expectations; and their cheerful exertions during the whole time, and even that of the laboring men, deserve due praise, and were a great support to my personal exertions, particularly towards the end, when my ill health had rendered my personal exertions very difficult and fatiguing.

15. The detailed account of this operation, which is of rather a scientific nature, I flatter myself will be of interest, and therefore enhance the value of the methods that I have devised for the works of the coast survey, as well as increase the interest of the work with the Government and the well-informed public in general; in fact, this account of the work belongs rather to the ultimate scientific account of the main triangulation for the whole work.

16. I had expected, at the close of the last campaign, that, after the measurement of the base line, I should be able yet, during this campaign, to measure the angles of the triangles, that will determine directly from it the distance from Westhills to Rulanda, and also those angles on Harrow hill and Weasel which connect my work of 1817 to the present; this I intended to do with the large instrument ordered of Troughton, and promised in due time for that purpose. But, unfortunately, not only this instrument has not yet arrived, but even many unexpected impediments have arisen that have made the execution of my projects impossible, and deprive me even now of the use of the means by which I had intended to supply this deficiency. Besides that the lateness of the season at which the campaign could be opened postponed naturally every thing equally as much as my stay in Washington had been protracted, as above stated; an accessory result of which was, that the season for living and working at the seashore falling partly in the equinoctial storms, not only our progress was impeded, but it reduced me ultimately to the sick bed, and the lingering state consequent to it, which lasts even now, increased and maintained by the difficulties laid in the way of my progress. I had, therefore, also to avail myself of the assistance of Mr. Blunt, whose operations were near the base line, for the measurement of the accessory and preliminary angles, that had to be measured at different places of the base line; for which, besides, neither I nor any of the other assistants engaged at the actual measurement could leave our functions.

17. Though the two assistants engaged in the secondary triangulations (Messrs. Ferguson and Blunt) were some part of the time with me at the base line, (particularly Mr. Blunt,) they have continued equally their tasks

(as I stated in my last report) that they were engaged in, namely: Mr. Ferguson in Connecticut, Mr. Blunt upon Long Island, continuing the secondary triangulations, of which a part is already included in my report of last May. The comparison of the sketch of Mr. Ferguson's triangles, here joined, with the maps of my last report, will show his part of progress. The necessity of calling off Mr. Blunt for the triangulation around South bay, and to the base, has made it impossible to present with this report a corresponding sketch of his works, besides that herewith from the said South bay.

18. It is my intention to have the topography of the south part of Long Island, near the base line, fully executed this fall, as well upon land as for the soundings of the great South bay that lies between Fire Island beach and the main shore of the island. With that view I marked off a part from the west end of the base, easterly, of such length as would serve as base to triangles, adapted in size to the dimensions of that bay. Such a triangulation was then grounded upon it, by Mr. Blunt, as envelops the whole bay from its entrance to its eastern extremity, as shown by the sketch here joined.

19. The results so obtained were projected upon the scale of one ten-thousandth, to serve for the filling up of the topography with the planetable, at which Mr. Renard is just now engaged.

20. In the same manner, Lieutenant Gedney, of the navy, who has been appointed, upon my proposition, for the first expedition of soundings, namely, that of the bay so enclosed in these triangles, and the seashore adjacent to the beach, has been furnished with a projection of these triangles, upon a scale sufficiently large to make his preliminary constructions for placing the soundings, in which service he is now engaged upon the bay.

21. It was my intention to procure from Paris the materials and implements (which hitherto I have furnished out of my private stock) necessary to have a fully finished map executed of the part of the coast in the vicinity of the base line, where the topographical details are now executing, and the soundings are now taking, by which I would have been able to present, this winter, a real sample of the execution of the maps early enough yet to lay it before Congress during the course of the coming session; also, exemplars of drawings in all the different scales that it will become necessary to use were to be procured, as I have only (in my private possession) a single exemplar upon one scale that was presented to me long ago by Mr. Beauteemps Beaupré, of the Depot de Marine in Paris; for it must be here observed, that these objects are not obtainable from any other place than Paris, or where they were brought to from there, and that there has been established for all such works a universally understood conventional language of signs and manner of distinguishing the objects, which appears not yet much known in this country, and which it is necessary to adopt, in order to be properly intelligible for every body, and to present the results also from that side, so as it is proper in the present state of the science. But the impediments mentioned in my correspondence, as laid in my way for the best forwarding of the work, by procuring the necessary means in due time, has frustrated me of the pleasure of giving that satisfaction this year; this can only be remedied the following winter, (if in the mean time the difficulties are levied.)

22. The secondary triangulation, made by Mr. Ferguson, is now brought to the palisadoes, on the west, from New Haven, where its eastern part begins, and that of Mr. Blunt upon Long Island, parallel to it, both upon the plans as already stated, though I had to interrupt Mr. Blunt several times for works at the base line.

23. Thence, also, of all these parts of the country the work is brought to its ultimate application to the minute details of the topography, which I, therefore, intend to put in full activity, as soon as the necessary arrangements can be made, which, in the present state of things, is impossible.

24. I am sorry to be obliged to state here, yet, what is otherwise evident to every man who occasionally is a witness to the work of the coast survey, that from the most important to the minutest part of the work, every thing is arranged in the most strictly economical manner, and at the same time so as to produce the greatest possible effect, in perfectly accurate results, in the shortest space of time; for in this principle lies the true economy of the work; any arrangement whatsoever not fitting to this aim is a direct loss, as well in work as actually also in money. My experience, by having made similar works formerly, at my private expense, I find a sure guide in this respect; and I dare to assert, with full confidence, that never so much actually valuable work was obtained in the same space of time, and for the same proportional amount of money, in any other survey whatsoever.

25. By the change of the Department to which this work is committed, it became necessary for me to spend much time in giving the informations necessary, to introduce many gentlemen, completely new in the business, into the proper genius of the work, and its advantageous organization, which lies in documents reaching from 1807 to the present date, during which time, on one hand, the arrangements were constantly perfected, while on another, even the older documents in the hands of the Government have been destroyed by the conflagration of the Treasury office; so that now I am alone in the possession of them in their original. I had already some time ago begun the copies to restore these documents, and they needed principally only my revision and signature; but it has become necessary to make use of so many of them, that the collection is now very incomplete, and actually my time is otherwise too much engaged to attend to this part at present.

26. As this report is rather to be made in haste, to reach in due time for the aim of the President, to present it, with the message, to Congress, in addition to that of last May, minuter details have been excluded. I expect, however, to have presented the principal features, and the state of the work, to sufficient satisfaction for the present purpose, and to have made it evident that I have continued the work according to the principles laid out for me, from its first beginning, in 1816; that is, in a manner, honorable and permanently useful to the country, which was already the judgment that late President Jefferson, with whom the first law of 1807 had originated, gave upon my work of 1817; and if nothing is altered in my plans, and my organization of the whole arrangement, I can promise equally good success for the further continuance, and even assure that, by no other means or arrangements it is possible to obtain such a result; for this the judgment of all the practical and experienced men of science in this line, all over Europe, is already recorded in the scientific prints.

Annual Treasury Report.

23d CONG. 2d Sess.

ANNUAL TREASURY REPORT.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 2, 1834.

The Secretary of the Treasury respectfully presents the following report, in obedience to the "Act supplementary to the act to establish the Treasury Department."

He would invite the attention of Congress—

I. TO THE PUBLIC REVENUE AND EXPENDITURES.—(A.)

The balance in the Treasury, on the 1st of January A. D. 1832, was - - - $4,502,914 45
The actual receipts into the Treasury, during the year A. D. 1832, from all sources, were - - - 31,865,561 16

Making the whole amount in the Treasury in that year - - - 36,368,475 61
The actual expenditures during the same year, including the public debt, were - - - 34,356,698 06

The balance in the Treasury, on the 1st of January A. D. 1833, was, therefore - - - 2,011,777 55
In addition to this balance, the receipts during the year 1833 were, from all sources - - - 33,948,436 23

Viz:

Customs	-	-	-	-	-	-	$29,032,508 91
Lands	-	-	-	-	-	-	3,967,682 55
Dividends on bank stock	-	-	-	-	-	-	474,985 00
Sales of bank stock	-	-	-	-	-	-	135,300 00
Incidental items	-	-	-	-	-	-	337,949 79

These made, with the above balance, an aggregate of - - - 35,960,203 80
The expenditures during A. D. 1833 were - - - 24,257,298 49

Viz:

Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous subjects	-	-	-	-	-	-	$5,716,245 93
Military service, including fortifications, ordnance, Indian affairs, pensions, arming militia, and internal improvements	-	-	-	-	-	-	13,096,152 43
Naval service, including gradual improvement	-	-	-	-	-	-	3,901,356 75
Public debt	-	-	-	-	-	-	1,543,543 38

Thus a balance was left in the Treasury, on the 1st of January, 1834, amounting to - - - 11,702,903 31
The receipts into the Treasury, ascertained and estimated, during A. D. 1834, are computed to be - - - $20,624,717 94

Of these, the receipts during the first three quarters are ascertained to have been - 16,324,717 94

Viz:

Customs	-	-	-	-	-	-	$12,740,872 25
Lands	-	-	-	-	-	-	3,076,475 50
Dividends on bank stock	-	-	-	-	-	-	507,370 19
Sales of bank stock	-	-	-	-	-	-
Incidental items	-	-	-	-	-	-

And those during the fourth quarter, it is expected, will be - - - 4,300,000 00

Thus, with the balance on the 1st of January, 1834, they form an aggregate of - - - 32,327,623 25
The expenditures of the whole year are ascertained and estimated to be - - - 25,591,390 91

Of these, the expenditures during the first three quarters are ascertained to have been - - - $16,545,342 92

Viz:

Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous	-	-	-	-	-	-	$3,475,527 08
Military service, including fortifications, &c.	-	-	-	-	-	-	8,349,400 06
Naval service, including, &c.	-	-	-	-	-	-	2,913,183 12
Duties refunded	-	-	-	-	-	-	108,546 19
Public debt	-	-	-	-	-	-	1,698,686 47

The expenditure for the fourth quarter, including $4,462,330 99, on account of public debt, it is supposed will be about - - - $9,046,047 99

Thus leaving, on the 1st of January, 1835, an estimated balance of - - - 6,736,232 34

This balance includes what has before been reported by this Department as not available, the sum of about $1,400,000, but which is now ascertained to be reduced to about the sum of $1,150,000, making the computed available balance on the 1st of January, 1835, to be $5,586,232 34. It is estimated that, of former appropriations, there will remain unexpended, at the close of this year, the sum of $8,002,935 13. Of this amount, it is supposed that only $5,141,964 27 will be required to accomplish the objects intended by the current appropriations, leaving the sum of $999,742 93 applicable, afterwards, under permanent appropriations; and that of

$1,523,308 79 to be applied in aid of the appropriations for the ensuing year, without reappropriation, as will be seen in the estimates when submitted, and the balance of $337,969 14, which has not been required at all, or seasonably, for the objects contemplated in its appropriation, and will, therefore, be carried to the surplus fund. In the examination of this result as to outstanding appropriations, it should be noticed that one small amount of unclaimed interest on the public debt, and another of unfunded debt, though chargeable on the Treasury, are not included. Embracing those, and the amount applicable, afterwards, to permanent appropriations, there would not be money enough in the Treasury to pay at once every claim outstanding; but, excluding them, it will be seen that the effective unexpended funds, on the 1st January, 1835, will be $5,586,232 34, to meet what will be required for the remaining and unexpended appropriations, being $5,141,964 27; or, in other words, that our available means then on hand to discharge all the old and existing claims on the Treasury, with the exceptions before named, will be about $444,268 07 more than their actual amount.

The next subject deserving consideration is the condition of

II. THE PUBLIC DEBT.

All the four and a half per cents., outstanding at the commencement of the present year, have been redeemed, except the sum of $443 25. Money sufficient to meet the whole balance was placed in the United States Bank and its branches, as commissioners of loans, in May last, and that portion not yet paid to the holders of the debt, still remains in those depositories.

A part of the five per cent. stock, created in March, A. D. 1821, amounting to $4,712,060 29, was all of the 123 millions of debt existing in A. D. 1816, and of the subsequent additions to it which was left to be redeemed. It did not become payable till the 1st of January, 1835; but as there was sufficient money in the Treasury for the purpose, and it having been considered beneficial to the public to save, as far as practicable, all the accruing interest, early in July last, agents were employed by this Department to purchase, at par if possible, the whole of the remaining debt. Between that time and the 30th ultimo, the Department had succeeded in redeeming about $491,258 35 of it, and additional purchases are constantly making. In October last, the undersigned gave notice that the whole of this debt, unredeemed after the 1st of January next, would cease to bear interest, and would be promptly paid after that date, on application to the commissioners of loans in the several States. Under authority from the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, this Department has since placed, and made arrangements to place, seasonably, in those offices, ample funds for the above purpose. Thus, before the close of the year, the whole will be either paid, or money provided to pay it; and the United States will present that happy, and probably, in modern times, unprecedented spectacle, of a people substantially free from the smallest portion of a public debt.

Considering these facts, it was deemed proper to charge the whole amount of the remaining debt to the expenditures of the present year. Interest on all not paid before the 30th ultimo has been computed till the 1st of January next, the time being so short; and the account for the payment of the public debt, during the year, will then stand as follows:

All the disbursements on account of the public debt during the year 1834 will be, as shown, $6,161,017 46
Of which there will have been applied to principal - - - $5,964,774 93
And to interest - - - 196,242 53

Making, together, the sum above mentioned.

The stocks which will have been redeemed by the application of this sum during the year are—

Of the residue of the exchanged $\frac{4}{5}$ per cent. stock, issued under the act of May 26, 1824 - \$1,252,625 90
The residue of the 5 per cent. stock, issued under the act of March 3, 1821 - 4,712,060 29
Certain portions of unfunded debt - 38 74
And Treasury notes - - - 50 00

Making, in all, the principal before named.

There is an unfunded debt of about - $37,733 05
Consisting of claims registered prior to 1798, for services and supplies during the revolutionary war, of about - $27,437 96

Treasury notes issued during the last year - - - $5,975 00

And Mississippi stock - - - 4,320 09

Nothing has been paid on any of these during the present year, except $88 74. But should the certificates ever be presented, which is not very probable as to many of them, the means undoubtedly will always exist for their payment at this Department.

III. THE ESTIMATES OF THE PUBLIC REVENUE AND EXPENDITURES FOR THE YEAR 1835—

Next require attention, and are as follows:

The receipts into the Treasury, from all sources, during the year 1835, are estimated at - $20,000,000 00
Viz:

From customs - - - $16,000,000

Public lands - - - 3,500,000

Bank dividends and miscellaneous receipts - 500,000

To which add the balance of the available funds in the Treasury on the 1st January, 1835, estimated at - 5,586,232 34

And they make, together, the sum of $25,586,232 34

The necessary appropriations for the year 1835, including those under new and permanent acts, are estimated at $15,660,232 73; but the whole expenditures for the service of that year are estimated to require the additional sum of $1,523,308 79, which has before been appropriated and mentioned as applicable to the wants of 1835 without a reappropriation, making, together - - - $17,183,541 52

Viz:

Civil, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous items - $2,788,225 85

Military service, &c., pensions, and the appropriations under the act of 7th of June, 1832 - - - 9,672,654 50

Unclaimed interest on public debt - 50,000 00

Naval service and gradual improvement - 4,672,661 17

To this add as a contingent expenditure, about half of the amount of the average excess of appropriations beyond the estimates during the last three years - - - 2,500,000 00

And they make the sum of - - - $19,683,541 52
Leaving an available balance in the Treasury at the close of the year 1835, or on the 1st of January, 1836, estimated at $5,902,690 82.

But should the whole amount of former appropriations, current and permanent, that will be outstanding on the 1st of January, 1835, and be needed to complete the services of former years, amounting, in all, as before shown, to the sum of $6,141,707 20, be actually called for during the year 1835, there would be an apparent deficiency in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1836. It usually happens, however, that, of the new and the old appropriations, a sum of five or six millions remains uncalled for at the commencement of each year; and hence no real deficit is then anticipated, nor much, if any, excess after defraying all the expenditures then chargeable to the Treasury.

This estimate of receipts is formed on the supposition that the value of imports during the ensuing year, and especially of those paying duties, will not differ essentially from the average value during the last three years. Though our population has, within that period, probably, increased over one million, yet our manufactures and internal trade have probably increased nearly in an equal proportion; and this circumstance, coupled with the greater caution and frugality practised during the past year, and still continuing, will, it is believed, tend to prevent any considerable augmentation in the consumption or importation of foreign articles.

The imports during the year ending September 30, 1834, are estimated in value at $123,093,351, being, compared with the preceding year, an increase of $14,101,541. Those during the three past years have, on an average, been about $111,038,142.

The exports during the same year are estimated at $97,318,724, of which $74,444,429 were in domestic, and $22,874,295 in foreign products, being, compared with the preceding year, an increase of $6,655,321, of which $3,802,399 were in articles of domestic, and $2,852,922 in those of foreign products. The average exports during the last three years have been about $91,719,690, of which $69,407,976 are the average in articles of domestic products, and $22,311,714 in those of foreign.

It will thus be seen, that the imports of the last year varied in amount $12,055,209 from the average of the three past years, and those paying duties are believed to have varied much less. It is, therefore, in connexion with the reasons before named, considered safe to infer that the imports of the ensuing year may not differ materially from that average. Should they not so differ, the revenue from customs will probably correspond in substance with that of the past year, except so far as it may be changed by the whole amount of all the importations when compared with the above average; because the classes and value of articles paying duty, for aught which is known, will probably be similar, and the rate of duties on them will not, by existing laws, be essentially altered till the 31st December A. D. 1835.

The revenue from the sale of public lands has been estimated at half a million more than the amount it was estimated for the current year, and one million more than the amount for 1833. This estimate would have been made still larger, had not the sales of the Chickasaw lands, which will probably exceed half a million of dollars, been pledged by treaty to other purposes, and not to the general revenue of the Government. This large computation is founded on the facts of the progressive increase for some time evinced; the sum actually received during the past year; the great quantity of new and saleable lands coming into market; the enlarged demand for them to satisfy the necessary wants of our growing population and of the emigrants from Europe, and the high prices which their produce fortunately obtains both at home and abroad.

The revenue from bank dividends has been estimated at somewhat less than heretofore, in consequence of the sales of our bank stock, under the act of July 10, 1832, for the investment of the accruing income of the navy pension and hospital funds having already amounted to $656,600, and on which the Treasury can now receive no dividends applicable to general purposes. It might, perhaps, be advisable to deduct a still further sum to meet any contingency like that of the present year, in which the United States Bank, without the consent of this Department, or the sanction of Congress, and without any forewarning of its intention, seized on about $170,041 of the estimated revenue from this source, and has since withheld it from the public Treasury.

Copies of the opinions of the Attorney General, and the whole correspondence on this subject between the Department and the bank, which took place previously to the request for these opinions, are annexed for the consideration and action of Congress, [B.] It may be proper to add that, within a few days past, a new communication in relation to this transaction has been received from the bank, and, when a reply is finished, both will be submitted, if desired. No foundation appears to have existed in law or equity, for the great claim of damages made by the bank on account of the protest of what has been called, in common parlance, the bill of exchange drawn on the French Government by this Department. It is believed that the bill, when protested, ought, by our agents abroad, had they acted with due regard towards their principal, to have been taken up for the credit of that principal, which was the United States, rather than for the credit of the bank; or, at the farthest, if similar and conflicting relations existed between them and the bank, they should have pursued the equitable course of taking it up for the credit of both the United States and the bank, or the more liberal one of giving the preference to the Government, which was the drawer; and, in either of these events, no room for difficulty by this extraordinary claim would probably have been left. But as these agents preferred a different course, thereby justly impairing the further confidence of the Government in their discretion, it would seem that the bank, in the next place, having long been the general fiscal agent of the Government, and the primary one in importance, should have returned the bill, and made no charge against its principal, the United States, except for the actual advances and the actual costs and expenses it had incurred in the transaction. The actual advances by the bank, when the bill was originally received, had only been a matter of form, and were nothing.

The money, in fact, never belonged to this Department, except in trust for the merchants, or their widows and orphans who had suffered by French spoliations; and a sum exceeding the whole amount of it having been left in the bank and its branches, and no part of the money having ever been brought into the Treasury by warrant, it was, immediately on notice of the protest, restored in form, and a willingness was expressed to make remuneration to the bank for all reasonable costs and expenses.

But the temptation of an opportunity to obtain more from its principal, by a novel species of litigation, through a virtual judicial prosecution for damages against the Government of the Union, seems to have been too strong for resistance; and the bank concluded to depart from the above equitable rule, and, by some technical regulation of strict law between individuals, to attempt to procure a large sum, as mere constructive damages; and by the extraordinary mode of seizing on the dividends, which had been declared by the bank itself to belong to the United States, and of withholding them to abide the ordinary contingencies of a law-suit. It seems to have preferred this unprecedented course rather than to pursue the usual mode of a petition addressed to the justice of Congress, though Congress is well known to be the customary and only tribunal for adjusting controverted claims against the Government, when no suit is pending by the United States, and the only tribunal which, under the constitution, is empowered to appropriate money to discharge any claim whatever. After applying to this Department, and being, so long as a year ago last June, informed of its inability to admit, or authority to discharge, the damages demanded, it is remarkable that the bank should have continued to pay over the accruing dividends, and not till after the last session closed, and when any deficiency in the current revenue could not be provided for, should, without any prior application to Congress, have resorted to this unusual proceeding, and sought to have its claim against the United States adjudicated by the judiciary, when the United States are not amenable to any citizen or corporation, high or low, before the judiciary, for the decision of any claim, unless they have, of their own accord, been pleased to resort to that tribunal, by a previous action against a debtor; and in which event only is a set-off, under certain limitations, authorized to be pleaded as either equitable or legal. But here the United States had instituted no such action against the bank, and had no intention or foundation to institute one, and yet the bank, not in the case provided in the charter where dividends might be withheld, but by an unfaithful act as an agent, and as a public corporation, towards its principal and the community, proceeded to seize their dividends in a case entirely different and most questionable, in equity as well as law, and refused to fulfil the duty imposed by its charter, and by civil and moral obligations, of paying over those dividends promptly to the Treasury. In the adoption of this reprehensible course, an attempt is made to force the Government either to lose their dividends entirely, or to pay a controverted claim for damages, which, so far as any of its departments or officers have examined it, was found, and pronounced to be, groundless; or consent to let the United States be arraigned as a debtor, and compelled to submit the claim to decision before a branch of their own Government, to which such claims are not ordinarily submitted, and to whose decision it could not be referred, in this instance, but by the previous commission, on the part of the bank, of a deliberate violation of its obligations.

The further attempt appears to be made, in this way, to take from Congress and the Executive the constitutional power, on their high official responsibilities and deep sense of duty, to make or withhold appropriations to discharge all controverted demands against the United States, and to enable the judiciary, instead of them, indirectly and unconstitutionally to make these appropriations, in all cases of citizens or corporations who possess doubtful claims, and are unscrupulous enough to commit, in order to prevent their adjudication by Congress, a deliberate attack on the property of the United States, or a deliberate sequestration of their acknowledged dues.

For further and more detailed views on this extraordinary case, a reference is made to the whole correspondence and opinions annexed, without the discussion of any course which the power and the wisdom of Congress are able to select for evincing its opinions on this outrage, whether by withdrawing indulgencies from the bank as to the receipt of its notes for public dues, or by adopting some other measure on the subject, which the nature of the transaction, the rights of the United States, and the constitutional authority of Congress, may be thought to justify and demand. Believing that a similar seizure was not likely to be repeated by the bank in 1835, under the other pretence of satisfying claims for damages, in consequence of the removal of the deposits, as set up in its second letter, this Department has estimated the probable revenue the ensuing year from this source, at the usual rate of dividends lately made on all our stock in the bank, remaining after the sales which have taken place for the investment of the navy pension and hospital funds. But should Congress, on a full examination of the subject, think otherwise, it may be provident to supply some other equivalent for this portion of the estimated receipts.

The estimate of revenue from miscellaneous sources has been computed a little below the actual receipts of the current year, because the dividends applicable to general purposes will be on a less amount of bank stock, and the anticipated sales of such stock to meet the further wants of the beforementioned funds, will be much reduced. In this explanation of the estimate of the receipts during the coming year, it is hoped that satisfactory reasons have been assigned to show its general accuracy. This estimate being one and a half million larger than that of last year, it is more likely to exceed, than, like that, to fall short of the actual result. That estimate proved to be less than the actual receipts, probably about $2,000,000, or from customs about $1,200,000; from lands nearly $800,000; and the residue chiefly from larger sales of bank stock, as before named, than was anticipated. As the first deduction of 10 per cent. from the excess of duties on goods imported, and paying over 20 per cent. ad valorem, took effect on the 31st of December last, it was not practicable to fix before hand, with much certainty, the amount of the diminution, on account of it, from the revenue of the year, as the same value of merchandise might not be imported as in any previous year which should be selected for a guide in forming the estimates, and the particular kinds of merchandise thus imported, whether free, or paying a duty, might greatly fluctuate. To these uncertainties in the whole value and in the kinds of goods imported, were to be added the circumstances that the system of reduction going into operation was almost entirely new in practice, and that the cash duties substituted for credit, on some articles, tended to render former means of calculation still more inapplicable and doubtful.

It is hoped that, as the ensuing year is exposed chiefly to only one of these sources of uncertainty, which is the whole value of dutiable goods imported, the estimate made for the income from customs will not vary essentially from the amount of receipts which time may prove to be correct.

In relation to the excess of revenue received from lands over the estimate made for 1834, the amount from that source happened to be unprecedented; and, as full returns of the very large sales in December, 1833, had not then been received, it was entirely unexpected. But the actual excess, this year, though not so large as in the previous one, coupled with circumstances before named, has induced the Department to submit a larger estimate under this head than has heretofore been made.

The estimates for the expenditures of the ensuing year have been graduated and modified by the following circumstances: The actual expenditures for the year 1833 did not differ much from the expectations expressed concerning them in the last annual report, except that the residue of the four and a half per cent. stock, although charged to 1833, was not, in fact, all reimbursed, or the money paid to the commissioners of loans for that purpose, within that year, but only $13,198 of them were redeemed in the residue of 1833. Between the 1st of January and May, 1834, about $497,697 more were redeemed, and afterwards the sum of $759,271 was advanced to the commissioners of loans to meet the balance, which was then outstanding. Partly from this cause, therefore, reducing the actual expenditure in the fourth quarter of 1833 about a million below the estimate, and partly from an increase in the revenue of nearly two millions beyond the estimate of that quarter, from causes before enumerated, the actual available amount in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1834, was greater than the estimate—having been $10,302,905, instead of the estimated sum of $7,983,790. The expenditures in 1834, on account of the public debt, thus became increased beyond the estimate about $1,256,968. Another source of expenditure, increased during the past year beyond the estimate, was the sum of $75,407 for interest on the public debt, which had before been unclaimed, but which has since been demanded, and discharged; and to meet which, probably from adhering to the usage of former years, or from an impression it would remain uncalled for, no money had been specifically set aside, nor any charge made, to the expected expenditure of the year. Besides these unexpected calls during the present year, the appropriations in money, by new acts of Congress, and by former permanent acts still in force, have been computed to be about $21,000,000.

These constituted a new burden, in addition to a balance of public debt which remained to be paid, amounting to about six millions, and a balance of old appropriations liable to be called for, amounting to about five millions more. The whole appropriations, thus chargeable for expenditures to the year, did not vary much from thirty-one millions of dollars in money, besides a number of grants of land, of considerable extent and value, that were voted by Congress.

Having presented this explanation of the principal expenditures which have been charged to the present year, and defrayed to the extent required, a basis has been laid for showing the reasons upon which this Department has proceeded to reduce its estimates for new appropriations for expenditure for the ensuing year, to the extent of about six and a third millions of dollars, below those of last year. This is about one and a third million less, independent of the amount then estimated to be needed towards the discharge of the public debt.

In that sum of new appropriations, amounting to about $21,000,000, there was no permanent charge that has been deemed likely to be much lessened for the ensuing year, such as the arming of the militia, and the gradual improvement of the navy. Nor, in the opinion of this Department, will the great objects for expenditure, of a character general and somewhat fixed, such as those usually connected with civil and foreign purposes, the navy and army, including works classed as internal improvements, Indians, and pensions, admit immediately of so great diminution in number or amount as might be desired, and is hereafter expected. But as large a reduction as practicable, without injury to the public interests and a neglect of important duties, has been made in the estimated expenditures for each of them, being, in all, after allowing a small increase in some, about one and a third million of dollars.

It is anticipated that, with the valuable improvements of late years in steam, and the great advantages in using these improvements for harbor and maritime defence, some of the fortifications originally contemplated may hereafter be wholly dispensed with, or be built on a different and reduced scale; and though it is thought that only about two millions can, the following year, be prudently retrenched from the expenditures connected with fortifications and harbors, Indians, and pensions, yet it is manifest that very soon the amount required for those public purposes must, by the completion of the most necessary defences, by the extinguishment of most of the titles of the Indians, and the removal of that unfortunate race beyond the Mississippi, and by the rapid march of death among pensioners, and the detection of numerous frauds among their professed agents, become still more diminished; and as our impost duties will be further reduced by the operations of the act of March, 1833, the reduction both in revenue and in expenditure for these great objects will, therefore, happily and conveniently, for a time, be likely very near to correspond. A more fixed amount for the ordinary peace establishment of the army, and some other expenditures connected with the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, would, like what now exists with greater precision and uniformity in the expenses of the navy, be a great desideratum in the permanent adjustment of our revenue system, and would tend, in many important respects, to useful retrenchment. The gradual increase required in some classes of expenditure, by the gradual increase of our population and wealth, and of those public establishments which fluctuate with them, such as some parts of the judiciary, the legislative, and executive, could then be accurately foreseen and provided for, while any extraordinary and unexpected enlargement in expenses would then excite inquiry, and, unless resting on clear and extraordinary causes, would justify opposition: when so resting, they would be met by the public cheerfully, by means of increased taxes and revenue. Another important circumstance deserves consideration in explanation of the new and contingent item of $2,500,000, now first added to the estimates for the ensuing year. It has been ascertained, by careful scrutiny and comparison, that much of the great expenditures of the last four years, besides the payment of the debt, has arisen from appropriations by Congress to a larger amount, under particular heads, than the general estimates for the year submitted by the Treasury, and from large appropriations to objects not specifically included in any estimates.

To illustrate this, an abstract of a table of the general estimates, appropriations, and expenditures during the past two years, and of all these, but the expenditures during the past three years, has been prepared, and is submitted, showing a difference between the estimates and appropriations, independent of the public debt, in 1832, of between five and six millions, in 1833, of nearly five millions, and, in 1834, of about three millions. (C.)

The largest portion of this great increase, amounting, in the first two years, from one-fourth to one-third of the whole appropriations, it will be seen, is under the civil and miscellaneous heads, and under items classed with the military establishment, such as harbors improved, pensions, &c. For the information of the public, on a comparison deemed so very important, it is proposed to publish the detailed table from which this is compiled, and a similar one hereafter, appended to the annual exhibit of the receipts and expenditures. Should this practice of making appropriations so greatly exceeding the estimates be continued by Congress, it will not only prevent much reduction, particularly under the miscellaneous head, but it will be necessary to provide for the consequences of it by an augmented revenue proportionate to these demands, or by a larger regular surplus in the Treasury to meet such unexpected increases of appropriations. It must be manifest that it is not in the power of this Department to foresee and compute these increases with any degree of accuracy, as, with the exception of some subsequent estimates submitted after the annual ones, they depend almost wholly, in their inception, on the pleasure and discretion of Congress; and as they consist chiefly of miscellaneous public objects, and private grants for almost numberless causes, they may vary greatly in different years. But it might be unfaithfulness in the undersigned towards both Congress and the public, since the extent of the influence of this excess on the expenditures, though always something, has been ascertained to be very large during the last three years, not to bring it distinctly to their notice, and not to submit a contingent item in the estimates for the purpose of covering it. Whether that which the Department has now offered, reduced, as it is, nearly one-half from the average of the actual excesses during the three past years, will prove correct or not, and whether the diminished estimates under some other heads will correspond or not with the actual amount of appropriations that may be made, and with our anticipated means to meet them, will depend much on the caution and policy Congress may deem proper to use in restricting appropriations more nearly within the estimates presented. On the presumption that they may be more restricted than heretofore, only the addition before mentioned has, on this account, been made to the whole estimated expenditures for the ensuing year.

A reduction so much lower than the late actual average excesser, is supposed to be justified from two leading considerations. One of them is the circumstance that, during a short session of Congress, which now occurs, fewer bills of a miscellaneous character can generally be well examined and passed than during a long session. Another is, that, as our revenue diminishes, it is probable that greater vigilance will be exercised by all in the allowance of very ancient and almost obsolete private claims, or of claims very doubtful in character as to either facts or principles, and in making further appropriations to some objects of public importance, which have already received liberal attention, and which, from their nature, must be expected to diminish rather than increase in their demands on the public Treasury. Thus, in regard to light-houses, custom-houses, marine hospitals, &c., not to enumerate various objects connected with internal improvement and public expenditure within the District of Columbia, it is manifest that the sums appropriated for some years past, can be safely and judiciously diminished in several respects, and in others almost entirely discontinued.

If this be done, as it doubtless will be, with discrimination and judgment, though some new objects will have to be added, and increases in some old ones computed, yet it is probable that the saving in expense to the public will not only be considerable, but, at the same time, no object of a really commercial character, and of national magnitude, need be neglected, nor any power exercised and treasure expended in those doubtful cases of constitutional right in the General Government, which tend to alienate brethren of the same political family, and to perpetuate excitements unfavorable to useful legislation, and, in some degree, dangerous to our Union. It has been further considered, in the estimates and reductions for the ensuing year, that our whole expenditure on account of the public debt has, in one sense, ceased, either by completing the payment of it, or by a deposit of money with the commissioner of loans, or a readiness of it in the Treasury, sufficient to pay all which remains whenever the holders choose to receive it. But, though all the principal and interest necessary for this object will, before the year closes, have been placed in the bank and its branches, as commissioners of loans, yet the practice is to require the interest, if not called for seasonably, to be, after a certain period, returned to the Treasury, and the principal only to be retained by the bank till otherwise directed by the commissioners of the sinking fund, or by Congress. The unclaimed interest, after having been once paid out of the Treasury and returned, does not, at this time, exceed $261,938, or the money ready there for its discharge, after meeting all the outstanding current appropriations. Under this practice, it will be seen that its payment must constitute some annual charge on the Treasury till the whole is actually adjusted; and, consequently, $50,000 for that purpose have been included in the estimated expenditure of the ensuing year. This will probably be nearly all the demands of any kind for the public debt, in any form, which will then be made on the Treasury, or the sinking fund. The rest of the sinking fund, if not abolished by Congress, could hereafter be applied to general purposes.

In substantial conformity to the proposition made last year by this Department, it would now seem still more imperative on Congress to provide that the money, whether principal or interest, drawn from the Treasury, and placed in the bank and its branches, as commissioners of loans, and which shall not be called for by the public creditors before the close of the ensuing year, should be repaid into the Treasury, and held, under notice to creditors to receive it there; that, thereafter, the office of commissioner of loans be abolished, the duties of the commissioners of the sinking fund, and the provisions as to the fund itself, suspended, and such power devolved on this Department, as may be necessary to a settlement of that part of the debt which may not then have been demanded; and as the bank charter soon thereafter expires, to provide, further, that the books and other papers connected with the public debt should be returned and deposited here, to enable the Treasury to guard against mistakes and frauds. The whole amount unclaimed, in possession of the bank, on account of the public debt, has been reduced to $282,333, and though about to be augmented by the transfer of a sufficient sum to meet the whole residue of the outstanding debt, it will probably not remain much larger at the close of the ensuing year.

With a little legislation of this kind, every thing will be done by Congress which is deemed necessary to close up, it is hoped forever, all the once large public debt of these United States. By the payment of the whole of it, with punctuality and fidelity, it is gratifying to reflect that our public credit as a nation has been raised to a high standing, and a large stock of confidence acquired from others, which, in such future exigencies as are likely to happen, sooner or later, in all countries, will aid us to procure ample and seasonable loans, without ruinous discounts or delays.

In pursuing this honorable course, the Government of the Union has not only shown good faith abroad to its foreign friends and allies, those who lent assistance when most needed, but it has redeemed, whether at home or abroad, the entire debt of both the Revolution and the late war; paid the purchase money for Florida and Louisiana; and, with a most scrupulous sense of moral as well as political obligation, administered, in various ways, to the wants, and atoned for many of the losses, of those who perilled life and fortune in the struggle for independence, in which our public debt had its sacred origin. It is an additional source of gratification that this has been effected without imposing heavy burdens on the people, or leaving their Treasury empty, trade languishing, and industry paralyzed; but, on the contrary, with almost every great interest of society flourishing, with taxes reduced, a surplus of money on hand, valuable stocks and extensive lands still owned by the Government, and with such other various financial resources at command, as to give to our country in this respect a very enviable superiority.

When it is considered that this has been effected by a young, and, at first, not very numerous people, within about half a century, and who, during the same period, have provided such other and ample means to sustain their useful systems of government, and to build up great and prosperous communities, we may well be proud of the illustration our country affords of the financial ability of free institutions, and of the high destinies in various respects, not appropriately noticeable on this occasion, but which may await our preservation of these institutions in their original vigor, purity, and republican simplicity.

From the views before taken of the probable wants during the ensuing year for expenditures, and of the probable receipts to meet them, it has been stated that on the 1st of January, 1836, it was estimated that there will remain a surplus of available funds of about $5,900,690 82. This result has been attained by considering the unavailable portion of our funds then and now on hand at the reduced sum of only about $1,150,000, instead of $1,400,000, as heretofore reported. But it may be desirable to Congress to know that there is a prospect, during the ensuing year, of collecting some further portion of these funds. This will be accomplished, it is anticipated, by the appointment of some more active agents, by new compromises, and by more rigorous requirements in collections where property exists, so as to reduce further the whole amount from $50,000 to $100,000; and if this hope be realized, the above-named available balance will, to that extent, be increased. A minute analysis and examination of these unavailable funds have recently been completed, and will be submitted in the supplemental reports soon to be laid before Congress, on the present mode of keeping and disbursing the public revenue. But, on the other hand, enlarged somewhat as this balance may happen to be from any causes, it should be remembered that, on the 31st day of December, 1835, another reduction of 10 per cent. must, by the existing laws, be made from a part of the present tariff; and if the surplus in the Treasury, by a year from next January, should prove to be increased to two millions, it could not with safety be regarded as too great for meeting, with a reduced rate of imposts on importations, the probable wants of A. D. 1836. At all events, such is the uncertainty on that subject at this distance of time, that though something unusual in the latter part of A. D. 1836, may, in the way of final dividends on our portion of the capital of the bank stock, be received, yet it is not now possible to foresee the contingencies that may check either the present large importations of merchandise on large sales of land, and consequently reduce the revenue derived from them; or that may require an increase in our army or navy expenditures, arising from those unfortunate collisions to which all nations are liable that feel disposed to sustain the faith of treaties, vindicate their public rights, and protect efficiently their commerce and citizens. No further reduction of the tariff, until that already provided for at the close of the ensuing year, would, therefore, seem to be prudent.

The reduction or increase of the tariff is now referred to with a view to revenue alone, and not with a view to questions so much agitated heretofore, of protection, countervailing regulations, and the proper national policy to be pursued as to the imported luxuries and necessities of life. On those points, it is considered far better for the real manufacturers themselves, not engaged in mere speculative investments, as well as for commerce, agriculture, and revenue, that a policy should be selected, not unjust to either great interest or either great section of the Union, and, when once established, that frequent changes should be avoided, and the occasional increase or reduction of revenue, which may sometimes become proper for financial purposes, should be connected with articles wholly detached from the question of protection to manufactures. The tariff, as to these troublesome points, is regarded as now adjusted by the act of March, 1833, till the year 1842, A. D., except in respect to such new regulations as may be required from time to time for the due enforcement of the spirit of that act, or such other changes as new occurrences may satisfy the great mass of the community, are rendered proper for earlier modifications, without a departure from the spirit of the compromise then intended among the friends of free trade and of high protection.

A separate report on certain subjects relating to the due enforcement of the present tariff being in preparation, only one of them will now be adverted to. It is the evasion of the present duty on silks from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, by their being first landed, and occasionally recolored or restamped in Europe before imported into this country. In this way, and by the present discrimination in favor of European silks, the revenue loses a very large amount. As some illustration of the loss by such discriminations, the recent one in favor of the French silks alone amounted to over $300,000 a year, and that now in favor of French wines amounts to nearly $200,000 more, making a loss of over half a million a year on these two articles with only one nation. But while on the other points, independent of the spirit of the compromise of 1833, legislation may be regarded as still fairly open, it certainly ought not to be attempted on so delicate and difficult a subject, unless imperative cases for it shall occur, whether combined or not with any increase or reduction of the tariff that may become necessary, as a mere question of revenue, by the actual condition of our receipts and expenditures. So far from any increase being necessary at present, or prospectively, the balance now on hand in the Treasury, and the accruing revenue under existing laws, will, in the opinion of the Department, prove amply sufficient to answer all ordinary demands, and, united with our other resources, to answer any unexpected demands of no very extraordinary amount.

As appears by the documents annexed, [D.] the Government has about $6,343,400 subject to general use, invested in the United States Bank stock, and the sum of $1,882,500 invested in different canal stocks; and the proceeds of the sales of which, if authorized in any unexpected deficiency, would, in most cases, prove amply sufficient without any resort to an increased tariff.

On the contrary, neither of the available balances estimated to be on hand in 1835 or 1836, after deducting what will be wanted for outstanding appropriations, can probably exceed a million. Should the surplus, without that deduction, prove to be about six millions, as estimated, the undersigned respectfully submits that it will require no legislation, as that amount has been about the usual average balance retained on hand for many years—a balance that has furnished great facilities in meeting all claims, even at the remotest points, with punctuality and good faith; afforded much stability and elevation to our public credit, by providing seasonably the means for a punctilious fulfilment of contracts; and yielded so great security against sudden evils of every kind in financial affairs as to render one of near that amount provident and economical; and especially so at this moment, when any surplus which may exist will accrue under a permanent compromise of the tariff, that contains within itself a provision to reduce still further the duties, and undoubtedly the whole amount of our revenue, after the close of the coming year.

It is a source of sincere congratulation, that, from the general prosperity of our commerce, and from the peace, industry, and abundance, which so widely prevail over our fortunate country under its admirable institutions, researches are obliged to be directed rather to the due reduction or disposition of any occasional surplus that may happen to exist in the Treasury, than to obtain sufficient for public purposes by taxation and other burdens. But under our altered system as to duties and the public debt, it will be prudent to calculate that deficiencies as well as surpluses may happen oftener than formerly. In the opinion of the undersigned, however, neither can be soon anticipated so as to require immediate legislation. But should Congress think differently, no harm could arise from vesting a power in the Treasury Department, in case of an unexpected deficiency occurring in the revenue from any cause whatever, to sell such portions of our public stocks as may be necessary to supply the public wants growing out of actual appropriations. In a contingency of that kind, against which, in the present system of our revenue, and without a large ordinary surplus, to be applied as it can be spared or not for the payment of a public debt, in the manner heretofore practised, it is difficult to guard effectually against not only the occurrence of a deficiency, but its usual evils, a delay, if not great embarrassment and injury to public creditors, and a violation of our plighted faith.

At the same time, it might be expedient to provide, that, whenever the collections of the revenue permanently authorized, should prove to be in an excess not immediately needed or useful as a proper surplus in the Treasury, the Department should either obtain interest for it of the banks where the largest amounts are long deposited, or invest it temporarily in some safe stocks till needed, or till the tariff is again changed. This would probably secure a due interest on it, while retained, instead of the present and past modes of obtaining interest on any occasional surplus, by applying it, in discharge of the public debt, and which mode, since the payment of the latter, can no longer be pursued.

Should facts occur which appear to require legislation, such an arrangement, like a regulator in some large or complicated machinery, remedying any occasional irregularities, might operate more beneficially, as to any considerable excess or deficiency, than yearly changes of the tariff, made to meet yearly vibrations in our revenue, or to meet yearly reductions or augmentations in our expenditures.

This subject of interest from the deposit banks, at some rate, and under some circumstances, was adverted to in a report by a committee in one House of Congress the last session, and would at this time be more fully examined, in connexion with that report, and the subsequent intimation of the United States Bank of its claim for damages on account of the late removal of the deposits, connected, it is apprehended, with the idea of a profit or interest derived from them, were it supposed that either point could, in the present condition of things, be considered of any practical importance. But the balance of money at present on hand, as before remarked, is merely the usual and convenient amount for current fiscal operations, and most of it is liable, at any moment, to be withdrawn to meet existing appropriations.

While the intimation of the bank, resting, as it probably must, on an impression that the bonus was paid instead of interest on the public deposits is not believed to be supported by the language or spirit of the charter, which required the bonus "for the exclusive privileges and benefits conferred by this act on the bank," and which exclusive favors, whether termed privileges or benefits, consisted principally in the sole right of banking for twenty years, and for which alone Mr. Madison, in his veto of 1815, and Mr. Dallas, in his letter of December 24, 1815, thought that a bonus should be paid to the Government; the latter further observed, that, "independent of the bonus here proposed to be exacted, there are undoubtedly many public advantages to be drawn from the establishment of a National Bank, but they are generally of an incidental kind, and, as in the case of deposits and distribution of the revenue, may be regarded in the light of equivalents, not for the monopoly of the charter, but for the reciprocal advantages of a fiscal connexion with the Government."

If the reasons should ever be presented to this Department, in support of the late intimation of a demand for damages for the removal of the deposits, in a case where the bonus was claimed and paid on the above grounds, and where the right to remove the deposits was expressly reserved in the charter to the officer removing them, it will then probably be in season to enter more fully into this collateral question. Or should the balance in the possession of the State banks at any time become much larger than the current demands existing against the Treasury, it will, if Congress do not earlier think proper to act on it prospectively, nor to authorize any temporary investment of it, be then considered necessary and proper for this Department to examine in what cases, and under what circumstances, on what surpluses, and at what rate, interest could equitably be demanded, in addition to the useful duties performed by the selected banks in behalf of the Treasury.

On these points, however, it is hoped that this Department will not be understood as recommending that taxes should ever be imposed with a view to permit a large surplus any more than a deficiency to occur; but that, when the former unexpectedly and unintentionally happens, an income should be realized from it, by interest or an investment, until, at the end of every few years, a thorough revision of the tariff would, in the pursuit of this policy, be made, and so graduated, as during the next succeeding term to be likely to correct any great irregularities, whether excesses or deficiencies, that had happened during the preceding term, and to lead to the sale and use of any interest or investments which in the mean time had accumulated.

Those other questions naturally connected with the present deposit banks, and, indeed, with our whole existing system of finance, so far as regards the keeping and disbursing the public money, might here be appropriately considered. Yet, without any desire to avoid, but rather from a wish to submit that full and frank discussion of them which their acknowledged importance and the exciting interest in them demand from the fiscal department of the Government, they will be postponed to a separate supplemental report, which will be confined exclusively to their consideration, and will soon be presented to Congress.

It appears to the undersigned that a change in the commencement of the fiscal year, and of the time at which the annual appropriations begin, would be a great improvement in the financial operations of the Government. If the year was to commence after the last day of March instead of September, and the annual appropriations begin from the same date, many delays and embarrassments could be avoided, and the information on the condition of the receipts and expenditures of the previous year, to be laid before Congress each session, could be much more full and accurate upon the subject of the new coinage of gold, and the operation of the acts of the last session relating to it, and the value and tender of foreign coins, this Department does not, until further experience is had, contemplate offering many recommendations for new legislation. A particular suggestion, deemed proper, is, that the one dollar gold coin, originally embraced in the late act, should be authorized.

If found on trial to be convenient, as small gold coins have been found, (some of less and some of little larger amount in Portugal, Russia, Spain, Turkey, and Switzerland,) it does not seem to comport with the interest and welfare of the community to prevent here its coinage and circulation; and if not found on trial to be useful, the sagacity of a self-interest will soon lead to the abandonment of its coinage by making no demand for it. Thus the community can in no event sustain much if any injury from it, while the facilities of the public, by having a coin of either metal, (gold or silver,) as small as one dollar, may be greatly increased. This kind of legislation, with a view to provide a full supply and variety of coin, instead of bills below five and ten dollars, is particularly conducive to the security of the poor and middling classes, who, as they own but little in, and profit but little by banks, should be subjected to as small risk as practicable by their bills.

The wealthy and commercial, for whose benefit, chiefly, banks are instituted, will then chiefly use their bills, and suffer by them if forged or depreciated; while the laboring classes and men of small means will, by the justice and paternal care of the Government, generally be provided with a currency of hard money, not exposed to any risk of failures, and to be used for all dealings of such an amount as their daily or weekly wants may in most cases require.

The new coinage has as yet been confined principally to the half and quarter eagles, and has equalled, in all, about $3,114,090, or in four months, more than four times the annual average coinage of gold for many years past.

The demand for other coins has also been promptly met throughout the year. To aid in carrying the new law into efficient operation, this Department, last August, placed in the hands of the Director of the Mint, under the act of April 2, 1792, twenty thousand dollars, and ten thousand more in September, as it was needed, and could be, without inconvenience, spared from the Treasury. By this course many have been enabled at once to realize funds from their deposits of bullion or coin, and the Mint to continue its operations uninterruptedly, and to supply promptly, when desired, coins already prepared for circulation.

The strong disposition of the public to use the new coinage has been observed with pleasure; and the liberal aid of many of the deposit banks in assisting to increase its circulation has proved very useful, and deserves commendation. As the new coinage commenced nearly in the middle of the year, and the date, till next January, could not by law be altered so as to distinguish the new from the old coin, such other alterations were adopted by the Director of the Mint as the law permitted, and as were calculated to aid the community in readily discriminating between them. After the next year begins, the new date alone will enable the public to distinguish the new coins; and such modifications only will be made in the former emblems as taste and convenience may, in the opinion of the Director, and without an omission of any thing required by Congress, appear to demand. His report, which it is expected will soon be received and presented, will probably furnish every further particular connected with the concerns of the Mint that may be interesting. But it is considered proper to invite the attention of Congress to a change in the law respecting the organization of the Mint establishment, so as hereafter to prevent its operations in refining and coining for others from being a tax on the Treasury, and any longer swelling the large amount of our annual expenditures. This could easily be effected by imposing a duty or seignorage of about one per cent. on the prompt coinage of silver, and one-fourth per cent. on that of gold; the present coinage of copper now defraying its own expense. This would be no more burdensome to the persons holding bullion than the delay now allowed for the recoinage; and which delay of forty days, [or one-half per cent. discount if delivered in five days,] and consequent loss of interest, could, with such a seignorage, and the advances now authorized from the Treasury, be, without inconvenience, reduced to eight or ten days, and the whole establishment be thus sustained by its own earnings, without much, if any, increased cost to either individuals or the public. But, in such case, if the cost should ever be increased to individuals, some additional inducement will be held out to prevent either the exportation or melting of our coin, which have been so great, before the late change in the law, as to have left in deposit and circulation, in this country, an amount of it not exceeding that struck in two or three out of the forty years during which the Mint has been in operation. The expenses and labors of the Mint, equalling, on an average, about $20,000 a year, or $800,000 in all, excluding buildings, have thus, except for about two years, been entirely lost to the country.

It has been deemed desirable to attempt some improvements in the revenue cutter service. With such a view, all its regulations have been revised and republished. By those it has been endeavored to promote the cause of temperance, and thereby to increase the health and efficiency of the crews, and the safety of the public property and public interests in this branch of service, by holding out a similar inducement to that now existing in the navy, to discontinue the use of spirits on shipboard. Greater security has been provided for the prompt payment of their wages, and for official accountability. It has further been deemed expedient not only to stop any contemplated increase in the cutters, but to reduce the number of them, and of the persons employed in this service, as rapidly as the diminished temptation to smuggling will safely permit.

By several resolutions, appropriations, and acts of Congress, at the last and previous sessions, a variety of other subjects, not yet reported on, has been confided to the attention of this Department, such as the erection of a number of custom-houses; the building of a bridge over the Potomac river in this District; a compromise of the suits pending against the firm of T. H. Smith and Son; an opinion on the validity of some private land titles in Missouri; a report on certain provisions in the tariff act of July 14, 1832; some statements as to the marine hospital money; a reorganization of the Treasury Department; and a revision of the subject of salaries and fees to custom-house officers. These have received careful attention, and will form the subjects of separate reports to Congress early in the present session. In the report on the last of them, it is contemplated to offer such suggestions, by way of addition to this communication, as are appropriately connected with that inquiry, and as would have been otherwise mentioned here in respect to some changes deemed suitable in the whole amount of compensation to various custom-house officers, and in the number of such officers at various ports, and in relation to other changes in the system, which the great alterations in the existing duties seem to indicate, as required for sound economy and the public convenience. A few remarks concerning hospital money will also be postponed, and annexed to the statement requested in relation to that subject.

In the preparation of new weights and measures on the authority given in the act of 2d of March, 1799, and on the principles set forth in a report from this Department, of June 20, 1832, coupled with the provision on this subject in the constitution, some progress has been made since the date of that report. But the difficulty in procuring the most suitable materials from abroad has retarded the completion of the work, and the present engagements of the distinguished gentleman specially employed to superintend the business, and which engross most of his time in a survey of the coast, may, with the circumstance before named, prevent the final accomplishment of this desirable object another year. But it is hoped, that then, either at the arsenal in this city, or at the Mint, the most natural and appropriate place, the new weights and measures will be satisfactorily finished, and greater uniformity and accuracy attained on a subject in which, both as to revenue and commerce, it is much needed, and will prove eminently useful to the public.

The survey of the coast before alluded to has, since the last annual report, been transferred to the charge of the Navy Department, with which it seems to be more intimately and appropriately connected. With this survey, the situation and utility of our present light-houses, already being 199 in number, besides 29 light-boats, and the necessity for others from time to time, would seem to be in some degree fitly associated. As a measure likely to lead to economy in not extending the establishment of light-houses beyond the real wants of the country, and in fixing their exact locality, so important to the safety of our navigation and navy, it is respectfully recommended, that in the survey now in progress, Congress should require the latitude and longitude of every light-house to be carefully ascertained and published; the importance of its position to be inquired into; and that no new one be hereafter erected till a report is made in respect to its public benefits by the two collectors and the commander of the navy yard nearest the proposed site.

The rebuilding of the Treasury edifice on or near its former location, with the dimensions of the building enlarged so as to meet the wants of the Department, and rendered fire-proof for the security of its papers, seems indispensable to its convenient operations, and to the safety of some of the most valuable records connected with the public archives.

The report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office is annexed, [E.] Many of its suggestions are highly important, and some of the recommendations, as to changes in this branch of the collection of the public money, are respectfully though earnestly urged on the consideration of Congress.

The Indian titles having of late years been more extensively extinguished, the quantity of valuable lands brought into market has increased in amount, so as to place in the Treasury over three millions annually, instead of about one million, as was the case twenty years ago. Within the same period the land offices have been augmented in number from about eighteen to fifty-three, in actual operation in 1834.

These circumstances have added much to the business of that bureau, and should clearly lead to a corresponding increase in its clerks, or a separation from it of some of its present laborious duties, as the diminution in other business in some other bureaus might lead to reductions in the number of their clerks to the extent proposed in the plan soon to be submitted, on the reorganization of the Treasury Department. Attempts have been made during the past year, with some success, to simplify the mode of making entries in the General Land Office of the sales effected; some difficult and long delayed questions of accounts have been decided, greater local accommodations and facilities furnished to the office, and increased convenience and promptitude, as far as practicable with the present force of the bureau, have been introduced in the ascertainment of titles, and in the collection and disbursement of the large amount of revenue derived from this source. But new legislation can alone give entire relief, in the present condition of its enlarged duties, and at least $30,000 a year, for ten years, will be required to be expended in additional clerk hire, to dispose of all the writing in arrear, and that may be hereafter rendered necessary by the additional sales of land.

It gives me great pleasure to state that, among more than fifty offices and one hundred receivers and registers connected with the present system of land sales, amenable to the Secretary of the Treasury, and under his control as to their collections, not one, during the last year, has proved to be a defaulter, although the money collected and paid over has probably exceeded four millions. All which is respectfully submitted.

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Speaker of Ho. of Reps. U. S.

Correspondence with the Bank of the United States, in relation to the bill of exchange on France.

BANK UNITED STATES, April 26, 1833.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I have this day received advice from Paris that your bill of exchange in my favor, for four millions eight hundred and fifty-six thousand six hundred and sixty-six francs and sixty-six centimes (francs 4,856,666 66) has been protested for non-payment. As soon as the bills and protest are received, a statement of the account will be forwarded to you. In the mean time, you will please to take notice that the bank holds you responsible for principal, interest, costs, damages, and exchange.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

S. JAUDON, Cashier.

Hon. LOUIS McLANE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

BANK UNITED STATES, May 13, 1833.

SIR: Begging reference to my respects of the 26th ultimo, I have now the honor to transmit to you herewith your original bill of exchange, dated 7th February last, in my favor, at sight, on M. Humann, Minister and Secretary of State for the Department of Finance, Paris, for four million eight hundred and fifty-six thousand six hundred and sixty-six francs and sixty-six centimes, and the protest for the non-payment of said bill, dated March 22, 1833, which bill and protest were received by me this day. I transmit, also, herewith, the instrument executed by the President, under the seal of the United States, which accompanied and was returned with this bill, and the account of Messrs. Hottinguer & Co., our bankers in Paris, of the costs of protest, &c., together with the bank's account of return of said bill. The amount of the last is 5,630,765 francs 91 centimes, equivalent, at 5.30 francs, the current rate of exchange this day for a bill on Paris, at sight, to $1,062,408 66, due in cash this day.

I have the honor to be,

With great respect, sir,

Your obedient servant,

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

May 16, 1833.

SIR: The letter of the cashier of the Bank, Mr. Jaudon, dated the 26th ultimo, informing me of the non-payment of the bill drawn by this Department on the French Government for the amount of the fifth instalment payable under the late convention, was duly received; and yesterday, that of the 13th, returning the bill and protest, and the account of the bank therefor, was also received. As the proceeds of the bill have not been brought into the Treasury by warrant, the Department has it in its power to return the amount immediately to the bank, and the Treasurer has been requested to instruct the cashier of the bank to recharge the same to his account. The account of the bank for the return of the bill is under consideration, and the result, which is not to be affected in either way by this payment, will be communicated in a few days.

I am, respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

LOUIS McLANE.

Secretary of the Treasury.

President Bank United States, Philadelphia.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES,

June 19, 1833.

SIR: In a letter which I had the honor to receive from your predecessor, under date of the 16th ultimo, it was stated that the account of the bank for the return of the protested bill on the French Government was under consideration, and that the result would be communicated in a few days. The approaching semi-annual settlement of the affairs of the bank, on the 1st of the next month, makes it desirable to arrange all its unadjusted accounts at that period, and it will therefore be acceptable, if entirely consistent with your convenience, to learn whether the account in question can be settled before that time.

I have the honor to be,

Very respectfully,

N. BIDDLE, President.

Hon. WILLIAM J. DUANE,

Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

June 21, 1833.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 19th instant, I beg leave to inform you that, upon the receipt of "the account of the bank for the return of the protested bill on the French Government," and before I took charge of this Department, it was deemed proper to submit it to the consideration of the Attorney General of the United States, and that, according to the opinion of that officer, expressed in a letter of which a copy is sent herewith, the item of fifteen per cent. damages on the amount of the bill has no foundation in law or equity.

As the account stated by the bank, with the exception of that item, appears to be correct, if supported by proper vouchers, it would have given me pleasure to have it settled prior to the approaching semi-annual settlement of the affairs of the bank, and with an understanding that this settlement should not affect the rights of the bank otherwise, if any it has. But as the fund from which the payment is to be made is at present insufficient, I am under the necessity of postponing it until the President's return, after which the requisite measures will be promptly adopted.

I am, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

WILLIAM J. DUANE,

Secretary of the Treasury.

N. BIDDLE, Esq.,

President Bank United States, Philadelphia.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,

May 24, 1833.

SIR: I have carefully examined the claims presented by the Bank of the United States, on account of the protest of the bill of exchange drawn by you on the French Government, for the first instalment and interest due the United States, under the convention with France of July 4, 1831. The account stated by the bank, if supported by proper vouchers, appears to be correct, with the exception of the claim of fifteen per cent. damages on the amount of the bill. This item, in my opinion, has no foundation in law or in equity, and ought not to be paid by the Government. The bank is entitled to indemnity, and to nothing more. I will take another occasion to state to you the reasons on which my opinion is formed, and am,

Very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

R. B. TANEY.

To the SECRETARY of the Treasury.

OFFICE OF BANK UNITED STATES,

Washington, June 25, 1834.

SIR: By direction of the Bank of the United States, I hand you, enclosed, an account for the damages and interest on the bill drawn by the Treasury Department on the French Government, and returned protested in March, 1833. This account was presented by me to the First Auditor for settlement on the 23d instant, and returned by him on the 24th instant, with the remark "that, as the claim is understood to be predicated on a negotiation or arrangement in relation to said bill between the bank and the head of the Treasury, his approval, or an appropriation by Congress, is deemed necessary by the accounting officers of the Department, before they can consider themselves authorized to take cognizance of it." For the purpose of obtaining from you the instructions which are deemed necessary, the account is now presented to you, and I will be much obliged by your acting on the case as soon as your engagements will permit, as the bank is anxious to know the final decision of your Department in relation thereto.

I am, sir, respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
July 2, 1834.

SIR: In reply to your communication addressed to the Department on the 25th ultimo, I have to state that the Department is not aware of any circumstance having occurred since its letter to the President of the United States Bank, of the 21st of June, 1833, changing the opinion of your claim for damages on account of the French bill of exchange, as expressed by the Attorney General, and by the Department, in conformity thereto.

I am, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,
*Secretary of the Treasury.*RICHARD SMITH, Esq.,
*Cashier Branch U. S. Bank, Washington,*BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, July 8, 1834.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 3d instant, requesting that the dividend on the stock of the bank, owned by the United States, should be placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, at the office of this bank in Washington, which was this morning submitted to the board of directors. At the same time, was presented a copy of your letter to the cashier of that office, dated the 2d instant, containing the final refusal of the Treasury to allow the claim of the bank for damages on the protested bill upon the French Government.

After due consideration of the contents of these communications, I am instructed by the board of directors to inform you that, from the dividend payable on the 17th of this month, there will be deducted the amount due to the bank for damages, costs, and interest upon the bill of exchange drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury on the French Government, and that the remainder shall be placed to the credit of the Treasurer in the office at Washington, in conformity to your request. I am further instructed to say, that this course is adopted by the board of directors, not merely from a conviction of the obvious justice and propriety of it, but because it furnishes the best, if not the only mode of obtaining a judicial decision of the case by the proper tribunals. To procure that decision, the board will give every facility in their power; and if there is any other mode of submitting the rights of the respective parties to the judicial tribunals more acceptable to you, any suggestion by you for that purpose will not fail to receive the prompt and respectful consideration of the board of directors. In the mean time, I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

N. BIDDLE, *President.*Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
*Secretary of the Treasury, Washington.*BANK OF THE UNITED STATES, July 8, 1834.

SIR: I had this day the honor of informing you that the board of directors would deduct from the dividend payable to the United States on the 17th day of this month, the amount due to the bank on account of damages on the bill of exchange on the French Government. I am instructed to apprise you, at the same time, that, in thus enforcing their right in this particular case, they desire not to be understood as waiving any other claim upon the Government; and they more especially wish it to be understood that they do not waive their claim for full compensation and indemnity for the violation of the charter of the bank, by the removal from its custody of the public funds, for the use of which the bank had paid a valuable consideration.

That claim is reserved in full force, to be asserted at such time and in such manner as may hereafter be deemed expedient.

I have the honor to be,

Very respectfully, yours,

N. BIDDLE, *President.*Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
*Secretary of the Treasury, Washington.*TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
July 14, 1834.

SIR: Your two communications, under date of the 8th instant, have been received. The course pursued by the bank over which you preside, in determining to withhold a portion of the dividends due on the stock of the United States, has excited much surprise in this Department, and, at the present time, is more to be regretted, as Congress is not in session to provide for the deficiency thus caused in the estimated revenue from the bank stock the present year. The claim for damages on the bill of exchange drawn upon France, to answer which, it is stated, that payment of part of the dividends is now refused, was disallowed by this Department before the last two dividends were passed to the credit of the Treasury, and some months before the recent session of Congress commenced. Consequently, it was presumed that the claim, if not abandoned, would be presented and pursued before that body, in the manner usual with claims against the United States, when the latter has not instituted any action at law against the claimant.

Besides these considerations, it would not have been anticipated as probable that all the dividends accruing would not be paid with promptitude and fidelity, when it was known that the case of a failure in a stockholder to discharge his subscription to the capital of the bank was the only case where the charter makes an express provision that he shall lose the benefit of the dividends; and, in this instance, that the United States, though a large stockholder, was not pretended to have been guilty of any breach of this provision.

Notwithstanding this, it would seem from your communications that the United States, though intimately connected with the bank, by having conferred the great privileges in its charter, by still using it daily as a fiscal agent for certain purposes, and by being entitled to a supervision of its concerns, through Congress, has suddenly, without previous notice, and only by an implied or constructive power, not, in the opinion of this Department, warranted or necessary, and for the purpose of satisfying a controverted claim, the law and equity of which were, many months since, denied by the Executive, and have never been sanctioned by either of the other branches of Government established by the constitution.

In this condition of the subject, since the bank did not deem it proper to present to Congress, the custom-ry tribunal for settling such disputed demands against the United States, or, during its late session, to apprise either that body or this office of the extraordinary course intended to be pursued in thus seizing upon a large portion of the public dividends while already in possession of more than a million of dollars belonging to the Government, but hitherto uncalled for by its creditors or the Treasury, this Department does not consider that it has yet enjoyed a suitable opportunity, in relation to so unexpected a measure, to know the views or procure the desirable action of Congress; and, therefore, does not feel justified in making, at this time, any arrangement with the bank, or any "suggestions" in respect to legal prosecutions; nor in recognising, in any mode, "the justice or propriety" of the proceedings the bank has been pleased to adopt.

But it will endeavor on the whole subject, to present an early report to Congress at its next session, and to the President of the United States. In the mean time, if the bank desires, before a report is prepared, that the facts and reasons in detail on which its decisions, and especially its claim for damages on the bill of exchange, are founded, should be examined by this Department, the statement of them, whenever forwarded, will receive a respectful consideration.

I have the honor to be yours,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

N. BIDDLE, Esq.,
President U. S. Bank, Philadelphia.

B 2.

Letter of the Attorney General requesting it, and the opinion of the Honorable R. B. Taney, upon the claim for damages by the bank on account of the protest of the French bill of exchange.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
October 21, 1834.

SIR: I have recently received a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he requests me, among other things, to furnish him with a copy of the reasons, supposed by him to have been placed on file in this office by yourself, in support of the opinion given by you as Attorney General of the United States, on the claim preferred in May, 1833, by the Bank of the United States, for fifteen per cent. damages on the bill of exchange drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury on the French Government. As I do not find any such paper on the files of this office, may I ask you to transmit me a copy thereof, if such a document has been prepared by you, and, if not, that you will state the grounds of your opinion in such form as to enable me to comply with the request of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I have the honor to be,

With great respect,

Your obedient servant,

B. F. BUTLER.

To the Hon. ROGER B. TANEY, Baltimore.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 25, 1834.

SIR: I proceed, according to your request, to state the grounds on which I came to the conclusion that the Bank of the United States was not entitled to the fifteen per cent. damages, which it demanded on the protest of the bill drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the first instalment due under the convention with France.

The facts in the case are briefly these: By the terms of the convention, the money was to be paid at Paris, into the hand of such person or persons as should be authorized by the Government of the United States to receive it. And by the act of Congress of July 13th, 1832, it was made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the several instalments, with interest thereon, to be received from the French Government, and transferred to the United States, in such manner as he might deem best: the nett proceeds thereof to be paid into the Treasury.
